ago, and the parties continued to work, so to speak, under that conspiracy up until within three years, and then the indictment was found for that conspiracy, the prosecution would not be barred in such a case as that. That is what I understand you to say. In other words, that it is one of those continuing things like a nuisance, as the court said, which, if there is anything done under it within the period of the statute, the prosecution is not barred. That is my understanding of what the court has said. Now, if your honor please, what we undertake to maintain is this, that a conspiracy is an agreement between the parties——

The COURT. [Interposing.] That is the same point Mr. Davidge made. Of course you will have a chance at some stage or another to argue that question at large.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The COURT. And as it lies at the foundation of this prosecution, as it were, we may as well settle that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I was going to suggest this, your honor: I have taken a good deal of pains to put in a simple and perspicuous form the propositions of law. I do not want to argue any of them, but if your honor would take them and find that any one or more, in your judgment, ought to be settled in advance of the argument, I would be very glad to have it so.

The COURT. I will do so with pleasure. As to this other point—the one you recurred to so often, and which has shown its face so frequently in the progress of this trial—I presume that it would be as well to have that settled in advance, too.

Mr. MERRICK. I would like to argue that. There are some authorities upon that point, and there are several that are quite important. I do not know that it is worth while to settle it in advance. I would rather make my argument when I could make it all at once, and not waste the time of the court unnecessarily, as we have done to-day, without meaning any reflection on the counsel on the other side.

Mr. DAVIDGE. If you make your argument at the close nobody will have an opportunity to respond.

The COURT. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILSON. I am afraid I always try the patience of the court——

The COURT. [Interposing.] No; not at all. Your modesty detains you always until the case is exhausted by your brethren.

Mr. MERRICK. And then he comes upon an impatient court.

Mr. WILSON. Modesty is one of my faults, but my Brother Merrick always takes me off of my feet.

Mr. MERRICK. You took me off of my feet this time.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, APRIL 19, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. CHANDLER. If your honor please, I understood yesterday that after the arguments closed on the facts, and the prayers were offered, such arguments as were thought desirable by the party offering the instructions might then be heard on the law questions.

I do not want to go into an argument of the facts without that matter being understood, and so I call your honor's attention to it.

Mr. MERRICK. I understood that the prayers could be offered almost any time, but that the argument upon the law would be made at the same time with the argument to the jury. Otherwise we will only be consuming time at the close, after the argument to the jury, by having another argument to the court.

The COURT. No. That was not my view. In a case like this particularly I am not disposed to restrict the argument. What I said yesterday was that I thought it expedient to postpone the presentation of the prayers upon the points of law until after the arguments upon the facts to the jury were closed, for the reason that the court itself will be better prepared at the end of those arguments to decide the questions of law as applicable to the facts in the case. I do not know what influence the arguments of counsel on the facts to the jury might have on the mind of the court in respect to the questions of law. The abstract questions of law would not be changed at all. I refer only to questions of law as applicable to the evidence in the cause. It appears to me that the court will be better able to appreciate the points of law after hearing the arguments of counsel upon the facts to the jury. It is not my wish, however, when the propositions of law are presented, after the argument to the jury has been closed on both sides, to cut off the counsel from discussing those points of law, if they think proper.

Mr. MERRICK. All I want to say is this, that I had supposed, understanding distinctly that your honor had indicated yesterday what you now more formally declare, namely, that it is your desire to hear a discussion of the facts with a view to the application of the principles of law before deciding the facts, that in discussing those facts counsel would bring forward their law and show their application to the facts.

The COURT. They can state their views of the law, of course, but I do not expect the argument to the jury to be interrupted by a formal argument of questions of law. The counsel will argue the facts with a view to their own points of law. As an exception, however, to the course that I proposed yesterday, the court did admit the presentation yesterday of one or two prayers which counsel for the defense thought were prayers that lay at the root of the case. I think I have disposed of those prayers. I heard an intimation of Mr. Davidge yesterday that there were some other of those radical questions that possibly might be presented for the consideration of the court this morning.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I was about bringing that to the attention of your honor. I concur in the views you have expressed that there are some matters that will be and must be enlightened by argument to the jury in advance of any ruling. At the same time all must concede, I think, that there are certain other matters, organic and fundamental in their nature, that can have no sort of light thrown upon them by any argument however able or however protracted. It seems to me that the very purpose of the prayers is to fix, as far as we can, in advance the lines of the case so as to enable the jury properly to apply the evidence and properly to apply the arguments of counsel upon the evidence. I do not see why there should be any departure from a practice which is calculated in that respect to help the trial of the cause, and I understood yesterday that the intimation of the court was that any other matter that counsel might desire to bring to the attention of the court, unless you thought it would not be enlightened by the argument of counsel, you would proceed to take up and consider in advance. Itold you yesterday, you will recollect, of a recent ruling of the Supreme Court that seemed to me to bring a point within the exceptional category referred to by your honor in your ruling. I suppose to-day the first thing to be done is to inform us as to the order of this argument and whether there are to be two closing speeches made to this jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to be heard one moment on that point before the court decides it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. After that, there is a matter identical in principle with the one discussed on yesterday, and I understand it is the wish of some of my brethren to discuss that question to the court, in view of the fact that it had a good deal of light thrown upon it by a recent decision of the Supreme Court. Whilst I am on my feet I may as well make one general remark. We have been trying this case for four months. The evidence is necessarily in a confused state on account of the time and on account of the character of the case. Your honor has felt and expressed more than once the impossibility in a case of this sort of keeping out all evidence that you would perhaps keep out if you knew all that is known to the officers of the Government. But you have said over and over again, "What am I to do? It may be connected. It may lead somewhere. It may, although insignificant and apparently absurd, turn out before we get through to have something in it." That is the condition of the evidence. Then, your honor has told us in regard to your rulings at the last trial, that whilst they would be regarded as authority, you would not regard yourself as absolutely bound by them. Now, in this confused state of the evidence, without any chart or compass, without a central point or a legal line being determined in advance, it is proposed to begin the argument. That argument it is my fear will produce still more confusion. If gentlemen speak as long as I apprehend they will speak—and I will not discriminate between sides—and if some two or three weeks are occupied in the argument, I do not know that the existing confusion is likely to be much clarified. Then we will have more confusion. Now, that is a bad time to bring in the prayers, I think. The mischief that would be guarded against by drawing the lines of the case in the beginning has all been done, and not only been done, but it is very difficult indeed to remove that mischief. Now, it would be particularly objectionable from our stand-point to allow, as your honor has intimated you would do, two opening speeches to the Government and two conclusions to the Government.

The COURT. Two summing up conclusions.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I mean two conclusions. Those two conclusions may cover two weeks. Heaven only knows where they will begin and where they will close.

The COURT. There are limits to everything, you know.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There are no limits to the star-route case.

The COURT. I mean to human endurance.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The only limit is there. The Government don't die. That is the trouble. The Government don't die, and we may.

The COURT. Its agents do.

Mr. DAVIDGE. But how easy to get other agents. You must recollect that the Government——

The COURT. [Interposing.] I would not allow new agents to come in here.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The Government holds out to its agents no ordinary inducements, as we have all heard, and I do not think there would be any difficulty in supplying the places of these gentlemen representing the Government if fate should be so unkind as to remove them from their present sphere of duty. At any rate we do protest against duplicating the forces of the Government in the advance guard and the forces of the Government in the rear guard; and I desire to ascertain the view of the court on that subject, in order that I may take an exception should the decision be adverse.

The COURT. The court is going to announce its decision.

Mr. MERRICK. I will say to your honor and Mr. Davidge—

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] One moment. I understand that you will announce your decision upon that subject. I will then ask that one proposition of law, which is independent wholly of the evidence, as will be many other propositions, if not concluded by what your honor is about to rule, may be argued. The argument will be only of an organic and fundamental character.

Mr. MERRICK. The remark I was about to make to your honor is simply this. I was going to state, and it becomes necessary to state, especially in view of Mr. Davidge's suggesting an exception to the ruling of the court, that what the Government now asks is that which is uniformly the practice in cases so elaborate and intricate as this, where there are so many counsel and so many parties, the privilege or the right of opening by two of its counsel. What the Government will ask when the time comes to close is not now brought directly before the court in such shape that there can be a formal ruling upon it, although of course the court can say for the information of counsel what it will do when that subject is formally brought before it.

The other suggestions of Mr. Davidge are in relation to a matter already considered and disposed of, except probably that as to the abstract prayer or the prayer in relation to an abstract principle of law of which he has spoken.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to say one word, if the court please, before any decision is made as to the order of argument. I understand that the custom was in England, or has been since England became somewhat civilized, to allow first the prosecution to state the case of the Government in one statement. I now say that I know of no reported case and never heard of one in any English court or any American court where there were two openings. After the opening had been made by the Government it was then the custom to call the witnesses, and then if the defendant called any witnesses he had the right to open after the prosecution had closed their case and before the defendant introduced any witnesses. The witnesses would then be examined, and after the examination of the witnesses closed the defendant would have a speech, and then the prosecution would close. In other words, there were allowed where there was but one defendant, in every English trial, and have been for many years, four speeches and no more, an opening speech for the Crown, an opening speech for the defendant, then another speech for the defendant after his evidence was in, and a reply by the Government. I have here a little work I happened to pick up this morning, entitled The History of the Criminal Law of England, by Stephen, and I find in the first volume of that a little parallel drawn upon the French and the English practice. I will read:

Now, in the French court after the witnesses have been examined the jury are addressed by the party, and the public minister and the prisoner in succession. But in England it is true the greatest possible number of speeches would be four, supposing the prisoner to call witnesses and to sum up as well as to open their evidence, and so to give the reply to the Crown.

Now, I find also by the statute of 28 and 29 Victoria, the counsel for the prosecution is authorized when the counsel for the defense introduced no evidence to sum up in a closing speech. So I imagine that before the passage of that law, if the defense interposed no evidence and the prosecution had opened, the prosecution did not have by custom the right to close.

The COURT. That is our practice here, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That seems to have been the law. Then I find further that in every case where the defendants have counsel each defendant and his counsel, respectively, is entitled to open the case, to examine witnesses, and to sum up the evidence, respectively, when the right of reply remains unaltered.

The COURT. Is that laid down there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It seems to be in the statute, but I suppose we must go by what the common law was before. Now, by our Constitution, of course every defendant has a right to be heard. The question then arises, what is the right at common law, or what was it? Now, unless some case can be found where some court some time allowed the Government two openings, I think we are entitled to draw the inference that two openings are not allowed, because I think every Government officer always takes whatever the law gives.

The COURT. If it is money, he does certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Consequently we have the right to say there is no such law, and never was any such law. Now, was there ever any such custom? I fail to find any such reported case. If, then, there never has been given to the Government two openings has the Government ever been allowed in a jury trial two closings? I defy the gentlemen of the prosecution to bring forward a case in this world in any court in the veins of which ran Anglo Saxon blood where two closing speeches have been given to the Government. Now, when a man is put upon his trial, with the power of the Government against him, with all its wealth, with its hydra hands and its argus eyes——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Briarean hands.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Briareus was the fellow with the hands I think and Argus was the chap with the eyes. Well, they are all in the employ of the Government. The Government is everywhere. The Government has unlimited means at its command. Now, to say that on the trial of a case the Government shall have the advantage; that the Government shall have not only one closing speech, but two, and these speeches, of course, be unlimited, is not right or fair. Why, if each defendant has the right to be heard, should not each defendant, after the evidence is closed, have the right to reply? It seems to me that the court here ought to follow the general custom of the common law that gives the Government one opening and that gives the Government one closing, and no more. It gives to each defendant the right to be heard, and the Constitution of the country gives the same right to each defendant. Now I think it of infinite importance to the Government, to the court, and to the cause of justice that there be no violation of law, no violation of custom, and no violation of propriety in the prosecution of any man.

Upon a trial only the other day in Ireland of a man indicted for murder the counsel for the Crown opened the case, the evidence for the Crown was heard, the evidence for the defense was heard, the case was closed, the jury retired and brought in a verdict of guilty, the man made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he was sentenced to be hanged. All this was done without the court even having taken a recess. Such a trial is a scandal. The idea that a man should be tried in that way, with no more thought, with no more consideration, with no more opportunity, is a scandal; and no matter how guilty a man may be the world feels as if it was the result of the action of a mob, although the mob happened to be in the form of a court. So in any criminal case, if the judge oversteps propriety, if he oversteps custom, if he violates law, and does it on the side of the Government, and does it against the citizen and against liberty, the whole world feels that a very dangerous precedent has been set. In this case I want these defendants tried exactly in accordance with the law. I want nothing given to the prosecution to which it is not entitled. I suppose if anybody is to close this case after it has been closed by the gentlemen who have tried it and who are acquainted with it, that that is to be the Attorney-General of the United States. Of all men he has the least right to close the case, because he has not tried it. He has not been here. Consequently his own sense of propriety should prevent his endeavoring to throw his office or his position in the scale against a defendant on trial. I take it for granted that he is the one who wishes to make the second closing speech.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor will allow me to interrupt the counsel upon a point of order, there is nothing in reference to the Attorney-General before the court.

The COURT. He is speaking on a hypothesis.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am saying suppose that is so, and the reason I suppose it is so is because it was attempted at the last trial.

The COURT. It was done, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. At the last trial he spoke.

Mr. MERRICK. He closed the case.

The COURT. He closed the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He came and closed the case, and while he was closing it I believe the court asked him a question, and he requested that Mr. Merrick be allowed to reply, and thereupon Mr. Wilson objected to Mr. Merrick's replying unless he, Mr. Wilson, was given an opportunity to answer Mr. Merrick. The court then held that the gentleman who was making the closing speech must make it, and that he could not call for volunteers.

Mr. WILSON. To help him out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. To help him out in the midst of that speech, however much he may have needed it. I take it for granted that he now wishes to reply. I have nothing to say against him personally, but I do say that it is not in good taste for him to offer to throw his position or his place in the scale against these defendants. He is the Attorney-General of the United States. Let him come here if he wishes and argue this case. If he wishes to close it he can do so, and of course we have no reply. If he thinks he is better capable of closing this case than the gentlemen who have tried it, let him close it and see what he can do. But if he wishes to make a speech in this case, I want him compelled to make it, if at the end, the closing speech, and not the second closing speech, or else make it somewhere where the defendants' counsel can reply to it. So I object, and I seriously object, to two opening speeches or to two closing speeches. I want this case tried exactly in accordance with the law and with the almost universal custom. I never in my life heard of such a thing as a case being opened by two attorneys or closed by two attorneys. If there can any such case be found, that might have some effect upon my judgment; but unless that case can be found, and unless it be so binding that this court will feel it obligatory as the law, then I beg the court not to do it. So far as I am concerned I do not wish to argue a case in that way. I would rather trust my case to the justice and to the sense of the jury after having heard the evidence than to go through a form of argument, and then allow two closing speeches on the part of the prosecution. Those speeches may be a week in length each, without the defendant having the right to reply. Each defendant must sit with a sealed mouth, and no matter what the torrent of abuse and misrepresentation may be, no answer is possible. I object to such a trial, and should consider it absolutely illegal; not a prosecution but a persecution.

Mr. WILSON. May it please your honor——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Well, now, this question was discussed all day yesterday and has been discussed again this morning. I thought it was understood that the court was to announce its decision this morning.

Mr. WILSON. I am unfortunate in coming in too late.

The COURT. Although the eloquence of counsel has magnified the question very much it seems to me, I do not think it is a matter of any very great importance. But important or otherwise it is a question within the discretion of the court with this exception: In a civil case, if the court refuses the party having the affirmative the right to open and close, it is error. In a criminal case, if the court were to commit an error of a corresponding kind, that is, if it were to refuse to the Government the right to open and close, there would be no error, because the Government has no writ of error in a criminal case.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It would be error, but there would be no remedy.

The COURT. No authorities say it is error.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

The COURT. Therefore, in the absence of another decision in the case, the decision in the court below must be taken as the law. It is conceded, and whether conceded or not it is the law, and it has always been the practice that in criminal prosecutions the Government has a right to open and close, and whatever arguments are to be presented on behalf of the prosecution must be presented either at the opening or at the close. That is, if the rules of practice are to control. At the last trial by agreement of counsel those rules were departed from. On this trial there has been no agreement reached on the part of counsel, so that the question will have to be determined by the court on its view of the practice and the law. The rule in regard to the Government is that its argument must be either at the opening or at the close. Counsel say that it is clear that but one closing argument on the part of the Government is to be allowed. What is the Government to do then in a case like this? Is it to have but one counsel to open?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think that is all it is entitled to under the law.

The COURT. If it is their liberty to have but one counsel to open and one to close, may the defense have any number of counsel?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. Only one for each defendant.

The COURT. There are five defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Only one for each defendant.

The COURT. Then you confine the Government to two arguments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And each defendant to only one.

The COURT. Each defendant to only one, but there are five in all, and they are jointly indicted. Some of the authorities say that the clients themselves have a right to be heard as well as counsel.

Mr. DAVIDGE. If they speak their counsel cannot.

The COURT. That might or might not be. I know that some of the judges have said so. I find a different intimation in some of the authorities that I have read.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think that each defendant has a right to speak and has the right to have one counsel. That would make two speeches for each defendant and two against them.

The COURT. It is a joint indictment. I am not prepared to acknowledge any such rule as that without some binding authority. I have never known any authority to the point that the Government in no case can have more than two arguments, one to open with and one to close with. In the case that I referred to yesterday, O'Connell's case in 11 Clark & Finnelly, which was a criminal case taken by writ of error to the House of Lords, where the question was discussed and considered, it seemed to be conceded that on the argument of the writ of error the Government might be heard by as many counsel as chose to speak in the opening, and nothing was said as to the closing either. I believe more than one counsel was heard in that case in closing. But it is argued that that was a case on appeal heard before the House of Lords. I do not see that that makes any difference in the principle. If the Government can be heard by more counsel than one in any case, one to open and one to close, then the court must decide, if the dispute arises, whether these additional counsel are to be heard at the opening or at the close, or both, or are to be divided between both. I think myself that according to our provincial practice here—and that may be taken as some evidence of the law—that there is but one counsel to be heard in reply on the part of the Government; but I cannot concede at all that the Government is to be cut off as to the opening of the argument in summing up. I think the Government is not to be limited to two counsel. If the Government is to be allowed to have three counsel, and but one can be heard in reply, then the other two may be heard at the opening, because there is no intermediate place for them. The Government counsel must be heard either at the opening or in the reply, and I am not willing to adopt a rule which will limit the Government to two counsel simply. I do not see much sense in a rule which would limit the Government to one counsel in reply either, because what difference does it make in point of fact whether two counsel speak four hours or one counsel speaks four hours?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Two may speak eight.

The COURT. The time would be within the control of the court. But that is aside from the question. I shall hold now, and you may accept this as your notice, that the Government are permitted in the summing up to be heard by as many counsel as it chooses.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is in what is called the opening.

The COURT. That is in the opening; but it is limited in the closing argument in reply to one counsel. I do that because I see no intermediate place for Government counsel in the argument between the one end and the other.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to that.

The COURT. I think I ought to say a word about the Attorney-General.

Mr. MERRICK. It may be that there will be a request for two closing arguments upon that point.

The COURT. I have not seen the Attorney-General participating in the trial, and he has given no information that he desired to be heard; and although he was heard at the last trial, the court cannot presume that he will desire to be heard on this. Therefore, I pass upon this question without regard to the Attorney-General. But I wish to say one word in regard to some observations that fell from Mr. Ingersoll yesterday as to the Attorney-General descending, as it were, upon the court-room and bringing with him all the majesty of the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not use the word "descending."

The COURT. I know, but that was the idea.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; it was this: That when he did not know a thing about the case, to come here and put his office in the scale. That was it.

The COURT. That is it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not say "descending."

The COURT. I did not take the trouble to quote you exactly, but I thought that was the idea.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, no.

The COURT. That he was coming here with the authority of his great office.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; with his office.

The COURT. And for the purpose of influencing the jury by that kind of personal authority.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By the position.

The COURT. By the position. I do not think there is much to be deprecated on that account. The Government itself is here. The Government is prosecuting, and if the Attorney-General should see proper to appear in court and partake in the prosecution of a Government case there would be nothing improper in it in the world. It is very often done in England; it is the practice in the States; and the reason it has fallen into desuetude in a great measure, is that the Attorneys-General have such a multiplicity of duties to attend to; they cannot even argue cases in which the United States is interested, for that reason, and they have their assistants to argue most of the cases in the Supreme Court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want to be misunderstood. It was his coming here to make a second closing speech that I objected to. I said I did not object to his coming here to make the closing speech, there being but one. But I would have no objection to his making any other speech in the case. In fact, I would contribute liberally to have him come and make a speech in the case, if we can reply to it.

The COURT. Then there is no foundation really for your remarks in regard to bringing here the authority of his office.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say for a second closing speech.

The COURT. If he made one closing speech he would have the authority of his office here with him. But I think that is rather a wind-mill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I think he is.

The COURT. No; I meant to say that it was a wind-mill which you had built yourself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, I understand.

The COURT. Now, there is one other thing I want to say: The course of a trial in this country is different from that in England, and the description of an English trial, as given by Colonel Ingersoll, is erroneous, in my judgment. There the government evidence is produced, and they pass through the testimony on the part of the government after an opening by counsel. At the close of the government's testimony the counsel for defense has an opportunity to comment upon the evidence for the government, and to comment upon what they expect to prove. And that is the only chance which the defendant has.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all he has.

The COURT. He has nothing to say except at that place. After he has replied to the government counsel and commented upon the government evidence, and commented also upon the evidence for the defense which he expects to introduce, that is the only speech he has to make. They proceed then to examine the witnesses for the defense, if there are any. After those witnesses have been examined, the government replies upon the whole case. The counsel for the defense have no hearing except between the evidence for the government and the evidence for the defense.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That used to be so, but it is not so now.

The COURT. It is the common-law practice, and if they have changed it there by modern statutes I do not know it. I think it was the practice in the recent trials in Dublin, and that may account, possibly, for the expedition with which those cases were tried.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. I read from Stephen's Criminal Law, recently published, in which it is distinctly stated that the defendant's counsel, if he examines any witnesses, has a right to make another speech.

The COURT. No; the point is this: If the defense calls no witnesses, then counsel for the Government have no reply.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But he has now.

The COURT. But if the defense calls witnesses, even as to character, it gives the Government the right to reply upon the whole case. And I have the authority lying open before me to that effect.

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor——

The COURT. [Interposing.] I will say, then——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I thought your honor had finished.

The COURT. I will say, then, that the Government in this case will be entitled to have as many counsel speak in the opening as it chooses, but they will be limited to one reply.

Mr. MERRICK. With reference to the reply, as I said before, your honor, I shall bring that question up, should it become necessary, at the proper time, which I do not deem this to be.

I do deem it proper to make a remark or two in reply to the insinuation and sneering observations that have been thrown out in reference to the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General has not appeared in this case in court, as he did when the case was tried before, for the reason that this case has been tried during a period of greater activity in the political and executive functions of his office. This trial commenced coincident with the opening of the session of Congress, and has outlived the Congress. The other trial began in June and was continued down to the middle of September. But the Attorney-General has followed this case; and to say that he knows nothing about it is to say what is entirely erroneous, and I presume the remark was made by the counsel without any knowledge upon his part of what the Attorney-General does know. He has followed it with the record and has taken the most profound and deepest interest in the entire case, and still takes that deep interest in the entire case which a public officer seeking to accomplish the ends of justice ought to take in such a case as this. What his personal desire is in reference to participating in the argument I am not informed, for this reason: That for several days past, until yesterday, when he returned, the Attorney-General has been, I think, on the seashore, compelled to be there by reason of the condition of his health. Before he left, the question of his participation in the case was postponed to a future day, and since that time, by reason of that absence, I have had no opportunity of a further talk with him upon the subject.

The COURT. Well, Mr. Merrick, when we come to that point in the trial, if you desire the court to reconsider, you will have to make a motion to that effect.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; certainly.

The COURT. For the present, the understanding is——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I do not want to say anything about the Attorney-General, and I now admit that he knows this record by heart. I do not want any feeling in regard to it.

Mr. MERRICK. That is about as near correct as your other statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have seen lights there as late as 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, and I have no doubt he has been reading it until that time.

Mr. MERRICK. Let us go on with the case. They tried to displace one Attorney-General to get rid of the case, and they are now trying to get rid of another to carry it through.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will see what sort of a bonfire he has built.

The COURT. Are you now ready to go to the jury, gentlemen? Judge Wilson, have you any new questions that you want the court to pass upon at this time? I regard the question that was discussed yesterday as disposed of.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We would like to except to the ruling of the court allowing two counsel for the Government to open. We understand the question is definitively settled.

Mr. MERRICK. You have just told us it was not definitely settled.

The COURT. The court has made a ruling as to the order of the arguments. Now, the court cannot make a ruling which is like the laws of the Medes and Persians, never to be revised. As long as this term lasts, any ruling of the court is subject to reconsideration.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I would suppose there might be a ruling which would not be changed, as we have to act upon it.

Mr. MERRICK. Can your honor rule until I bring forward my motion?

The COURT. The thing is settled for the present, certainly. Whether it would be opened on motion is another question; and I cannot make a ruling now that counsel shall be prohibited forever from making a motion.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I did not ask anything of the kind. I only desired to know whether the point was settled. I understand that there might be peculiar and remarkable circumstances to induce the court to modify the ruling somewhat. But I understand that ruling to be absolute, with the light now before the court.

The COURT. Oh, yes; I would not change it unless for good cause shown hereafter.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask if the court is not willing to make its ruling absolute now, or after counsel for the Government have made their opening? Will not the court advise them as to what the further progress of the argument is to be? Because, if your honor please——

The COURT. [Interposing.] The court would not change its ruling without ample notice.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that notice ought to be given before we enter upon our argument. I do not propose, if your honor please, so far as I am concerned, to enter upon the argument of this case to this jury at all leaving it in doubt as to whether or not, after Mr. Merrick gets through, the Attorney-General may come in here and make a further argument. I want to know before the beginning of the argument for the defense whether that kind of thing is to be done or not. And what I was going to refer to when I rose a while ago, and your honor declined to hear me, grew out of a remark that was made by Mr. Merrick where he interrupted and suggested that when the time came to make an application for a further hearing that would be time enough to settle this question. I want to settle it now, because it will affect my course very much, as at present advised, if I know before the argument commences on behalf of the defense that this extraordinary practice of two closing speeches is to be permitted.

Mr. MERRICK. Before your honor makes any decision about that allow me to say that I think that the most extraordinary practice that ever has been suggested in the course of this case is now suggested by counsel upon the other side. He asks the court to make a ruling, upon which, I suppose, the court ought to give a penal bond that it will never depart from under any circumstances. He asks the court to make a ruling in anticipation of an event not yet arisen. I will give an illustration of it: When Mr. Dorsey was on the stand I examined him about certain telegrams that he sent from New York to Rerdell. I did not ask him the contents. I proposed to rebut his testimony by proving the contents by other and, in my judgment, more reliable witnesses. Suppose I had risen in my place and said to the court, "Now will your honor please tell me whether or not, in the event that, when I come to rebut, if I do not ask Dorsey now what is in those telegams, can I prove what is in them, or am I bound to ask him what is in them now?" Such questions must be decided by the court in their order as they arise; and when I bring forward a motion hereafter, should I do so, then will be the time for the final decision. I have stated my reason why I do not do so now, because I have not consulted with the Attorney-General. The motion now, which your honor has decided, is that two counsel for the Government may open. Counsel, under all circumstances, must take their choice in the trial of the case according to their judgment of what is the law and practice, and cannot require the court to anticipate conditions before conditions exist.

The COURT. It is a very common practice in courts for the court to announce before the argument opens in what order the arguments shall be received.

Mr. MERRICK. That you have done, but that does not satisfy them.

The COURT. To that extent I have gone, and I shall stand by it until good reason be shown to the contrary.

Mr. DAVIDGE. So I understand. You have ruled that under existing considerations.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Ker, I believe you have the opening.

Mr. MERRICK. Shall we proceed before recess?

The COURT. Oh, yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Counsel will have to speak with his back to the court.

The COURT. Yes. I do not expect to be addressed much by the counsel.

Opening argument of

to the jury on behalf of the Government.

With submission to the court, gentlemen of the jury, I have been selected to open this case on behalf of the Government. The testimony now has run through 4480 and odd pages, all recorded in these different books that you see lying on the table, and it is my duty to take from the mass of this testimony, in a clear and concise manner, and as fully as is possible, the testimony that bears upon this case and bring it before your vision and into your recollection, so that you will know and understand that which the Government alleges and which the Government has proved, and that which has been shown contrary to the case of the Government.

Now, in the first place, let us see whom you are trying, and what the charge is. The indictment in this case is contained in this book, which I now hold in my hand, and the charges are against John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, Stephen W. Dorsey, Harvey M. Vaile, Montfort C. Rerdell, Thomas J. Brady, and William H. Turner. Some of these people are not on trial, and therefore you will have nothing to do with them, excepting as their names appear in the testimony. Now let me give you the names of those with whom you will have nothing at all to do in order that you may thoroughly understand whom you are to try. John M. Peck, you have heard incidentally, and I believe it was testified on the stand to the best of Mr. Dorsey's not very good recollection, died somewhere about September, 1881, therefore he is not in the case. Rerdell started in the case, but has pleaded guilty, and therefore you have nothing at all to do with him. Turner is not in this case; you have heard also incidentally regarding him; it is not necessary for me to repeat why he is not in the case, but it is sufficient for you to know that he is not here and not on trial. That brings the case down to the five people that you are to try, John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, Stephen W. Dorsey, Harvey M. Vaile, and Thomas J. Brady.

The indictment in this case charges these people with conspiracy, a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. I do not want to waste time or to weary you with reading the indictment, but I will state the subject of it so that you may understand the Government's allegations. The first is that there were certain contracts given to Miner, given to John W. Dorsey, and given to John M. Peck, those three men having contracts from the United States that were taken under a letting that went into effect on the 1st day of July, 1878; that after they had these contracts there was a combination, an agreement, between all these people that they were to do certain things in order to get at the public Treasury and get more money. One of the allegations is that they were to get up petitions, and that they were to get people to sign them; they were to get letters, and these letters and petitions were to have, in some cases, fictitious names upon them, as they are called, names of people that were supposed to reside upon the routes, but who really did not reside there; that those petitions were to be gotten up and were to be forwarded to the Post-Office Department, and then were to be placed among the papers there relating and pertaining to the different post routes. The object of these petitions was to deceive the Postmaster-General, so that if he looked at the cases that were made up and the orders for expedition and for increase of trips, he would suppose that a multitude of people upon those routes had demanded this increase, and therefore it became a necessity to grant the petitions.

The next thing that is alleged against them is that they were to get up false affidavits; those affidavits were to falsely state the number of men and animals then actually in use, and falsely to state the number of men and animals that would be required if the service was increased and if it was expedited; these affidavits were also to be placed upon file in the department along with the papers in the case. Those affidavits were to be used by Thomas J. Brady when he made the order for increase and for expedition. They were to be, as it were, the basis upon which he acted. And the falsity of them was of such a character that, the more men and animals that were sworn to, the greater the amount of money that would come out of the public Treasury.

And in addition to those false petitions and false affidavits there were to be subcontracts made, and those subcontracts were to be filed in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and by him certified to the Auditor of the Treasury, so that the person putting in these false subcontracts or these fraudulent contracts would be enabled to draw the money. I use the term "fraudulent," because anything that is contrary to the right of any other person is a fraud. These subcontracts were to be placed in the Post-Office Department, and certified to the Auditor as a part of the fraud, against the rights of the actual subcontractors who were entitled under the law to draw their pay.

And lastly, Mr. Brady was to make the orders increasing the trips and reducing the time upon which the mail was to be carried, and to allow to the contractors large sums of money on account of the increased trips and on account of the expedition, when, in point of fact, such increase and expedition was not needed at all, and when, in point of fact, it was done for the benefit and advantage of the people who were in this combination.

Now, gentlemen, the charge is a conspiracy, and that is a matter that requires a legal definition. I have no idea of usurping the position of his honor on the bench. The law giving him the right to explain and expound to you, and to the counsel on the other side, and to me what is the law in the case, I do not propose to usurp the judge's function in that matter. But I am compelled to read the law to you. At the proper time the judge will give it the proper interpretation, and you are morally bound to take his interpretation of the law.

These men have pleaded to this indictment "Not guilty." A jury has been called and selected. The jury come from the mass of the people. In olden times when a man was arraigned he was called upon to hold up his hand, and the clerk of the court read the indictment to him, and he was asked, "How say you; are you guilty, or not guilty?" If he had nothing to say he would say, "I am guilty," or, "I will not contend."

In either case it was taken to be a plea of guilty, requiring no further testimony and no trial. But when he said "Not guilty," then the clerk said to the alleged criminal brought before the bar of the court, "How will you be tried?" And, prompted by his counsel, he would say, "By God and my country." And the clerk would repeat, "May God send you a safe deliverance." That was the old way of trying a criminal, but it has been altered somewhat, and in some respects the old formality is not gone through with. But every man who comes into this court to be tried is to be tried by God and his country, and you are the country. You have been selected from the mass of the people, as I said, to represent them, and you have been brought here, the representatives of the entire community, and you have been interrogated as to your fitness, and you have answered those interrogatories properly. You were sworn "well and truly to try this case, and a true verdict to render, according to the evidence." The obligation that you tacitly assented to was the most sacred and the most binding obligation that you could take. And you took your seats in the jury-box with your minds unbiased, prepared to hear the evidence, with manly hearts, and clear, unclouded minds, fully resolved to do your full and entire duty; and no entreaty, no sympathy, no false claim should step between you and the duty that you so sacredly undertook. And, gentlemen, I know it will not. You will do your full and entire duty, as you were sworn to do, as his honor is sworn to do, as I am sworn to do, as we are all sworn to do in this case.

Now, here are the allegations, the preparation and the beginning of the trial.

Gentlemen, there are some things that I must weary you with a little. Congress has passed certain laws to guide the Postmaster-General in the conduct and management of the business of the Post-Office Department and these laws are of just as binding effect upon the Post-Office Department and the post-office officials and the people of the United States as a law that would be passed prohibiting one man from murdering another. It is the law of the land, and as long as it is the law of the land, every good, true, honest, law-abiding citizen must obey that law. Now, I told you that I did not want to interpret that law. Neither will I. I am going to leave that entirely to his honor. But I propose to read a few small extracts so that you will see when I come to state these facts just how the law was violated. And if I am wrong in my interpretation, I know that his honor will correct me, because the judge is here to do equal justice between both parties, and he, like yourselves, is entirely unbiased.

If the court makes a mistake in the law, then in that case it is easily remedied, because it goes to a higher court composed of gentlemen who are versed in the law, and whatever mistake the judge makes is corrected. If I make a mistake his honor corrects me. If the counsel on the other side make a mistake the court corrects them. You will be told by the counsel on the other side, no doubt—because I have not been with them for a year without knowing something about them—that you are the judges of the law and the facts. Now, that is true. You are the judges of the law and facts. When his honor says to you that such and such is the law, you take it and you apply the law to the facts. But it does not mean that you shall set yourselves up against the court, and assume to be lawyers when you are not. It means that you will take the law as the court gives it to you. And that, I say, you are morally bound to do. And if, by any mischance, gentlemen, or any misfortune, you were to make a mistake in your application of the law, if you decide wrongfully against these defendants, the remedy is in the hands of the court, and the court can do even justice by upsetting your verdict. But if you say that they are not guilty, though they may be the most guilty people who ever existed, there is no power upon earth that can right that great wrong. Now, do not forget that when you come to apply the law and the facts to the case. When the jury say that the defendants are not guilty they can never be retried. The verdict cannot be set aside. There can be nothing done but to accept that verdict, no matter how infamous it may be—just like the verdict rendered in a recent murder case in Pennsylvania, where a man shot the father of the girl whose character he had traduced. An ignorant jury rendered a verdict of not guilty, and received the anathemas of the entire country. There is no redress, none whatever. But if there is a mistake made on the other side, then it is in the hands of the court, and the court always grants a new trial where the evidence has been disregarded, or where the law has been misapplied.

In the first place, gentlemen, I would like to call your attention to one point in this case, and that is the matter of dates. They become a little important. Now, I do not think that there is anybody in the entire community or country that would suppose that twelve gentlemen, called from their usual places of business and brought here to engage in a trial of such length and importance, would retain every particle of testimony that has been given, would remember the dates, would remember the facts, would remember the names. It is beyond the bounds of human intelligence, and beyond reasonable probability. And, therefore, I say to you, if there is anything you want to know about the case as I go along, if there is any fact you want explained, if there is any date you want, if there are any figures you want, do not hesitate to get up and ask. It is your right to do it; it is your duty to do it; because you cannot decide this case intelligently without you know every fact and circumstance. And it will be no reflection upon your intelligence if you get up and ask, because I venture to say there is not a gentleman on this jury—and I know there are some with a great deal of intelligence—who would be able to carry all the facts and dates in his head. I think it is a mark of intelligence when a man gets up and says, “I want to know this circumstance, and I want to know that.” Do not hesitate to do it, because you are the judges of the facts, and you are the ones that are to apply them.

Now, the advertisements are given out in a little book of this shape [exhibiting book], which has been offered in evidence. The routes are known by numbers. This advertisement was published on the 1st day of November, 1877, and it says here that they want bids or proposals to carry the mails in different States and Territories. It says:

Proposals will be received until 2 o'clock p. m., February 2, 1878.

Remember, they are to carry the mail four years from the 1st of July, 1878. That, of course, would be up to the 30th day of June, 1882. After these proposals were put in, in February, then decisions would be announced on or before March 30, 1878:

New contracts to be filed in the department, duly executed, on or before June 1, 1878.

In point of fact, the department got through with this business more rapidly, I suppose, than they had made any calculation for, and they awarded these contracts so that the contracts in question were given to these people on the 15th day of March, 1878, and therefore they had from that date up to the 1st of July to go around the country and try to put the service on.

There has been some testimony in this case as to the number of routes that these people got, and I think Mr. Dorsey or somebody testified that they got one hundred and thirty-four routes. Of that one hundred and thirty-four, I suppose, in the usual course of business, some were discontinued, and those are done with entirely. At all events, we know that Mr. Boone got a lot of them from John W. Dorsey, and I suppose that brought the whole thing down to somewhere in the neighborhood of one hundred routes that were held by these people. And out of these one hundred routes we have selected nineteen as specimens; as the saying is, they are “specimen bricks.” And if the others were as bad as these, they must be bad enough. But we never expected to get a jury in the wide world that would try one hundred of them, and therefore we took these specimens and give them to the jury.

Now the first of these post-office laws is that—

The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law, as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

Congress says that there shall be certain post routes. The First Assistant Postmaster-General establishes the offices on the routes. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General provides for carrying the mail from one post-office to the other. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General pays for the service. There you get the duties of the three assistants. Congress says, for instance, there shall be a route from here to Baltimore. The First Assistant Postmaster-General says that there shall be a post-office established at a certain place, where there may be only two or three houses. He sends that to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General then provides for carrying the mail to that office, either by what is called a side supply, or altering a route so as to run to that new post-office, or in some way; and the Third Assistant Postmaster-General pays for doing all that. Now this says "the Postmaster-General shall provide." Of course he is the superior of all of them, just as the Attorney-General is our superior in this case. There is a qualification attached to that, gentlemen, that has been repeated to you so often, yet I must bring it before you again in this connection:

As often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

Now he has a discretion in that matter. He may put the service on there as often as he thinks proper, with this limitation: that he must have due regard to "productiveness and other circumstances." He cannot put on a short schedule and pay $40,000 or $50,000 for carrying the mail to a post-office that yields only $15 or $20 a year in the way of revenue. Productiveness is the main thing, and "other circumstances" might be something else; for instance, a sudden outbreak, or war, or something of that sort, that would require the mail to be carried in quicker time. For instance, an office only pays $14 a year, and $20 is paid to carry the mail. That is another circumstance. He ought to regard that and not order six trips a week at a cost of $120.

There is another clause, saying:

The Postmaster-General may enter into contracts for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, and, as a compensation for carrying the mail under such contracts, may allow not exceeding two-thirds of the salary paid to the postmaster at such special post-offices.

You know he has to advertise the route so as to get the lowest bidder, and then he has to give it to the lowest bidder. Suppose there is an office established afterwards. Then this act provides that he shall enter into a contract for carrying the mail, but that that contract shall not exceed two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster. You see how Congress has taken care to prevent anything like extravagance. He shall not make a contract that shall exceed two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster. If the postmaster was to get $20, the pay for carrying the mail from that post-office could be only two-thirds of the postmaster's salary—a little over $13.

Another clause was enacted by Congress:

Compensation for additional service shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service; and when such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department, and no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

That seems to be complicated, but when we read it two or three times, we get the exact meaning of it without any trouble. If the service is one trip a week, and the pay was $300 for that trip, if he wants to make it two trips, he has to put it at $600, because twice three is six. If he wants to make it three trips he has to allow $900. He shall not allow more than the price paid for trips, because for the trips he must not make an allowance different from the amount in the original contract. Now there is another law, that "whenever he makes an order for extra trips, the amount must be specified in the order," and I will show you hereafter how Mr. Brady has studiously disregarded this law. The laws were not made for Thomas J. Brady. I will show you at the proper time where he disregarded the command of Congress, that "no compensation should be allowed for any service rendered before the time the order was made." I will show you where Mr. Brady disregarded these plain commands of the law :

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in an original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

Now, gentlemen, I do not expect any one of you to comprehend this unless you fall back upon your knowledge of the rule of three; but I will try and give it to you in plain English. When Brady wanted to shorten the time that was what was called "expedition." Expedition, of course, means to hurry up. In that case he was not to allow any additional compensation unless by shortening the time it required more men and animals. Now remember, if the service was one trip a week, at $300, and it was made two trips, the price would be $600. The contractor is required to have all the animals necessary to make the two trips. He gets no allowance for the animals; but simply doubling the trips doubles the price. But suppose the time is fifteen hours, and it is reduced to ten hours. In that case he cannot charge for carrying the mail in ten hours unless it takes more men and animals to carry it in the quicker time. The Second Assistant can make the order to shorten the time from fifteen hours to ten, and if the contractor does not like it he can throw his contract up. No order can be made for additional pay unless it takes more men and more animals to carry the mail. Now, it is important for you to bear in mind the difference between adding trips and shortening time. Of course there might be times in which the mail would become very heavy. It is divided into different classes, first, second, third, and fourth, as I suppose most of you know, first class being letters. I do not want to specify the classes further, for I might make a mistake. I will leave that to be defined hereafter. Congress has provided by law for all that. They send boots and shoes through the mail, as they are allowed to when the weight does not exceed four pounds. Nothing weighing over four pounds can be sent. There are a great many curious things going through the mail, and in order that letters should not be detained Congress made this law :

When the amount of mail matter to be carried on any mail route is so great as to retard the progress or endanger the security of the letter mail or materially increase the cost of carriage at the ordinary rate of speed, the Postmaster-General may provide for the separate carriage of the letter mail at the usual rate of speed, and the other mail matter shall not be delayed any more than is absolutely necessary, having due regard to the cost of expedition and the means at his disposal for effecting the same.

Now, when there is a large, bulky mail like that on the Tres Alamos and Clifton route, and that on the Ojo Caliente route, where they sent boots and shoes to the soldiers and other things of that kind, the law provides that it shall not all be expedited and shall not all be carried as letters are carried, but the Postmaster-General may make a contract for carrying the express matter, because it is no more than matter that ought to go by express. He is to make a separate contract for that and he is to have due regard for the cost of the service. He is not at liberty to make whatever arrangement he pleases, but he must make it with due regard to the cost. It so states here. Everywhere Congress says it is to be with due regard to the cost. Every act has that in it.

Now, gentlemen, it has been told to you here that in the year 1879, which was the year that Mr. Brady flourished, on the 6th of December, he sent a communication to the Postmaster-General. I do not want to wrong him. I will just read a portion of it from page 555:

DECEMBER 6, 1879.

HON. D. M. KEY, Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to state that the appropriation for inland mail transportation on star routes for the current fiscal year—

The current fiscal year, or current money year. The money year begins on the 1st of July. Therefore when he, in December, 1879, speaks of the current fiscal year he means the year that began on the 1st of July, 1879—has proved insufficient to meet the wants of the rapidly-growing service.

The annual cost of the service now in operation is $7,620,004, while the appropriation is but $5,900,000.

When he went to Congress and asked the appropriation, it was his doing. He was the man who got up the estimate, and Congress gave him every dollar he asked for, $5,900,000. Now, he says the amount has been brought up to $7,620,004. From July to December he had raised the amount about two million dollars.

Not only will the present appropriation allow no increase of mail facilities during the year, but it will be necessary to curtail the existing service in order to bring its cost within the appropriation.

Believing that this cannot be done without great injury to many deserving communities, and further, that pressing necessity exists for increased service in many places, I venture to suggest a method of relief.

Now, gentlemen, just watch Mr. Brady's mode of relief:

During the four fiscal years last past—

That is, the four years from 1876 to 1879—

viz, 1876-1879, there has been covered back into the Treasury of unexpended balances of appropriations for inland mail transportation $3,965,468.27.

Remember that, gentlemen. For four years before Brady wrote this letter the Post-Office Department had not used the money that was appropriated for it. On the contrary, out of the appropriation they had saved nearly $4,000,000, nearly a million a year less than Congress gave them.

In view of this fact, I have the honor to request your recommendation to Congress that about one-half this amount, say $2,000,000, be re-appropriated for mail transportation on star routes.

Now, do you see Mr. Brady's modest request; in 1879, after he had engaged in these conspiracies, and when he was making these excessive orders, he sends to Congress and asks that about one-half of the four millions that had been saved be given to him in order that he should use it in the way he was then doing.

This will enable the department to maintain the present service, and besides, afford a margin for reasonable and necessary increase during the remaining half of the fiscal year.

During the remaining half of this year! Gentlemen, that communication was sent to the Postmaster-General, and the Postmaster-General forwarded it to Congress. The members of Congress looked at it and rubbed their eyes and appointed an investigating committee. This investigating committee met in January, 1880. Mr. Blackburn was the chairman of that committee. I do not wish you to get this committee mixed up with the other committee. You see there were two investigations. In 1878 Congress investigated these very routes, and Brady said because Congress was investigating these routes in 1878, even then it was supposed there was a fraud somewhere, and because of that investigation he did not compel them to put the service on; that they could not be before Congress and away out in the country fixing up the routes at the same time. Gentlemen, that investigation was made immediately after the contracts were awarded. It was known that there was something wrong, and Congress undertook to investigate it. Because you have not the report I will not in fairness to them say what Congress did, or what the character of the testimony was, or what the character of the report was. I wish I had the opportunity to tell you all about it.

Mr. WILSON. I will put them both in evidence if you want them.

Mr. KER. When your turn comes I will sit down and listen to you.

Mr. WILSON. You may have them both in evidence if you want them now.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He does not want them.

Mr. KER. Now, this committee of Congress met, and Brady was brought before it and Miner was brought before it and, I think, John W. Dorsey and Stephen W. Dorsey. I do not know how many were brought before it. The report was not offered in evidence, but they told you about it on the witness stand. Brady said, "I was investigated by Congress and I was vindicated." Gentlemen, he got a certificate of good character from Congress. I am going to read you that certificate. After Congress has investigated——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] You will not get through before recess, I presume.

Mr. KER. You can go, and I will go on until I finish reading this certificate. You know how hard it is for a man to stop when he once gets started. It is like a locomotive on a down grade.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I did not intend to interrupt you.

Mr. KER. I will read this before we take our recess. It is within ten minutes of the time anyhow. This certificate is found on page 3484. You remember Brady asked for $2,000,000. The committee made a report to Congress after their investigation and found out what was what, and then Congress resolved——

That the sum of eleven hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year. During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made. * * *

They gave him the $1,100,000 and they told him that for the balance of the year there should be no more expedition. They set their veto upon that. But that was not the certificate of good character. Here it is:

Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed to affect the validity or legality of the acts or omission of any officer of the United States, or to affect any proceeding therefor.

In the very same act they said: "Whatever you have done, whatever any of you people have done or have omitted to do, you are not absolved from by this act of Congress, but you can be punished therefor." They knew there was fraudulent work somewhere. They did not get right down to it. They had not the means, in a short investigation, of finding it all out, but they knew there was something wrong there and in this act they said "Mr. Brady, when we pass this law you are not absolved from punishment for what you have done." That was Mr. Brady's certificate of good character; an elegant one for Congress to make for a man then in the height of his power. But, again, they went a little further in that same act of Congress. (What I read will be found on page 515 of the Revised Statutes.) It is part of the same chapter, 48:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service, under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

Now, gentlemen, they say that on any contracts now in existence and on any contract that may hereafter be made the Postmaster-General shall never have the power to expedite; that is, to shorten the time and to allow for shortening the time a greater sum than 50 per cent. of the original contract price. If the original price is $300 he cannot expedite the route for more than $150, or one half. I want you to bear that in mind, for I will show you that the laws, as I said before, were never made for Thomas J. Brady, and that he boldly and defiantly expedited and increased in disregard of this law.

Now, if your honor will take a recess, I am ready. I can go on, but Mr. Davidge has gone away, and I think he wants to hear me.

The COURT. If you desire we will adjourn now.

Mr. KER. I will do just as your honor says. I can go on.

The COURT. Go on, then, until 1 o'clock. You must not stop when Mr. Davidge goes out.

Mr. KER. There is another clause. You know that the contractor when he enters into the mail service is bound to take an oath. No man can serve as a mail carrier without taking an oath any more than a man can serve as a Government employé without taking an oath. Everybody is bound to do that. It was found that the subcontractors were being cheated, and in order to meet this difficulty a law was passed allowing the subcontractors to file their subcontracts. Now, gentlemen, when a subcontract is filed it must be certified by a postmaster, and in addition to that it must have attached to it the oath of the subcontractor. If you take a mail route and want to have the mail carried every man who drives a team for you or handles the mail for you must take the oath. If you are contractor you must take it, and if you are subcontractor you must take it. This applies to the subcontracts of Stephen W. Dorsey, of Vaile, of Rerdell, and of all these people who filed their subcontracts which this bill of indictment says were unlawful subcontracts and a fraud. It was unlawful because Brady accepted the subcontracts without the contractor taking the oath. It was fraudulent because it was meant to cut out the subcontractors. Brady did not send those subcontracts up to the Auditor of the Treasury so that somebody else could look at them, but he kept them in his office and certified that Vaile, or Miner, or John W. Dorsey, or Stephen Dorsey had filed in his office subcontracts according to law, when in point of fact they were not filed according to law at all; but, of course the Auditor knew nothing better, and he allowed the pay to go to whoever Brady certified was to receive it. Now, gentlemen, these are statements of what the law is. There may be others that it will become necessary to refer to from time to time, but I have given you a general outline of what Congress commanded and required, and of what ought to have been Brady's guide and what he had no right to disregard. I will show you at the proper time that he willfully and without any care at all disregarded these commands in making his orders.

The COURT. Now we will take a recess.

At this point (1 p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. Shall I go on?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN (a juror). Might I ask a question first?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I think the other jurors would like the question asked for them, too. In the evening session, from half past 1 to 4, could there not be a little intermission of five or ten minutes about half way between the time of reassembling and the adjournment? Sitting still for two and a half hours is a long stretch.

The COURT. If any of you desire to go out, and will so intimate, the court will stop for that purpose.

Mr. MERRICK. Intimate it at the time.

Mr. GREEN. It is just to make a break in a long afternoon; that is all.

Mr. KER. As I told you this morning, gentlemen, the charge is that of conspiracy. Now, a conspiracy is defined to be an agreement. It is an agreement to commit an unlawful act or a crime, or it is an agreement to do something that is lawful by the use of unlawful means. Perhaps I can bring it more clearly to your minds by the use of a few illustrations. Suppose that either of you gentlemen were keeping a store and having for sale a lot of goods, and were behind the counter, and a man entered the place and said he wanted to see some of your goods and called for a particular article. Suppose you got it down and commenced to show it to him, and while you were showing the goods to that man another man came in and said, "I am in a great hurry, and I want to get a certain article," mentioning it, and you left the first man and went off and waited upon the second man, and the first man, profiting by that opportunity, picked up a part of the goods and slipped out of the store when you were not watching. Now, those two men did not speak together in your presence. There was no conversation between them that you heard, and yet it was only a ruse on the part of one to give the other an opportunity to steal. Would not you say immediately, would not any sensible man say immediately, "Why, these people conspired together to rob me." That would be the natural conclusion, that one was aiding the other, and that there was an agreement between them. The facts and the circumstances show that there had been some preconcerted action or some agreement between them. Of course people that conspire together very seldom meet and discuss what they are going to do or how they are going to do it. As a general rule the conspiracy is shown from the circumstances of the case. It is not on every occasion that you can get a witness to say, "I went there and heard these people arrange this plan," but your knowledge of human nature and your knowledge of how people act will dictate to you that from the circumstances of the case there was a concert of action, a combination and agreement, between them, showing that their minds were running in one channel. Suppose, for instance, that a man is going along the street, a second man comes up to him, and a third is standing close by, and nothing is said at all, but the second only makes a motion and immediately the last two close in upon the man who is passing along the street, one jostles against him and the other picks his pocket. Certainly they did not agree to do that according to the usual acceptation of the term "agreement," but there is not any sensible man who would not say that those two men conspired together to rob. Their minds ran in the same channel. Take another illustration. Suppose a man wants to cheat an insurance company, and to take out a policy of insurance upon the life of a man when he knows that the man whose life he wants to insure is about to die. He sends a blank form of policy of insurance away off to a third man who lives somewhere else, and that man makes all the answers that are required, the policy of insurance is returned and entered in the office here, and the man whose life was insured dies. Now, certainly the two men were never together anywhere to talk over a line of conspiracy, but their minds ran in the same channel, and their acts sprang up from a concert or agreement between them, although one was away from the other, by means of which the insurance company was to be defrauded according to the first man's intention. Suppose a man is engaged in business and has a book-keeper and a bank account, and he authorizes his book-keeper to sign his name to checks for money, and there is some person who is supplying the business man with goods of different kinds, and the book-keeper is authorized to draw a check for the money to pay the bills and take a receipt. Now, although the book-keeper and the man furnishing the supplies may not talk the matter over between them, yet the man who supplies the goods may furnish a bill for goods that he has never supplied at all, and may in his bill declare that he has supplied twice the quantity of goods that he did supply. If book-keeper accepts that bill, knowing it to be false, or in such a way that there would be no possible doubt that he did know it, and he took a receipt on the bill and drew a check for the money and gave it to the man and the man drew the money, when the proprietor of that business came to find out that this amount of money had been drawn and that the goods had never been furnished, would not he say at once, "Why my book-keeper and this man conspired together." The evidence shows that there was a concert of action and a combination and agreement between them. An agreement of course may be made in writing, or it may be made by word of mouth, or it may be an understood agreement without anything being said at all. These are illustrations of what a conspiracy is. I have given you the legal definition. It is to commit a crime or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. For instance, to illustrate the last portion of it: If a man came and took possession of your goods and took them to his house you would have no right under the law to go there and take him by the throat and forcibly take your goods away from him. You would violate the law. If two men agreed together to go and take the goods in that way they would agree to violate the law, and that would be a conspiracy between them. It would be proper to get the goods in a lawful way, but it would not be proper to go and assault the man and take them away in that manner.

Now, at the common law it was an offense for people to agree to commit a crime. If they never did anything else but just come to an agreement, it was punishable. At common law, if I agree with somebody else to commit an offense, the very fact that we agree is an offense. I am not speaking technically now, your honor. I am trying to bring this matter clearly before the jury in a plain and homely way.

The COURT. I understand.

Mr. KER. But Congress has gone a little further than that. In New York they have the same law that we have here. Congress says:

If two or more—

Remember, it takes two to make a conspiracy; two minds to run in the same channel:

If two or more agree together to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of these persons shall commit any overt act to effect the purpose of the conspiracy, they shall all be held liable.

You see they have done away with the common-law version that the mere agreement is criminal. Congress says there must be some overt act. Now, gentlemen, let me explain to you what that means. An overt act is an open and a notorious act. Congress has taken the same view that I have been trying to impress upon you, that conspiracy is a secret act, a secret agreement; but the moment they do something that is open and notorious, something that everybody can see, that moment the conspiracy is fixed upon them. Now, if Dorsey and Brady and the others had simply agreed to defraud the United States, at common law they could be punished. Under the United States law they could not be punished. But if, after agreeing or conspiring to defraud the United States, any one of them committed any act in pursuance of that agreement, or to effect the object of the agreement, no matter which one of them did it, they are all liable for the consequence of their agreement. Therefore we are compelled to show you that there was some overt act committed.

In this indictment there are a great number of overt acts alleged. These overt acts themselves will convey to your mind the idea, irresistibly, that there must have been an agreement or concert between these people, or the acts could not have been committed. We have alleged that they got up false and fictitious letters. We have alleged that they got up false and fictitious petitions, petitions that stated that they were signed by people living upon the route and in the neighborhood of the route, when in point of fact the people did not live there at all. We have alleged that they filed fraudulent subcontracts, and we have shown you that they did so. The petitions were to deceive the Postmaster-General. They were of no earthly use, and the expedition could have been granted without them. But they were put in there in order to convey the impression either to Congress, to the Postmaster-General, or to whoever might come after Mr. Brady, that the people demanded it; as Mr. Ingersoll said, "The great people wanted it." That was the idea. The petitions were of no other use. They could have got along without them. The subcontracts were of use. They were used to enable these defendants to draw the money.

We have also alleged as overt acts, in different places, that they put in the department false oaths. I have explained to you already what these oaths were, and I will show you their object and their falsity. There were eighteen oaths put in on these nineteen routes. Out of the eighteen oaths that were put in sixteen of them were scratched, altered, and erased, or written in apparently after being signed. Of the eighteen oaths that were put in, and that were brought before you, there is not a solitary oath that has not been contradicted. We have, by the testimony, shown the falsity of every one of these eighteen oaths, and as I go along I will point it out to you. Then, another series of overt acts is that Mr. Brady made orders granting an increase of trips and granting expedition, or shortening of time, and allowing increased pay in conformity with these oaths when the service was not needed and required, and that he certified the orders to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. We will show you these oaths as we go along. We will show you the expedition and increase of trips that were granted, and call to your attention the testimony showing the wantonness and the outrageous character of the orders that were made, excluding any idea of honesty, and making it impossible for even the merest child to believe there was no fraud concerning these matters. In addition to the orders we allege that they fraudulently drew the pay for each quarter during the contract term—the expedited pay and the pay granted for trips. These are overt acts, and they are alleged in the bill of indictment. We have shown you, and I will explain as we go along, the different amounts of money that these defendants took out of the Treasury by reason of the oaths and by reason of the orders that were made by Mr. Brady.

There is one thing that you ought also to bear in mind. There is what is called the statute of limitations. The law fixes a period of time in which a man can be punished for any offense that he commits. In this case the law has said that after the lapse of three years you must not proceed against them. Of course that is not the exact language of the statute. After the expiration of three years the act that is done is cut off from punishment. The act may be shown to the jury in order that the jury may know the character of the agreement and combination, but still it cannot be found against the defendants as an overt act. This indictment was filed on the 20th of May, 1882. You must run back three years, and then you will come to the 20th day of May, 1879. We allege that they combined and agreed together on the date this indictment was brought into court, the 20th day of May. Therefore all the acts that were committed by these defendants after the 20th of May, 1879, are acts that you can find them guilty of, from the evidence. Of course if you find they committed any one act, that is sufficient. We have given you a whole lot, so that we should make no mistake in the matter. We have given you not exactly all of their overt acts, but enough of their material ones to give you a chance to find one. The date upon which the act was committed is not exactly material. It may be some other date than the date alleged in the indictment, provided it is within the three years. The act of Congress requires that all official papers upon which orders are made shall be filed, with the true date of their filing marked upon them. Now, gentlemen, here is a point that we may settle just at this stage. When were they filed? Some of these petitions were put in in 1878, and some in March, April, and May, 1879—beyond the time mentioned in this indictment. Some were put in in December, January, and February, 1879. They were put in the Post-Office Department, and left there. Now, when did they become papers belonging to the Post-Office Department? That is a question to settle by the evidence. I want to call your attention to the evidence in that respect. When a petition or oath is forwarded to the Post-Office Department the clerk makes a memorandum upon the back of it. The bill of indictment alleges that they sent or caused to be sent, transmitted, and placed among the papers belonging to these routes certain false petitions, and so forth. The date of filing is the date upon which the paper takes effect. Let me give you the authority upon that subject. Mr. Sweeney, who was a clerk in that office, and who is a chief of division now, I believe, had charge of some of these routes and some of the business connected with them. He was familiar with the mode of doing business in the Post-Office Department. I read from his testimony on pages 501 and 502. He had spoken of making up the cases:

Q. Suppose a number of petitions were sent in from time to time, all relating to the one subject; what would be done with these petitions?—A. Well, if the case had been made up and was acted upon——

Q. [Interposing.] I am not speaking about a case of that kind, but before there is anything done?—A. It would be customary to put them all in this jacket.

Q. They would all be put in the one jacket?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when they were all collected the jacket would undergo the process you spoke of—the putting down of a statement of what was contained in it, and anything of that sort?—A. Yes, sir; or more might be put in after the jacket had been originally made up.

Q. After the jacket is made up, is that what you call a case?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is done with that case then?—A. If it were for change of service involving an expenditure of money, it would be submitted to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General or his chief clerk.

Q. Do you always submit it to the chief clerk, or only when he is acting?—A. Usually only when he is acting for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Suppose the petitions called for an increase of trips from one to three, what would be done with that case, as you call it, then?—A. After the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had determined what action to take upon it the corresponding clerk would——

Q. [Interposing.] Excuse me. You would first take it to the Second Assistant?—A. It is usually put on his desk.

Q. Suppose it was a petition asking for a reduction of the time, which is called increase or expedition, what would you do with that; take it to the Second Assistant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In either of those cases, before going to the Second Assistant, would there be anything else put upon the jacket, or ought there to be?—A. Well, only such facts as would be necessary for his consideration. Usually it would state the revenue of the offices to be supplied; generally, but not in all cases; and the cost of the desired increase, and by whom recommended.

Q. Then all that information would be laid before the Second Assistant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What would be done with the case after the Second Assistant had looked at it?—A. He would give directions as to what he wished done, either to grant it or to decline to do so, or perhaps to file it and take no action.

You see he says that the Postmaster-General would give directions to file. The filing is the important part of it. When the case is made up and put in the jacket and the brief put on the jacket and it is handed to the Second Assistant, it then becomes a case, and takes its date from that time.

Q. Suppose he ordered an increase of service?—A. If he ordered an increase of service the corresponding clerk would then make the order for the signature of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. And the same way with expedition, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What becomes of the order?—A. The order would then be made out with the circulars accompanying it and sent to the contractor and to the postmaster at the termini of the route.

Q. Where would the order be made?—A. By the corresponding clerk.

Q. What paper would it be made on?—A. It would be made on the jacket or another paper similar to it and placed on the outside of it.

Q. It would be put right on the case, as you call it?—A. Yes, sir; or another jacket inclosing the brief.

Then on cross-examination, at page 510, he says:

Q. Now, if there came in fifteen or twenty petitions, letters, &c., asking for increase or expedition of service on a particular route, and they find their way into the box of the corresponding clerk of the section to which that route belongs, that corresponding clerk takes those petitions and puts all that belong to any one route together, does he?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he puts an envelope on them, which you call a jacket?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then he writes on the back of that jacket, in brief, the substance of those petitions?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is what you call making up a case?—A. And stating the revenue and the cost of the desired increase.

That is the testimony of Mr. Sweeney. Mr. Brady in giving his testimony upon this subject corroborates Mr. Sweeney. On page 3442 Mr. Brady says:

A. They always had these affidavits filed in the first place, and then the case was made up, as I have repeatedly said. If we could then get it for less we did so, or else we did not do it at all.

That is the statement given by General Brady as to how they managed the business. The oaths and petitions were sent into the Post-Office Department, and were collected until they got a pile of them, and whenever they got a pile they were put in an envelope or "jacket," as they call it, and a brief was put on it and it was sent to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he made his orders. Now, gentlemen, that was the time that these petitions or these oaths were brought to life and to light—when they came before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and he made his order upon them. I have no doubt that the counsel on the other side will say to you, "Oh, don't that oath show that it was filed in April." The answer to that is just this: It has a mark on it that it was received in April, but it is in a jacket dated in July. It was acted upon in July. It became a record of the Post-Office Department, and it became a part of the "case" in July or August, or whatever date it was when Brady acted upon it and made the order.

We had a number of witnesses who gave the general outline of what took place in regard to these routes and the manner in which the business was done. I want to briefly call your attention to the testimony of these witnesses, beginning with Boone. Boone says that he first met S. W. Dorsey in Mr. Brewer's room in the Post-Office Department building, in November, 1877. Mr. Brewer is a clerk there who had charge of some of these routes. He was examined on the stand. Boone says, "I went to Dorsey's house that night and had some conversation with him. Dorsey invited me to come there and showed me a letter from Peck. After some talk Dorsey agreed to give me a third interest." They agreed among themselves about the interest. Boone said, "The whole matter was to be kept a secret. I was not to tell Roots, I was not to tell Kerens, and I was not to tell Elkins. It was all to be kept secret;" although Boone says that neither Roots nor Kerens were in the city at that time, still they were not to know anything about it. Acting upon the agreement, Boone sat down and got up some letters which were addressed to the postmasters throughout the different States and Territories. I read from page 1548:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1879.

SIR: We inclose certain interrogatories which we have the honor to request you or your deputy to answer, and forward in the inclosed stamped envelope to us at the earliest possible moment.

The COURT. You read that 1879.

Mr. KER. That is the way it was printed.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a mistake.

Mr. KER. It ought to be 1878. I remember that 1878 is the correct date.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. KER. You see how well his honor understands these dates and how close a watch he keeps upon them.

The first part of that letter was all right. There was no trouble about that, except that it was a piece of impudence to write to the postmasters for that information.

By so doing you will place us under many obligations, and we will be glad to reciprocate the courtesy at any time by transacting any business you may have before the Post-Office Department, or with the Sixth Auditor, who audits your accounts.

Now, gentlemen, you see the bait that was thrown out to the postmasters. "If you will do this for us, in return we will help you in your business with the Post-Office Department, and especially with the Sixth Auditor, the man who audits your accounts." It was a sort of underhanded way of letting them know it would be beneficial to them to aid in giving this information. Boone says that Stephen Dorsey furnished him with the paper and the envelopes; Senate envelopes, you know. Probably that was an inducement to the postmasters, knowing that they came from the Senate. He sent those envelopes to give a sort of official character to the letters. Dorsey says that he bought and paid for the envelopes, but that does not do away with the use that they were put to.

Boone says that Stephen W. Dorsey drew a check for one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars to pay for the postage-stamps and to pay for the printing. Then he says he got a lot of proposals printed. I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to these proposals. Boone went ahead in his own way, just as he had been in the habit of doing, and got a lot of proposals printed, and he says he sent a lot of them to Miner at Sandusky. You remember he had never seen Miner, and did not know him; but by Dorsey's direction he sent these blanks over to Miner at Sandusky. Then he says "I received a letter from Miner stating that he would come on to Washington, and finally Miner did come, arriving at Washington on the 5th of December." Now, a portion of these proposals that were printed Boone bundled up into packages, by Dorsey's direction, and sent them off to different postmasters. You remember the Clendenning package. To that package there was attached a letter from Stephen Dorsey asking Clendenning to get the bonds filled up. Clendenning, who was an honest man and did not fear Mr. Dorsey, chose rather to do his duty as he had sworn to do it, and returned the package to Mr. Dorsey with an indignant rejection of the offer. His letter was given in evidence and read to you. Boone says "I sent them to the postmasters at Little Rock in Arkansas, Helena in Arkansas, Fort Smith in Arkansas, Hot Springs in Arkansas, and Pine Bluff in Arkansas." He sent them to these postmasters with the direction to get somebody to put their names on them as bondsmen, and for the postmasters to give the usual certificates that they had been signed and filled up before affixing their signatures to them and that the people who signed as bondsmen were the owners of real estate such as was described in the oath that was attached to the bonds, an oath which of course Dorsey never intended anybody to take. Some of these bids were returned filled up as directed by Dorsey. Some were not filled up, as in the case of those sent to Mr. Clendenning. After these bids were returned Mr. Miner prepared what was called a bidding-book. He says it was this advertisement [exhibiting advertisement to the jury]. The figures to be bid were put opposite the route in each case. Boone did not get that up. He said he suggested a portion of the figures and the other portion was brought to him by Miner. He saw that book and says a part of the figures were in Stephen W. Dorsey's handwriting. Stephen Dorsey helped to fill up this book. From this book they filled in the amounts in the different proposals. Rerdell was pressed into the service, and Rerdell went up to Miner's room in Dorsey's house and filled in the amounts of the bids as they were called off by Miner. Boone helped at that, and the three of them were engaged in filling up the bids. After a portion of the bids were filled up Dorsey came along and took a look at how the work was going on, and he saw that there were bids for six trips a week, and immediately gave orders to Boone that he was to destroy every bid that was over three trips a week. They were going to put in bids for four or five or six trips and Dorsey would not have it that way, but ordered the bids destroyed, and Boone says that he destroyed five hundred of those bids! Then, again, Dorsey took a look at the bidding and found that it was not exactly to suit him, and he made another order that Boone obeyed. The order was for Boone to put in a clause for expedition. Now, Boone had been a contractor for a number of years. He was the owner of eleven hundred routes. Remember, gentlemen, there were only nine thousand and some odd routes, so that Boone had one-ninth of all the star routes in the United States. Boone said, "I never heard of such a thing before. I never had a route expedited and never dreamed of it." He did not know a thing about it. Acting upon Stephen W. Dorsey's advice he put in this clause giving the subcontractors 65 per cent. of the increase. I want you to remember the 65 per cent., because I will show you some subcontracts with that amount in, but I do not want you to think for one moment that the subcontractor ever got a dollar of it. It was put in there probably as a blind to induce them to take the contracts. Boone says, "I prepared these forms under the instructions of Stephen W. Dorsey, and I furnished a bondsman at the request of Stephen W. Dorsey." That is true. He furnished Hoyt, who went on these contracts as a bondsman. Now, you will remember that on the 15th of January, 1879, there was what is called a division. There were two divisions, but this was the first. Miner and Peck were to take certain routes in certain localities, and John Dorsey and Boone were to take certain routes in certain localities. They were all in the same batch, but for convenience they were going to divide them up in that way. Boone and Dorsey went together, and, as Boone was a stranger, they wanted a contract with Boone, and Miner wrote out a contract with Boone, and signed it for John Dorsey, by which Boone and John W. Dorsey were to go together in taking their share of the routes that would come to them; for this was before there was any award at all and before they knew that they were going to get a contract at all; but it was the arrangement that was made between them. Boone went on attending to his branch of the business up to somewhere about the 7th or 8th of August, 1878. On pages 1529 and 1530, Boone, in answer to the question:

What did Miner say to you in that connection?

He, having had a conversation with Miner who was managing the business, says:

On the 8th day of August, 1878, Mr. Miner sent for me to come to the house of Stephen W. Dorsey. Dorsey was absent from the city at the time. He—said to me, "It is a matter of impossibility for us to raise the amount necessary to go on with the balance of this service, and it is useless for me to tell you the position we are in, you can see it yourself," and I did see it, and signed the paper going out of the concern.

Q. What did he say about Vaile?—A. He said Mr. Vaile was coming in because he had the means necessary to put the service on.

Q. Did you have any conversation with S. W. Dorsey in reference to Vaile?—A. I had a conversation about Mr. Vaile with S. W. Dorsey pending the letting or the award of the contracts.

Before they were awarded, before March, 1878, Stephen W. Dorsey had talked with Boone about Vaile. This is what he says:

Q. Did you have any conversation with Stephen W. Dorsey about Vaile's coming into the concern?—A. I never had any conversation with him about his coming into the concern. He asked me the question about Mr. Vaile's financial ability, his standing as a mail contractor, and his ability to handle mail contracts, and probably from the conversation I inferred that Mr. Vaile would be brought into the concern.

Q. At what time was that conversation; do you recollect?—A. That conversation must have occurred within thirty days after the awards were made; either in the latter part of March or the first part of April.

That was in 1878. Boone says he got out of the concern. Miner, looking out for future occurrences, drew up an agreement between Boone and John W. Dorsey, and in that agreement they gave to Boone, as a consideration for his going out of the concern, all the contracts that John W. Dorsey held in Texas, in Louisiana, and in Kansas. Now, I told you this morning that they took one hundred and thirty-four routes. Boone got a portion of these in the States that I have just named. That brought the number down, together with those that were discontinued, to something in the neighborhood of about a hundred. That is sufficient for the present as to Mr. Boone's connection with the matter.

The next man who appeared in this case was Mr. A. W. Moore. Mr. Moore was here upon the stand. You will remember that he told you he knew what they were going to do. He knew that there was going to be a fraud committed, and was willing to go in. The only trouble was that they were too smart for him, and they beat him. It was not that he was not willing enough. He was perfectly willing to go into it, and perfectly willing to cheat the Government, but they did not give him the chance. They got the best of him. Moore says, "I met Miner in the spring of 1878." You will remember that Boone and Miner had a conversation about somebody to go out and put the service on, and Boone recommended Moore. Then Moore says, "I went to Stephen W. Dorsey's house and saw Dorsey, and I afterwards saw Miner and was employed at $150 a month and expenses." Then he says, "I went to see Dorsey and Dorsey asked my opinion of the service." Now, I want to read to you from Moore's testimony on page 1356:

Q. Was anything else said?—A. In speaking of the service I told him I did not understand why those long routes once and twice a week should be taken so low, and he said that was a service that they wished to get; that on that service there was a chance for increase and expedition, and on the daily service there was no chance for any increase.

Of course, Moore was a man who knew something about the mail business. He had routes of his own. But he could not see through it at all, or how it was that they took these routes with only three trips at such prices. How they expected to get along with them he could not imagine. Now, I read from pages 1360 and 1361. Between the time that Mr. Moore said what I have just read to you and what I am about to read there was a colloquy in which Mr. Henkle, Judge Wilson, Mr. Davidge, and Mr. Ingersoll fifteen or twenty times, and somebody else took part. They had a long discussion about it. Then:

Q. [Resuming.] Well, what did you say about the increase and expedition?—A. That that was a kind of service they wanted, from once to twice a week. It would give them a chance for increase and expedition, and on the daily service there was no chance to get it up higher.

Q. Was anything else said?—A. That there was where the money was; it was in the increase and expedition.

Q. Was anybody else present at that conversation?—A. Yes; Mr. Rerdell was present.

Q. What else was said, or what else occurred between you and Dorsey at that time?—A. He showed me a bundle of blank subcontracts, and pointed out, as I had never seen them before, where they had made arrangements for once and twice and three times a week service and daily in blank, and also for a certain per cent. for expedition—a blank per cent. for expedition. This was in the printed blank form.

He had never heard of expedition before. Nobody ever heard of it before. It was a thing that was unknown until it originated in this way, so far as these defendants were concerned. Dorsey gave the information. I do not know whether Dorsey was the author of it or not. He did not tell us; but by some means they got into this new way of managing things:

Q. [Resuming.] What did Dorsey tell you you were to do under the contract you had made with Miner?—A. He instructed me in making all subcontracts to make allowance for daily service all the way through, and also for expedition.

That was Dorsey's instruction to Moore at that time. Now, Moore says that Dorsey gave him letters to prominent men in California, and he also gave him a trip pass on the Central Pacific and one on the Union Pacific Railroad, a pass from here to Chicago and the annual pass of his brother over the Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroads. They were doing it at a cheap rate. Dorsey gave him a trip pass, good for one trip, but he gave him John Dorsey's pass over both the Pacific railroads. Then he gave him a check payable to Miner. They tried to make it appear that Moore said the check was given to him. Moore's testimony is "It was given to me, but payable to Miner, and I went with Miner to the bank to draw it, and while we were there drawing the money we met Boone." Miner says, "No;" they did not do it; that it is a mistake; that nothing of the kind took place; but there are two men who say, "Yes." Now, there were other instructions given, and beside, a power of attorney that Miner gave. I read from page 1366:

Q. [Resuming.] What was said further than what you have already stated in reference to the matter of making contracts?—A. In making such contracts Mr. Dorsey told me that I could assure them that this service would all be increased and expedited.

Those were Dorsey's instructions, to insure the subcontractors that the service would be increased and expedited. You know that Moore followed that out, for he told Mr. McBean and all the other people up in Oregon, just as they testified word for word on the stand what Moore told them.

On page 1367 he continues:

A. Mr. Miner instructed me, when I had time, to get up petitions for increase of service, and in getting up the petitions to change the headings as much as I could; not to have too much similarity about them, and also to leave space between the heading of the petition and the names, in case the heading should want to be changed.

Did you notice that? He was to write it all on one side, so that they could tear that off and paste it on to another and use it for any petition they wanted. It didn't make any difference. A petition was a petition and a paper was a paper, and they could stick it in anyhow; nobody was going to read it.

Q. To leave space between the heading of the petition and the names?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In case what?—A. In case they wanted to change the heading of the petition and wanted to change the petition itself.

Q. When did you say you started for the West?—A. Somewhere about the middle of April; it might have been before, and it might have been after.

show, and made the subcontracts according to his instructions and got up the petitions according to his instructions. He fixed them up and changed the language a little in some and in some he did not take the trouble to change, but he fixed them all so that there was a space between the writing and the names, so that they could be cut off and pasted on to other papers. Then he says he got a note from Miner and went to Denver, and there he met Miner. At Denver he told Miner that he did not want to go on under a salary any longer; that he wanted an interest in the routes. Miner told him that he would give him a quarter interest in the routes. While they were talking there Miner said some very curious things to him. I read from page 1371:

Q. What was said by you, and what was said by him?—A. I told him if the Eastern Oregon service that was sublet to Hutchinson was carried out the contracts were in good shape; but I had my doubts in regard to that service.

Q. What then?—A. Mr. Miner asked me if I would still continue in the employ of the company. I told him no. Then he made a proposition to give me a fourth interest for four years in the service I had been handling, me giving my time gratis, and dividing the profits.

Q. What did he say to you about that contract—that he could make it, or what?—A. He said he could not make it without seeing Senator Dorsey first.

This was in April, 1878:

Q. Was anything said about increases and expedition?—A. Yes, sir; I explained to him that in the service in Eastern Oregon the more increase they had and the more expedition they had the worse off they were.

Do you understand that? If a man takes a route to run it one trip for $300, and if by so running it he will lose $20 or $40 or $50, and they make it two trips, the question is, would he not lose another $50 if it is doubled up? The more the increase is the more he is bound to lose. There is an offset to that. He might run three or four trips at a little bit cheaper rate to the subcontractor than he would run one, but the principle was there. It was a losing contract, and the more of that kind he had the worse it was for him, especially when the expedition was put on, which Moore did not understand, where the time might be reduced and he might have to run it in less time and get no pay for it.

Q. What did he say to that?—A. He said so far as the increase of service was concerned there might be a loss, but the expedition would cover all loss and leave a profit.

Q. How was that to be done?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have him asked what he said.

Mr. MERRICK. I have asked what he said.

The COURT. I understand the question relates to what he said.

Q. Did he say anything about how that was to be done?—A. I told Mr. Miner that as I understood it the expedition would be the same as the increase, according to the rules and regulations of the department, and he could only get the proportion that it took of extra stock to run it. He said that was not the case—

Now listen, gentlemen, to what Miner said in April, 1878—that it all depended on the affidavits of the contractors, and they were all good affidavit men, and they proposed to make a pretty good thing out of it.

I say, too, that they were all good affidavit men and they did make a pretty good thing out of it. The only drawback is that my friend Judge Wilson has tapped one of their pockets to a considerable extent, the newspapers say forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. WILSON. We do not get $100 a day from the Government and our expenses, but I am glad you opened that door.

Mr. KER. I will let you alone now. The testimony goes on:

Q. When did you leave Denver?—A. On or about the 5th of July, 1878.

Q. When did you reach Washington?—A. I believe it was on or about the 11th of July.

Q. What did you do when you got here?—A. After taking my baggage to the hotel I proceeded at once to Senator Dorsey's house.

There he had an interview with Dorsey.

Q. Did you find him there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What occurred between you and the ex-Senator there?—A. I told him my time was up as an agent and that I was ready for a settlement.

He was talking to Stephen W. Dorsey then.

He asked me how much was coming to me, and I told him, and he gave me a check for the amount.

Q. He settled with you?—A. Yes, sir; fairly. He asked me in regard to the service, and I told him I was satisfied with all of it except the Eastern Oregon service, and that I was in doubt about. He asked me to telegraph to the head office at Baker City and make new service to The Dalles, and find out if the service had started; that if they had started that, all the rest had been started. I did so. That was all left to the same subcontractor.

Then he telegraphed and got a reply from the postmistress at The Dalles.

Then he proposed to me to go back as an agent again, and offered me $250 a month if I would go back as an agent.

Q. What did you say to that?—A. I refused to do it.

Q. What did you then say?—A. I told him I would go back and take one-fourth of the service for the four years and handle it myself.

Q. Where?—A. In Nevada, Northern California, Oregon, and Washington Territory. There were some few routes in Southern California that I was not to have.

Q. What did he say to that?—A. He asked if I had had any talk with Mr. Miner in regard to it. I told him I had. He wanted to know whether Mr. Miner was willing to agree to it. He said he could not make any contract, but as soon as Mr. Miner came he would have him draw up a contract to that effect, and give me one-quarter of the profits for four years in that service, me to give my time, but my expenses in traveling, and so forth, to be taken out of the general fund before there was a division of profits.

Now Moore went out again and finally returned in July. While he was here he had a conversation with John Dorsey. Before reading the conversation with John Dorsey I want to read another conversation that Moore had with Stephen W. Dorsey in relation to this contract for a quarter interest. It is on page 1373:

Q. You say when you returned here you went to Dorsey's house and had a talk with him, and in the course of that conversation, when you spoke about a contract, he asked you whether you had talked with Miner about it. You say you told him you had. What else occurred in that conversation?

* * * * *

Q. Did you have any other conversation with Dorsey after that?

Mr. DAVIDGE. After what?

Mr. MERRICK. After the first conversation when you came back from the West?

A. Yes, sir; I went there several times in reporting in regard to the service I had telegraphed about.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about your profits, &c.?—A. Yes, sir; I made the same proposition to him that I had to Mr. Miner, or that Mr. Miner had made to me. I told him I was willing to give my time, but my expenses must be taken out of the general fund before there was a division of profits. Mr. Dorsey told me he acquiesced in that, and said I must understand another thing, that it required money to hold the influence they all had with the department, and that must be taken out of the general fund before the division of profits.

That came from Senator Dorsey. It required money to hold the influence they all had with the department at that time, and before there were any profits that money would have to come out. On page 1383 he goes on to give his conversation with John Dorsey:

I had several conversations with John W. Dorsey soon after the bids were awarded.

Q. What did he say about his having entered into this experiment or enterprise?—

A. He said his brother had him here on some business he did not know anything about and he wished he was back home.

I guess he has wished that often since.

Q. You say you settled with Miner?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have the date of the conversation of John W. Dorsey fixed.

Q. Fix the date of that conversation in which John W. Dorsey made the remark that his brother had him here on business he did not know anything about and he wished he was home?—A. It was some time in April, 1878; before I left.

Then I see a remark here:

Mr. INGERSOLL. [To Mr. Merrick.] Won't you state it again? I like to have the jury hear it often.

Mr. Ingersoll wanted you to hear that remark often, so he stated. I don't think he cares particularly about you hearing it now. There has been a good deal of testimony given since that time. He has the habit of making remarks of that kind. I am sorry he is not here now. That is one of those mistakes that people sometimes make, when in an off-hand way they say things they do not intend to say. I can give an illustration of that. The other day in walking up F street I came to an old bookstore called Anglim's, above Fourteenth street, and there I saw a large basket sitting out on the pavement where anybody could go and look at the books with which it was filled. I saw that there were some pamphlets in it, quite a pile of them, and I stopped to examine them, when my attention was attracted by a sign on the basket. It said:

Ingersoll, half price.

That was a mistake of the man who put it on. He did not mean it. It was a slip, a mistake, something like Mr. Ingersoll's remark that he would like to have that statement made often.

Mr. WILSON. A good many of us will not be worth 50 cents on the dollar after we see this thing through.

The COURT. I am sure you do not mean that.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, I do.

Mr. MERRICK. If Ingersoll is half price now he will be worth about 5 per cent. then.

The COURT. I hope you will all be worth more when you get through.

Mr. WILSON. I think about half of us will be dead before we get through.

Mr. KER. He is a pretty good fellow. He does not mean all he says.

Mr. KER. [Resuming.] Mr. Moore drew out of the concern and settled up. He met Vaile and Miner and asked them about the settlement, and finally they settled with them, and Vaile drew a check for the amount of money and paid Moore. Moore handed Miner back the power of attorney. When asked why he did not go on and sue, he said, "Oh, well, he told me the arrangement was with Stephen W. Dorsey, and I had no written arrangement with him, and what was the use of trying to enforce it?" So he cleared out and went home.

The next prominent person in this arrangement is S. W. Dorsey. I am giving you these general remarks so that you can see the scope of the testimony, what was testified against them and what was testified for them. S. W. Dorsey was a Senator. He represented the State of Arkansas. His Senatorial term expired on the 4th of March, 1879, at 12 o'clock noon, by limitation of law. He was a Senator at the time that this award was made and these contracts went into effect. You know there is a law that prohibits any member of Congress from being interested in any contract with the Government during his term of office. That law is so strict and positive that if a member of Congress becomes interested in a contract or receives any money in connection with a contract, upon conviction he is turned out of office and forever afterwards disqualified from holding office. Therefore it was a very important matter that Stephen W. Dorsey should not appear as being interested in these contracts during his Senatorial term, because it would have disqualified him, upon conviction, from ever afterwards holding any office. Fortunately for him the statute of limitation has run against that part of the matter.

Now, Dorsey says that he agreed to pay Boone for his trouble. You know that there is not a person who is able to understand why he should have left out Boone in saying "It is a lie made out of whole cloth; it is false; it is untrue." But he said, "Mr. Boone is mistaken; Mr. Boone did not understand it that way; he could not have understood it." Mr. Boone was treated very gingerly and with a great deal of deference. Therefore, Senator Dorsey says that "When Mr. Boone says that I agreed to give him a one-third interest in these drafts he was mistaken. What I did say was that I would pay him for his services until he saw John Dorsey and Miner and Peck, and they would give him a one-third interest, no doubt." Very likely for a shrewd business man like Boone.

Now, Senator Dorsey says, "I never conversed with Moore." He says, "I never had a conversation of three words with him in my life."

On page 3760 he said that with the only emphasis, I think, he had put upon anything he testified to, except as to Rerdell. But if you turn to page 3918, which I will do, you will find that Dorsey upon cross-examination contradicted himself and said:

Q. You have testified, I believe, that although you took such an active interest in this business at that time in 1878, you did not ask Mr. Moore anything about it when he returned?—A. I did not say that. I said I might have asked him something about it.

Somebody is mistaken. The stenographer's minutes could have been corrected every morning. They were said to be correct. You were there. You heard it. Probably it did not impress itself upon your minds, but I say there it is in the record:

I never had a conversation with Mr. Moore of three words in the world.

He was cross-examined by Mr. Merrick, and he thought it ridiculous that he should have given Moore a check upon orders from Miner and not have said, "How do you do to-day? Where have you been? How are the routes? How are they getting along?" But he said he never opened his mouth; had no conversation with him. And finally, when he saw the absurdity of it, he said, "I did not say that." He contradicts himself plainly and flatly, and said, "What I did say was I might have asked him something about it."

Now, there is a question whether Mr. Dorsey was interested in these routes or not, and I do not know anybody who is better able to answer that than himself. On page 3895, it appears there was a power of attorney. Dorsey said, in answer to some questions as to why he did not do this, and why he did not do that "Why, I had a power of attorney from Peck, a power of attorney from John Dorsey." Well, we wanted to see that power of attorney. We wanted to have it, so that we could hand it to you gentlemen, so that you could see it. But it was like the rest of the books and papers, they would not let us have it. Here is what he said:

Q. Did you have any power of attorney prior to the 4th of March, 1879?

Prior to the day he went out of Congress?

A. I don't remember about that.

Q. Do you remember that you did not?—A. I don't remember that I did or did not.

There is his own answer to it: "I don't remember." He would not produce it to you, and answered "I don't remember." Probably he did not want to say that he hadn't it or had it. He did not know how it would affect him if he said he had it, and did not know how it would affect him if he said he hadn't it, and so he cut the matter short by saying, "I don't remember"—he, the man who voluntarily took the stand to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, without any reservation to keep anything back—"I don't remember."

Then he was asked: "Did you ever sign any contracts for Peck?" You know Boone said he had. You know Rerdell said that he had signed Peck's name to contracts. In answer to that, he said: "Well, I wouldn't say, but I think not." He was not even certain of that. That was in 1877 or 1878. "I wouldn't say, but think not." Now, in that connection, on pages 3824 and 3825, it is just worth while reading. He was asked about those contracts that I have told you about, and he was asked about some testimony of Boone's:

Is that true?—A. I don't think it is, sir. I think Mr. Boone is mistaken.

Q. You think Boone is mistaken?—A. I do.

Q. Then you recollect that you did not sign it?—A. I do not recollect distinctly, as I have told you, whether I signed it or not, but my judgment is that I did not sign it or I would remember it.

Q. That is the question that I asked you once before: Whether if you did sign it you would not have remembered it. Now, you say that if you had signed it you think you would have remembered it?—A. I think so.

Q. Don't you know that you would have remembered it if you had signed it?—A. I don't know; I don't know anything.

Sworn to on the stand. "I don't know; I don't know anything."

Q. You don't know anything?—A. I believe a good many things, but I cannot positively state that I am absolutely certain about anything.

What a chaotic state of mind. He did not know anything.

Q. You are not absolutely certain then that you did not enter into a conspiracy to defraud the Government, are you?

Mr. CARPENTER. If he wants an answer give it to him.

Mr. MERRICK. I want an answer to every question I shall ask.

A. My recollection has been pretty well revived on that point, and if I was certain of anything I would be certain that was not true.

Now, there is a man who is asked directly and squarely: "Did you enter into a conspiracy to defraud the Government?" And he says: "If I were certain of anything, I would say that I did not." He was not certain, gentlemen, that he did not enter into this conspiracy. He tells you that. It is his own testimony. I advise you to believe it. He did not say that he did not do it.

Q. But you are not certain that even that is not true, are you?—A. Well, fairly so.

That is all he could tell you, that he was fairly certain of it.

Q. And you tell the jury now that Boone is mistaken when he says you signed Peck's name to those papers?—A. I think he is.

Then he was further interrogated at page 3839, about when Miner came:

Q. Was he there in the month of February?—A. I think he was.

Q. Was he there in the month of March?—A. I don't know; I think not.

Q. When did he go away?—A. I don't know that.

Q. What was he doing here?—A. He was bidding on mail contracts.

Q. Had he an office in your house?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Whereabouts?—A. Third floor, back room.

Q. How did he come to come to Washington City on that occasion?—A. He came on the cars, I suppose.

Q. Did not walk?—A. I guess not.

Q. Did he come on his own suggestion, or on yours?—A. I think on mine.

Q. When did you make the suggestion?—A. I don't remember that.

Q. Was it in December?—A. I don't know.

Q. Was it in January?—A. I can't tell you.

Q. What is your best recollection?—A. I have no recollection.

Q. What do you think?—A. I don't think.

Q. How did you make the suggestion—by word of mouth?

The WITNESS. In what form do you mean?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I might by letter, or verbally.

Q. You might have done either?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which was it?—A. I don't know.

Q. What do you think about it?—A. I don't think.

Q. Of course you don't know. Does your memory suffer only an occasional impairment, or is it permanent?—A. It is a pretty fair memory; it is very satisfactory to me.

There is his answer. His memory was satisfactory to him. I do not know how far it would satisfy you when he comes to give an explanation of his different acts.

Dorsey says that the total amount of money he put into those contracts to help these people along was $13,300. That is the amount of money he advanced. Now, I have shown you it was an important thing for Dorsey to keep out of this thing before the 4th of March; but the 4th of March had no sooner arrived than Mr. Dorsey was on his feet and at work. The very first thing he did was to sit down and write a letter to Brady, which is found on page 3892:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1879.

The very day he got out of Congress; it does not make much difference whether it was before 12 o'clock or after 12.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Being duly empowered to act for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, mail contractors, I hereby enter in their behalf my protest against the acknowledgment of any subcontracts or powers of attorney now on file in your department, or which may hereafter be filed, in the name of H. M. Vaile, or in the name of any other person.

These subcontracts or powers of attorney were made and filed without the knowledge, authority, or consent of said Peck and Dorsey, and in their behalf I demand that they be canceled on the first day of April, and that no other subcontracts to any person whatsoever shall be accepted by you upon any mail routes in the names of said Peck and Dorsey, except those in the Indian Territory, unless such subcontract shall be accompanied by a power of attorney given by said Peck and Dorsey after the date of this letter.

I am, respectfully, yours,

S. W. DORSEY,
For JOHN M. PECK,
JOHN W. DORSEY.

You remember Miner had given Vaile subcontracts. Vaile had gone into this business in 1878, and he had a lot of subcontracts that he put on file; and the moment that Dorsey's hands became loose, the moment he stepped out of the Senate, the first thing he did was to write this letter to Thomas J. Brady repudiating for John W. Dorsey and Peck these contracts of Vaile's, and stating that Vaile had no authority to make or file them, and therefore that Brady must disregard them. Dorsey was going to open his fight with Vaile, and that is the way he took to do it.

Next they had a division. This division is variously stated to have taken place in March, April, and May. At all events, they had a sort of division, and here is what Dorsey says about it, at page 3933:

Q. Your agreement to pay Peck $10,000 and John W. Dorsey $10,000 and to take one-third of the routes was all a part and parcel of the same general agreement, was it not?—A. Yes, sir. It is possible I am in error as to taking one-third of the routes as routes. It seems to me that they were taken and divided according to the value of them, instead of according to numbers, because I did not take one-third of them. On that point I will not be positive.

Then he says on the next page :

Q. In order to carry out this distribution of routes, what evidences of title or right passed between the respective parties to the routes?—A. Well, my belief is—of course I am not going to speak now of my knowledge—

Q. [Interposing.] I want your best recollection.—A. I will give you my best recollection. My belief is that there were subcontracts made for all the routes that Miner got that belonged to Peck and Dorsey, and all the routes that I got that belonged to Miner, he made subcontracts over to me or else to Rerdell, or somebody else. Then I think drafts were given covering each quarter during the entire contract term on each one of the routes. In some cases we did not use the subcontracts at all, but simply the drafts, filling the drafts in the Post-Office Department.

Now, gentlemen, they divided the routes. You remember that 30 per cent. went to Miner, 30 per cent. to Stephen W. Dorsey, and 40 per cent. went to Vaile. That made 100. There are the terms of the division. Dorsey says he got thirty-three of the routes as his share, and the balance went to Vaile and Miner. But the important point at this stage is this : Their counsel will claim that if they did enter into a conspiracy, they branched off and took a different road, and therefore, there were two conspiracies going along, and consequently you ought not to convict them all of one general crime. You see what Dorsey says about it: The routes that belonged to Miner that Dorsey took, Miner executed subcontracts, signed blank drafts, and gave him all the material to go ahead and run the routes. The routes that were taken by Miner and Vaile, John Dorsey and Peck, or somebody for Peck, gave them all the material to run the routes and keep them going to the end of the contract term. And I will show you by the testimony of John Dorsey and the testimony of Miner that this was the agreement at the division—that they were to furnish the others with the material to carry on the routes. And when his honor comes to charge you upon the law of the case his honor will say there could be no such division as that to exculpate these people ; that if they furnished the material, that if they had an interest in the route at all, they are still liable. Let me show you how contradictory this is : Suppose that a man sees another off in the distance, takes a gun, puts it up to his shoulder, and shoots at the man. The moment the shot is discharged from the gun he repents and says that he did not want to kill him ; what difference does it make ? The ball goes straight to its mark ; it accomplishes what it was sent for. His repentance avails him nothing ; it is too late. And when they formed a conspiracy to draw this money from quarter to quarter, and got it all right, what does the repentance amount to unless they wipe out the material for committing the crime, destroy the subcontracts, and go to the Postmaster-General and tell him of the infamous proceeding, and go on and do all in their power to efface the wrong done, and not sit quietly by and gently aid each other to steal from the Treasury ? Dorsey says, “ After I got these routes I made an effort to have them expedited.” I read from page 3934 :

Q. Did Rerdell attend to the arrangement by which you closed with Vaile and with the other parties?—A. No ; I attended to that myself. I speak now of the details of the Post-Office Department—filing these subcontracts and drafts and things of that kind.

Q. He attended to all that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you attended to the details as well as to the general arrangement of the plan of separation?—A. I attended to that myself, I think.

Stephen W. Dorsey attended to dividing up the routes, and Rerdell took the drafts and subcontracts to the office.

Q. After that time did you go actively to work to get the service expedited and increased on the routes that you took?—A. I did everything that I knew how to do that was lawful and proper to have the routes that I thought ought to be increased and expedited increased and expedited.

He says: "I did everything that I knew how to get them increased and expedited." He then goes on:

If I left anything undone I do not know it.

Is not that a remarkable assertion from him?

If I left anything undone I do not know it.

I think the evidence discloses in this case that he left very little undone; that there was very little margin for any further increase or any further expedition. They made the last dollar out of the routes that they could get. Then he tells us on page 3952 as to how much he did get:

By Mr. MERRICK:

Question. In making an estimate of the amount derived from these routes, does not the amount paid by the Government, reduced by the amount paid to the subcontractors, show the profit to the contractors?

His answer to that is this:

A. Well, add to that the fines and deductions and the expenses.

You know that their agreement was that the subcontractor was to pay the fines and deductions.

Q. Fines and deductions and expenses?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What expenses?—A. Expenses of agents and rent.

Q. Agents for what?—A. Agents to look after the routes.

Q. Rent for what?—A. Rent for an office.

Q. Anything else?—A. I do not know. Mr. Bosler's expenses in coming down here and probably other incidental expenses—telegraphing.

Q. How many agents were employed?—A. There were two all the time, Mr. Rerdell and Mr. Steele.

Q. Any others?—A. I do not know.

Q. I mean employed by you at the time you had the routes?—A. John W. Dorsey.

Q. Who else?—A. I don't remember anybody else.

The money that they got from the Government went to pay these expenses. There was office rent; there was Rerdell; there was Steele; there was John W. Dorsey. You know that Rerdell got $3,000 a year; I suppose Steele did not get more; I do not know what John W. Dorsey got. But these were the expense, and rent and the telegraphing. Well, they did spend something for telegraphing. Then there was the expense of Bosler coming down here from Carlisle, and other things. The only other thing I can recollect in this connection is a little check for $2,000 paid to J. B. B., charged to "mail." Then he says: "I procured passes over the railroads, and I gave them to these people who were attending to the mail business." You see, gentlemen, these expenses were being cut down. I do not know whether Bosler traveled on a free pass or not, but it was very certain that Rerdell and Steele did, and John W. Dorsey had his annual passes. Therefore travel did not amount to anything, excepting an occasional hotel bill.

For a man who had a bad memory, who did not know anything, but whose memory was satisfactory to himself, there is one point where Stephen W. Dorsey's memory is as bright as a burnished dollar, and I have not the slightest doubt that when he brightened up his memory on that score he did it to influence some of you gentlemen of the jury. When Dorsey forgets about everything else, just mention the word "Chamberlin's" to him. If there is anything on the face of this earth that gets away with Stephen W. Dorsey it is his superabundant egotism. He forgets everything, but he says to the jury, when his attention is called to the matter of going to Chamberlin's, and the explanation is given in language that was intended to carry away some of you gentlemen, if you could be carried away. I will read it to you from page 3786:

Q. You may state whether you were there in connection with any mail business, or in connection with any one of the routes mentioned in this indictment?—A. No, sir; I was engaged in a mission entirely foreign to any mail routes. I came over here for the purpose of seeing some gentlemen that I wanted to go to Indiana with me, and for the purpose of discussing the politics of that State with men who were familiar with it. General Brady had been chairman of the State committee on our side of the house; Mr. Tyner had also been a prominent leader there, General Raum, and a great many others. I met General Brady, I think, at my room at Willard's Hotel, and we walked up to Chamberlin's to get a glass of champagne. While there Mr. Bosler came in incidentally, or accidentally, and we sat there a few minutes. And that is all there is in that. There was not a word said about mail business, or anything connected with mail routes.

Then, on cross-examination, Mr. Merrick touched him very gently upon that subject. Mr. Merrick said to him:

Q. You were then occupying Indiana?—A. I was then preparing to occupy Indiana; yes, sir.

Now, I do not want to make much comment upon that, but the fact was that Rerdell says that when they came back from Chamberlin's, Dorsey said: "You get ready a statement and make up a case so that we can get remission of the fines; it is arranged with Brady." And it was arranged up there at Chamberlin's. He went from the hotel to Chamberlin's, and in denying that, Dorsey's statement is that it was not about the affidavit, that it was not about the fines, but he went there to consult with General Brady. He left his room at Willard's Hotel, where he could have consulted in peace and quiet, and he went to Chamberlin's and took his seat in the garden and staid there half an hour drinking champagne in a public place, talking with Brady, and accidentally in walked Bosler. The only other man who is interested in fines and deductions was Mr. Bosler. He mentioned Indiana. "Then I was preparing to occupy Indiana." Well, I do not know how far he went in occupying Indiana, but I do know that if he claims that he occupied Indiana, he is stealing the credit from some better men; there is one of them up here in the Pension Office now that deserves more credit for that than Dorsey ever did.

Next he says, "I got Rerdell's affidavit to protect myself." You remember he says, "I won't say positively that I did not prepare a part of it." He came over from New York, got Rerdell to make the affidavit, directed it to the President, and he took it up there. On page 3988, is what he said about it:

Q. You considered that it did not come from a worthy source?—A. Undoubtedly I did.

Q. Did you give it credit?—A. I gave it credit from the collateral evidence I had.

Q. How did you know what had passed between him and James and MacVeagh?—A. Well, I had heard from many sources.

You know he denied that he had any conversation over in New York about that. He says he heard it from another source.

Q. You had heard?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The affidavit accuses James and MacVeagh of having stimulated him, as he says here, to both burglary and larceny in stealing your books.—A. That is the right name for it.

Q. That is the word used in the affidavit. Did you not present that affidavit to the President of the United States, and ask his official action upon it to remove James and MacVeagh?—A. Well, I was in hopes that we would remove them.

Q. Did you not present the affidavit as a truthful representation of the misconduct of his ministers, and ask him to remove them on account of that misconduct?—A. I presented the affidavit, and General Garfield, in the presence of Governor Foster, of Ohio, and Colonel Ingersoll stated that James and MacVeagh had made almost the exact statement contained in that affidavit to him; and I considered it his duty, and he ought to have removed them right then and there.

Q. Did you not present this affidavit to him and demand their removal upon the face of that affidavit?—A. I never *demand*ed the removal of a Cabinet officer.

Q. Did you not present it to him and say to him that those men had behaved as this affidavit set forth, and they ought to be removed?—A. Well, if I did not say so, my tongue did not know its cunning.

“Well, if I did not say so, my tongue did not know its cunning.”

Q. That is what you used it for, is it not?—A. I used it to prevent what I believed to be a most vicious, unlawful, and improper act on the part of two executive officers of this Government.

Then on page 3989 :

Q. Will you please fix the time when you went to Garfield with that affidavit?—

A. I cannot do that accurately.

Q. Who went with you?—A. Colonel Ingersoll.

Q. How often did you go?—A. Oh, well, we dropped up there often.

Q. About that matter?—A. Yes, sir; about that matter. I presume I went there nearly every day.

Now, gentlemen, there is a statement of what he used the affidavit for. He came over to protect himself, and he took the affidavit up to the President of the United States, and there deliberately demanded that the President should dismiss Mr. James from the office of Postmaster-General, and Mr. MacVeagh from the office of Attorney-General, and he says, “If I did not say so, my tongue did not know its cunning.” I presume he did use every effort, and there was nobody knew better than the President of the United States, who is now dead and gone, the utter worthlessness of Stephen W. Dorsey’s claim to that which he was putting forth, and there was nobody who knew better that his duty was to stand by the faithful, the honest, the upright officers of the Government who were throttling this man who was robbing the public Treasury, and not only him alone, but the whole lot of them who were engaged in this conspiracy—Thomas J. Brady, Stephen W. Dorsey, and all the lesser lights. These faithful officers knew that even at that time they were engaged in robbing the Treasury, and Mr. James was applying the pruning-knife of reform, had Brady turned out of office, was cutting off expedition, reducing trips, and bringing it back to where it had started. And nobody knew better than Mr. Garfield the false pretenses that Stephen W. Dorsey was traveling under. Dorsey did not believe that a Cabinet officer could not be removed, and he used the “cunning” of his tongue to accomplish it.

Gentlemen, I believe in always giving the credit to those who deserve credit. I do not think there is anybody in the community that likes to see a man take that which belongs to another. I do not think there is anybody likes to see a man assume that which he did not do. People naturally are not given to talking about their own feats, and it is only once in a while we find a man like Stephen W. Dorsey that claims everything that belongs to everybody else. The men who instituted this investigation and pushed it to its present position, pushing it still, one of them chairman of the committee, who is now dead, but they all knew just where Stephen W. Dorsey stood.

On the 1st of December, 1882, Mr. Dorsey further made a defense of himself. You gentlemen were about being called at that time. It was a good thing to publish an article in a newspaper, and thus get his defense to the jury before they were sworn. A good idea to have the jury have their minds biased. You might have read it before you came here. It might have made a big impression upon you before you were called upon to answer the inquiry of the court whether you had formed any opinion. There is a great deal of method in that sort of thing, making up what is called a newspaper opinion. So he got ready a card, and published it in the New York Herald, and sent it out over the country by means of that paper with its immense circulation, hoping that the article would be copied into all the other journals throughout the country. On page 3818 it appears. I only want to read an extract from it. It is not worth reading the whole of it. Life is too short:

Q. I have before me a copy of the New York Herald of December 2, 1882, which contains what purports to be a card signed by you, covering about two columns, and bearing date December 1, 1882, addressed to the public. I will hand it to you.—A. It is not worth while to do that. If you will read the first few lines I can tell you whether it is mine or not.

Mr. Merrick went on reading:

During a year and a half of consistent and persistent abuse of me I have carefully refrained from saying a word in my own defense. The charges made against me were of such a character that I thought best to submit each and every one of them to a judicial test, that the public might know their truth or falsity.

See, in December, when the case was fixed for trial, the judge was getting the jury together, filling up the panel, Dorsey concluded that as he had exhausted the Executive Mansion and all the Cabinet ministers that he would turn his attention to the public, and concluded that he would let the case go to a judicial test, after keeping most solemnly quiet, for the space of forty-eight hours. There was not a paper published throughout the country from the time of the first trial up to that time that had not something in it about Dorsey:

A. I think I wrote it that far, or dictated it rather.

Q. You say you cannot see it?—A. I say I cannot see it.

Q. Can you not read?—A. I have not read a line for six months; more than that; since July last. For nearly three of the six months I have been confined in a dark room.

The COURT. What page are you reading from?

Mr. KER. That is page 3819. It begins on page 3818, at the bottom:

Q. You say your vision is so much impaired that you cannot read print if you have it before you?—A. No, sir; I could not read the largest headlines.

Q. Can you see how to play a game of billiards?—A. Oh, no, sir.

Q. In that card, at the top of the second column, is the following:

"My answer to that is that Colonel Peck had been for years largely interested in mail contracts, and that at the time of the mail lettings in 1876 he was a large contractor, as the records of the Post-Office Department show."

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that part of it true?—A. I think it is.

Q. It is true, is it?—A. I think it is; that is, I have Peck's statement for it.

Q. What contracts was he interested in?—A. He was interested, I think, with Colonel Chidester; that is, he told me so. I have no knowledge of it myself. He came here with Chidester in 1874, for the purpose of bidding. While I think he did not bid in his own name, I think he was connected with all the bids that Chidester put in.

Q. You say here:

"Colonel Peck had been for years largely interested in mail contracts, and that at the time of the mail letting in 1876 he was a large contractor."

The WITNESS. In 1876?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I guess not.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what it is.

The WITNESS. That is not right, then. There was no mail letting in 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. It does not say he took contracts then. It only designates a period of time. I believe there is a mail letting every year.

"That at the time of the mail letting in 1876 he was a large contractor, as the records of the Post-Office Department show."

Now, do the records of the Post-Office Department show any such thing?—A. I think so, from his statement to me.

Q. I thought you said just now he did not bid in his own name?—A. I said in 1874. You were asking about 1877.

Mr. MERRICK. No, I am not.

The WITNESS. 1876 is a mistake. It is 1877. I did not write that.

Q. It ought to be 1877, ought it?—A. Yes, sir; 1877-'78.

I will not read any further of that. It does not appear to have much bearing. But it turned out upon his cross-examination, when he was pressed home to the mark, that Mr. Peck had one contract, and that was the extent of his large mail contracts, and that was given some time between 1877 and 1878.

Now, there is just another thing. We were bothered with showing these papers to Mr. Dorsey, and he could not see them. Mr. Ingersoll got up and read them to him. He said he could not read the largest headlines. Do you remember, gentlemen, when Mr. Merrick was sitting over here and the witness was on the stand, Mr. Merrick had a paper, and the witness pointed and said, "You have it there in your hand." He could see it better than Mr. Merrick. And whenever he was asked about who read a paper, he answered, "My clerk, Colonel Love," I think he called him. "There he is, sitting over there." I do not know, but it seems to me that it takes pretty good eyes to pick another man out of a crowd. I have pretty good eyes, and I am not always able to tell a paper in Mr. Merrick's hands. I simply mention this to show you that Mr. Dorsey was not exactly always consistent in his statements. Between his want of memory upon some things and his inability to see papers, he managed to have the cross-examination and direct examination so that "I don't remember," "I don't know," "I have no recollection," "I don't think," "I cannot think," "I won't think," "My memory satisfies me," was the sum and substance of the whole. When I get down to some point in this case further on I will then point out some more of Mr. Dorsey's little eccentricities.

The next man I will take up is General Brady, Judge Wilson's client. The first point in General Brady's testimony, speaking about knowing these people and that he went up to Chamberlin's—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] If your honor please, Mr. Ker is just about commencing on a new subject, which will probably take up a good deal of his time, and in view of what the jury suggested awhile ago I would suggest that it is so near the adjourning hour—

The COURT. [Interposing.] Oh, no; we will go on for ten minutes. This clock is a little too fast. It is practically only sitting two hours after the recess.

Mr. WILSON. I know, but the jury suggested that they would like to adjourn.

The COURT. Do the jury say so now?

Mr. GREEN [a juror]. No. I suggested that during the afternoon session, from half past 1 to 4 o'clock, a little intermission of five or ten minutes would rest us.

The COURT. But practically we do not meet after recess until a little before 2. We will go on until 4 o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. I made the suggestion because I thought it might be an accommodation to my brother.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the court.] Do you say that clock is not right?

The COURT. It was too fast the other day.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a little too slow now.

Mr. KER. You know General Brady—they call him general; he was Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and I suppose the “general” will stick to him all his life. General Brady said he went up to Chamberlin’s, and he gives quite a lengthy explanation why he went there, but the substance of it is that he met Dorsey at Willard’s Hotel, and as they do not keep a good bar at Willard’s (a sort of a slander) they went to Chamberlin’s, where they keep a better one. They went up and took a seat in the garden or outside place. They sat there for half an hour. Brady said that he had been chairman of the State committee in Indiana, and Senator Dorsey desired to ask him about how to run the campaign in that State. Now, gentlemen, that was in August and the election came off in October. They sat there discussing how the thing could be done in Indiana. At that time Brady was not chairman of any committee. He had nothing at all to do with it. The whole thing was got together and patched up in order that he should strengthen Dorsey’s claim, so that if there should happen to be any gentlemen on the jury who should have strong Republican proclivities they would capture them and carry them away. And therefore he introduced the Indiana business so as to tell upon that branch of the jury—that they were there for laudable purposes, because certainly it is laudable for any man to do the best he can for the aid of his political party, if it is done honestly. But I do not think they were doing anything but drinking champagne. Then he goes on to explain how it was that he managed the business of conducting the mail. He says, on page 3390 :

Q. What, if anything, do you know as to the manner in which petitions were gotten up and by whom they were gotten up?—A. I know nothing about that whatever. I regarded a petition as of value because of the indorsement given to it, as a rule, by the Member of Congress or Senator. If they indorsed them that was a guarantee to me. If they sent them up, that was a guarantee to me. The recommendation of a member of Congress was of more importance to me than the recommendation or hasty report of a special agent, or anything of that kind. I thought the member of Congress knew the needs of his people better than anybody else. At least, it was his duty to know them.

Then on page 3391 he says further :

Q. Did these gentlemen call upon you personally?—A. They called upon me personally, wrote letters, and did everything that reasonable and sometimes unreasonable men will do to get these things done.

Q. How frequently did they call upon you?—A. I do not know how often; generally every day. I usually had a matinee every morning of delegations, members of Congress and others, coming up to get increased service.

By Mr. MERRICK :

Q. On these nineteen routes?—A. That includes all the routes, the whole ten thousand. There would be a sprinkling of these nineteen routes along with them.

By Mr. WILSON :

Q. What were the considerations or grounds that moved you to make the increases and expeditions referred to in the indictment?—A. They were the considerations that I have already hinted at or suggested—the petitions that were forwarded, the desires of Members of Congress and Senators, the fact that the general policy of the department looked to the making of daily mail everywhere, if it could be possibly brought about, the generous action of Congress in supporting everything we did, the liberal appropriations they made for us, even making good the deficiency when the expenditures unfortunately exceeded the appropriations. We thought we were doing a good thing for the country. We thought so then, we think so yet. Those are the only considerations that influenced us in any way.

Then on the next page he says :

Q. What interest had you in making any of the orders set forth in the indictment, or other orders relating to the routes in question?—A. Only the interest that I had in building up the service, doing what I thought was a good thing. I was particularly interested in the star service. The policy of the department before I came in was known as the Jewellian policy; that is, the spending of all the money appropriated for mail transportation for railroad towns and cities. I believed that country towns and people, depending upon the star service, were entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government that monopolized the right to carry the mail and would not allow anybody else to carry it, under pains and penalties. I believe so yet.

Q. Did you have any personal interest in the matter?—A. No personal interest except that interest. And probably if I had staid in the department long enough I would have had a daily mail everywhere.

There is some truth in that, but I do not know where the Treasury would have been. Then he says further on, on the same page:

Q. In making these orders for increase and expedition referred to in this indictment, what regard had you for productiveness in connection with other circumstances; what weight did you give to that matter?—A. The other circumstances always had more influence with us than productiveness. That matter was frequently discussed by Judge Key and myself.

The "other circumstances" had always more weight, and I do not doubt but the other circumstance of 20 per cent. in the division was the moving consideration in Thomas J. Brady's mind. Then, on page 3393:

The WITNESS. This will have significance: Judge Key discussed the matter with me as to what had been done, and said to me at the conclusion that what I had done was right; and, in answer to my direct question, said I should continue that policy until he notified me to the contrary. Frequently after that, when matters would come up that I did not feel like acting upon myself, I would go to Judge Key and discuss the matter with him. And he was even more liberal than I was. And so it ran along until in 1879, when, if the hundredth part of things were done that we were asked to do, there would have possibly been an excess of expenditures over the appropriations. Then the matter was discussed in the fall of 1879, whether we should go ahead and increase and expedite service as we had been doing, and appeal to Congress to make good the probable deficiency. He authorized it and it was done. The appeal was made to Congress, and Congress sustained it. And there was nothing ever done in the Post-Office Department while I was there as Second Assistant that, to my knowledge, did not receive the consent and assent of the Postmaster-General.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, APRIL 20, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. W. W. KER resumed his argument to the jury on behalf of the prosecution, as follows:

Gentlemen, I was telling you last evening when the court adjourned what Mr. Brady testified to as his policy, and I was reading you some extracts from his testimony. I had read to you his alleged interview with Mr. Key in which Mr. Key told him that he was to go on with this policy, to go on with expedition, to go on with increasing the trips, and to do just as he had done before. Mr. Key was not here to testify. Unfortunately, I believe he is dead.

The COURT. Oh, no; Judge Key is not dead.

Mr. KER. At all events he was not here. It is Mr. Maynard of whom I was thinking. I am mistaken in the name.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Judge Key is more alive than you are.

Mr. KER. Well, he did not testify either to contradict or support Mr. Brady. Brady says that all the routes should have been made daily. I read from page 3402 of his testimony:

Q. Did you consider revenue then?—A. We did to a certain extent in the older States where things were fixed and towns were built up and fenced in, but not always in the new countries. The other circumstances would operate there much more largely.

Q. Do you mean to say you did not consider the revenue at all?—A. I mean to say just what I have said, that in the older States the question of revenue was something to be considered. In the newer countries and territories, and throughout the South largely, where the service was being built up after the war, the question of revenue figured very lightly.

Q. Did you consider it in every case?—A. I cannot say that we did.

Q. You said that you formed an opinion that every star route should be daily, I think?—A. That would have been the result of the policy of the Post-Office Department.

Further on, on the same page:

Q. And you proceeded as far as possible to carry out that policy, did you?—A. I did.

Q. Introducing daily service upon every route?—A. Not upon every route, but as rapidly as we could.

Q. You did as far as possible?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was what you were aiming at, was it?—A. That was the ultimate object.

Now, gentlemen, that becomes interesting as a part of Mr. Brady's policy. That was his statement to you. When you come to analyze the evidence that has been given on these routes, you will see that instead of carrying out his policy of a daily mail he was simply carrying out the policy that was found to be so beneficial to the contractors, that is, to expedite the routes and bring them up from one or two trips to three trips, and leave them there, with quicker time, allowing for that service compensation in excess of the amount that would have paid for a daily mail. When we get to that point I will show you exactly what I mean, and how far Mr. Brady carried out his alleged policy. On pages 3428 and 3429:

Q. Did you seek to make the best bargains for the Government?—A. We had a kind of general rule, you know, about expediting service. We considered that first-class fast service in that western country was worth about $30 a mile, a little more or a little less, depending somewhat upon the condition of the country, whether it was an absolutely new service, or a service running through a country that was partially settled up where there might be ranches and so forth. As a rule we tried not to exceed $30 per mile. These nineteen routes will show a general average of much less than $30 a mile. A few of them are somewhat over, but most of them are a great deal under.

Q. When you say pro rata, you mean pro rata as compared with other routes and not pro rata as compared with the service existing before you made the order, do you?—A. So far as expedition is concerned, I mean by less than pro rata that taking the affidavit of the contractors and figuring as things were figured in the department it would show that they were entitled according to the affidavit to so much money pro rata, but that in almost every instance, or at least in most of them, less than that amount was allowed. On the Bismarck and Tongue River route I remember it was a great deal less.

The COURT. That was assuming that the contractor's affidavit was true.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Q. Now, as to that: did you take any means to ascertain whether the contractor's affidavits were true.

The WITNESS. What do you mean by taking means to ascertain whether a man swore to the truth or not?

Mr. BLISS. Did you assume that the facts were just as these parties stated them?—A. I assumed that the facts were as the man thought they were when he swore to them. In other words, I did not assume that he would commit perjury or anything of that kind.

Q. You assumed that he was not mistaken, and that he stated what were actually facts, did you?—A. I did not say that I assumed that he was not mistaken.

Q. What did you assume, then, in regard to those affidavits?—A. That he was swearing to what he believed to be the truth and the fact.

Q. Did you take any means to find out whether what he believed to be true was in fact true?—A. Only except by my general rule as to what I thought the service was worth in certain sections of the country. In some sections of the country it was very cheap and in others it was very dear.

Now, as I told you, Congress establishes the post routes, and the First Assistant Postmaster-General names the offices to be established on the particular routes that Congress maps out. It was Mr. Brady's duty to put service upon these routes, and wherever an office was to be supplied, to supply that office with mail. After Congress had passed the laws establishing the routes, it became, as I said, his duty to put the service on them. When he was asked upon the stand whether he had complied with the laws of Congress; whether he had established service on those routes and to the offices that had been created, his answer was that he had not. He had not obeyed the acts of Congress, he had not established the service, he had no money to do it; yet at that very time he was granting expedition, and allowing immense sums of money to the people whose names are mentioned with his in this indictment. At that time he refused to give to other post-offices and to other people in other communities any mail facilities at all, and they were compelled to do as best they could, either to carry the mail themselves on horseback or to take their letters to the nearest available point from which they could go to the point that they were designed to reach.

I have already told you that he said his reason why he did not compel these contractors to put the service on promptly was because they were then engaged in the Congressional investigation. That was the first investigation; that was started in 1878 as to these very routes. He says, that because the contractors were here attending to the Congressional investigation, they were unable to go out and put the service on, and therefore, in July and August and September, when he received notices that there was no service put on he would not enforce the law, and would not abrogate their contracts or annul them, but give them a chance to put the service on. Because they were detained here in Washington before the committee. I now read from page 3387 :

Q. Do you recollect what was done with reference to their putting on this service where there had been delay, and what you did in regard to it? And if Mr. Vaile had anything to do with it, state all that you can recollect about it.

This was his examination-in-chief:

A. Well, there was considerable delay. A great deal of the service was reported in the first days of July as not having been put on these Miner, Peck, and other routes. I got out of humor about it, and I said to these gentlemen—

By Mr. MERRICK: [Interposing.]

Q. Which gentlemen?

The WITNESS. —that I could not—

Q. [Interposing.] Which gentlemen?

The WITNESS. —give them much more time.

Mr. MERRICK. I object, your honor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let him state to whom he said it.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. Do you recollect to whom you said that?—A. My impression is that I said it to Mr. Miner and Mr. Boone, but I am not certain whether I spoke to both of them, or only talked to one of them. And I am not certain but I simply said to Mr. Turner, in charge of the section, or to Mr. French, my chief clerk, "Here, give these men some little time now to put this service on, and if they don't do it by a certain time, bust them." That was my usual expression in these cases. Then it was that Mr. Vaile came in. Mr. Vaile was an old contractor, and one of the best in the department, notoriously so for years. When he came in and assumed the responsibility I knew the thing would come around right. I gave them, I think, until some time in August.

Then he sent a telegram to Mr. Vaile. Here it is. I read from page 3389:

Dated: POST-OFFICE DEPT.,
Washington, August 20, 1878.

To H. M. VAILE,
Independence, Missouri:

What service of Miner, Peck, Dorsey, and Watts do you expect to put in operation? Postmaster at Dalles, Oregon, says routes from there not carried and mails lying in office. This cannot be permitted longer.

THOMAS J. BRADY,
2d Ass't P. M. General.

You remember that this telegram was sent on the 20th of August. You will also remember that two days afterwards Vaile telegraphed back that he would "put on all the service excepting that which belonged to Watts."

You will remember in his testimony Mr. Rerdell spoke about the second Congressional investigation. You know he was in trouble about that investigation, and he did not want to go and appear before the committee. That was in 1880. He did not want to produce the books before Congress, so he went up to Mr. Brady and had a conversation with him.

What I now read will be found on page 2268:

A. I had just been subpoenaed to appear before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, which was then making an investigation into the star-route matters. That was a subpoena duces tecum.

Which, of course, means to produce the books and papers.

I went down to the Post-Office Department and told General Brady that I had been subpoenaed to bring all books and papers. He asked me what was the nature of the books that I had. I told him that I had some account books. He remarked that Dorsey was a damned fool for keeping books, and says, "What size are they? How much is in a book?" I said, "They are not very voluminous." (This is the purport—I am giving the general substance of the conversation, and the words, so far as I can remember.) "Well," he says, "can they be copied, or are they too long to be copied—too much to be copied?" I said, "No," I thought not. He said, "How long would it take?" I remarked, "Probably a day or two; may be longer."

Q. What else did he say then?—A. "Well," he says, "I think that will be a good idea." That ended our interview.

You will remember that Mr. Walsh was examined. Mr. Walsh was called here to testify to a conversation that he had with Brady as to some matters existing between themselves. You will remember that Mr. Walsh sat down and wrote a note to General Brady, asking him when he could see him, and telling him that there would be a fire in Sheridan's office. Brady turned the note over, and on a portion of it wrote in lead pencil "I will meet you at 12 o'clock," or half past 12. Accordingly, at the hour named, Mr. Brady went there and met Mr. Walsh. Now, gentlemen, there is no contradiction of that portion of it. General Brady did not deny that this paper was in his handwriting. He admitted that he went to Sheridan's office. He admitted that he had talks with Mr. Walsh on a great many occasions, and that they talked about a good many subjects. Of course this particular thing that I am about to read he denied, but as to all else he admitted it.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, we have no objection to Mr. Ker's making any statement in this argument that he chooses, as it is not pleasant to interrupt him, provided we are to be allowed to correct his statements when we come to argue the case. I have a distinct recollection before that Mr. Ker traveled over a great deal of ground to which we did not object, and that when I came to reply to it your honor said it was not in the case and that I could not reply; that I should have objected at the time. Mr. Ker has just made a statement that General Brady admitted the note to Walsh to be in his handwriting. There is no such testimony in the case.

The COURT. I was not paying very close attention, but I understood him to say to the jury that there was no evidence to the contrary in your proof.

Mr. CARPENTER. He said Brady admitted it.

Mr. KER. No.

Mr. CARPENTER. I would like to have the stenographer's notes read on that point.

The COURT. General Brady was interrogated on that point, and did not deny that that was his signature.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to know what the stenographer has. It is not pleasant to interrupt Mr. Ker, and if we are to be allowed to reply to him I will not object to anything he says.

The COURT. Certainly, in regard to this matter you will have the full liberty of replying. I do not know that General Brady, when he was interrogated as to that note and the indorsement upon that envelope, expressly admitted it. I think it was submitted to him and he did not deny that it was his handwriting.

Mr. HENKLE. My recollection is that he did.

The COURT. Turn to it now and let us settle the matter at once.

Mr. CARPENTER. I merely interrupted Mr. Ker——

The COURT. [Interposing.] I only want to settle this point.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not speak of this point particularly. If we are to be allowed to reply to the statements of counsel then we will never interrupt him. But if we are going to be restricted by and by, and if Mr. Merrick is——

The COURT. [Interposing.] The court is not going to give counsel any pledges at all. The court will meet points only as they arise. Mr. Ker is now commenting upon that note, and the action which took place in consequence of it. I think that is all in the case.

Mr. CARPENTER. Undoubtedly; but he must not misstate the testimony.

The COURT. If you will show how he is misstating the testimony the court will confine him to the testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. If we cannot be permitted to reply I shall insist upon objecting.

The COURT. I suppose that when counsel arises to interrupt opposite counsel on the ground that he is making a misstatement of the testimony, he ought to be prepared to show in what the misstatement consists.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am prepared to say that General Brady did not admit any such thing. The record will not show that he did.

The COURT. Turn to the record, then.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I do not want——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Mr. Ker, please suspend a moment.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let him go on.

The COURT. No. He shall not go a step until this point is settled.

Mr. KER. If your honor please, on page 3381 you will find his examination-in-chief.

Mr. CARPENTER. Read it then. What is it? Read what you say he says.

The COURT. On page 3381 there is no reference to that paper.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor, probably we can abbreviate this a little.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let him go. I think your honor is thinking of the letter about the Chattanooga stock.

The COURT. No; I am thinking about the note that was addressed, or said to have been addressed, by Walsh to Brady, inviting him to an interview.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, I will venture this statement, although of course I do not pretend to be able to carry in my head these four volumes of testimony. In the examination-in-chief not a word was asked him about that note nor was there on the cross-examination, I feel quite sure. I am very sure about the examination-in-chief, and I am almost equally sure about the cross-examination. He was not asked a single question about it.

The COURT. Then it rests upon Walsh's testimony?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. So far as the writing of the note and the return of the note to him is concerned it rests exclusively upon Walsh's testimony.

The COURT. And that was not contradicted by Brady.

Mr. WILSON. No question was asked him about it. If you will read his whole testimony I think it will turn out just as I state. If it should be different, then of course we will admit it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then we will admit it.

The COURT. Go on.

Mr. KER. Now, gentlemen, we will get this matter straight. On page 2206 Mr. Walsh testified as to the note that he sent. I do not want to misstate anything. I want to give you the exact truth. I do not want to enlarge it, nor do I want to detract from it, because in either case it would be an injustice to you. The note is as follows:

DECEMBER 28.

GENERAL: A fire will be made in Sheridan's office at 1 this p. m. Wish you would meet me there at that hour, or at any other time you find convenient.

Yours,

WALSH.

Send word by bearer.

That was written in ink. At the bottom, in pencil, written by General Brady, was:

Will be there at 12.30.

Now Walsh testified, beginning on page 2207, as follows:

Q. What contract was that?—A. From Albuquerque, New Mexico, to Prescott, Arizona.

Q. You held that contract?—A. Yes, sir; at that time. He informed me that he had expedited that very largely, had increased the service; the pay had been largely increased as the result, and that he did not really think that he owed me anything; that he did not see how I thought he could possibly owe me. I reminded him of the fact as I had repeatedly told him, that the contract, even viewed from that stand-point, was unremunerative; that it had been a source of no profit to me; on the contrary, a loss; that he himself was largely instrumental in my ever having entered into it, and that I felt that such increase and expedition as had been accorded me was made under the law. He smiled at that, and asked me if I had not seen cases where petitions, &c., very numerous and largely signed, had not effected any result whatever. He then referred to the fact that after he had cut my trips down from 1876, that all the petitions that had come from that country had not succeeded. He said, in brief, that the matter of petitions was simply to enable him to act within the law, and that any man might have understood that, not seeing half as much as I had. I asked him what he meant by saying what I had seen. He referred me to the Price and Peterson drafts, and said that I ought to have been able to have divined from them what was the custom. I asked him what was the custom; that I still could not understand from those drafts; all I knew was the existence of the drafts, but how they came to be made, and what they were made for, was none of my affair and none of my business; that he had turned them over to me to his credit—

That is, that Brady had turned the drafts over to Walsh to his, Brady's, credit—and that it was not my province as a banker to inquire into the cause of their being made. He told me that my affectation of not knowing what the terms were was rather ridiculous; that I should know. I told him that I did not. He said that the amount that he exacted as a rule was 20 per cent. of the amount of the pay that was increased [the total increase of pay over the original contract]—20 per centum of that multiplied by the term of the contract.

That was Walsh's testimony in relation to this interview with Brady, and what Brady said about the petitions and what Brady said about his custom of taking 20 per cent. of the amount that he allowed for expedition. Of course that was over and above the contract price. When Brady came to be examined in chief, (the testimony that he gave in that respect will be found on page 3381), the only time when he mentioned Mr. Walsh's name while he was being examined in chief:

Q. Do you know John A. Walsh?—A. I do.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. I first met Mr. Walsh in New Orleans in the winter of 1875-'76.

Q. Did you hold any official relation to the Government when you first met him?—A. I was supervisor of internal revenue.

Q. State whether or not it was in your official capacity that you met Mr. Walsh?—A. I met him in my official capacity. He came to my room in answer to a supervisor's subpoena.

Q. When did you next meet him after you met him in New Orleans?—A. Well, I cannot say; it was some time in the spring or summer of 1877; possibly during the Presidential contest before the commission. I am not certain, however.

Q. Did you hear his testimony given in this case?—A. I did.

Q. State to the jury whether you ever at any time had such a conversation with him as he detailed in that testimony.—A. I never had any such conversation with Mr. Walsh at any time or place in the world, or anything resembling it.

Q. Did he ever exhibit to you at any time or place any notes that you had given to him?—A. He never did.

Q. Any promissory notes, I mean?—A. Never.

Q. Did he ever hold any of your promissory notes?—A. He never held a promissory note or obligation of mine of any kind.

Q. Did you, at the time of any conversation between you and him at any place, carry away any promissory notes that he held and you had executed?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you at any time or place ever say to him that you received from contractors 20 per cent. or any other per cent.—

A. [Interrupting.] I never said anything of that kind. The whole thing is a lie made out of whole cloth. There is scarcely a word of truth in the whole statement from beginning to end.

Q. I want to ask you the question nevertheless. I want to ask you now if at any time you said to him that you received 50 per cent. or any other per cent. for the remission of fines?—A. I never said anything of that kind or anything from which it could be deduced.

There is his full and entire testimony upon that subject given in chief, and in answer to the very broad interrogatory as to the conversation or statement made by Walsh under oath. He says here:

There is scarcely a word of truth in the whole statement, from beginning to end.

“Scarcely”—he does not say “none at all,” but “scarcely a word of truth.” Then on page 3561 he was cross-examined, and I will call your attention again, gentlemen, to the fact that Brady never said that he had not written on the bottom of that note, as Mr. Walsh testified. He never denied that he had received that note:

Q. At the time testified to by him did you not have a conversation with him at the place named by him?—A. I cannot say as to the dates. I frequently had conversations with Mr. Walsh at General Sheridan's house. He was frequently there. It was one of his loafing places.

Then again, at the bottom of the page :

Q. You had several conversations, you say, with Mr. Walsh ?—A. Well, yes ; I could not say how many, but not about anything special.

On page 3581, center of the page :

Q. You spoke of this house of Sheridan's as the place where you dropped in. Who was the owner of the house ?—A. I do not know.

Q. Sheridan lived in it ?—A. Sheridan lived in it ; it was his private residence. His family was away most of the time, and it was convenient and we dropped in frequently. I think Mr. Walsh was there a great deal more than ever I was.

Now, there is the answer that Mr. Brady made to Walsh's testimony. I rather think that the counsel misunderstood what I said about the conversations that Brady had with Walsh when he met him at Sheridan's house ; and I will say again, Brady does not deny that he received the note that Mr. Walsh testified to, and which was brought here and exhibited to you, gentlemen of the jury. It is certain that they had some business relations together, because you will remember about the Chattanooga stock and that "ginger" letter which was read to you, in which Mr. Brady explained what he wanted to get from Mr. Walsh. Now, Walsh had purchased at Hatch & Foote's, in New York, three hundred shares of Chattanooga stock, at the instigation of Mr. Brady. He paid $80 a share for this stock, which, of course, would make the purchase price $24,000. That stock Brady asked Mr. Walsh to loan him, and sent the "ginger" letter, stating that he wanted to borrow some "ginger"—wanted to borrow this stock from Mr. Walsh, and he wanted to give Mr. Walsh, as security for the loan of this stock, his own individual promissory note. Mr. Walsh refused to do it. Brady testified that after the stock was purchased it ran down, and that Walsh told him that he (Walsh) had sold the stock out some time after he had asked him for it.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no, Mr. Ker ; you are mistaken about that. Of course you do not intend to improperly state the evidence.

Mr. KER. Afterwards ?

Mr. WILSON. No, you are mistaken. When he asked him the loan of the stock, Walsh had already sold out.

Mr. KER. I will read it to you, so that there will be no mistake about it. It is at the bottom of page 3580 :

Q. You did not get the stock from Mr. Walsh ?—A. I did not. Mr. Walsh informed me he had sold it.

Q. You offered to give Mr. Walsh your obligation if he would loan you the stock. You say in the letter :

"I will give you my obligation."

A. I did.

Q. What do you mean by obligation—note ?—A. Anything that he would have required.

Q. Then you were seeking to borrow of Mr. Walsh what was worth about from twenty-one to twenty-four thousand dollars in the market, were you ?—A. I wanted to borrow three hundred shares of Chattanooga.

Q. It was then worth from twenty-one to twenty-four thousand dollars in the market, was it not ?—A. That is what we thought it was worth.

Q. It was then selling at that, was it not ?—A. Yes, sir ; if we could sell it. The trouble was whenever we tried to sell it it ran down.

Q. I understand you that that was the only money transaction or attempted money transaction you had with Walsh ?—A. I said so ; yes, sir.

At that time General Brady says that he, himself, held three thousand shares of this Chattanooga stock, which, at that calculation, would amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of $240,000 worth of Chattanooga stock that Brady was then in possession of. He said he was loaded up with it, and wanted to get this stock from Walsh in order to assist in raising the price of it in some way that I do not think General Brady could explain satisfactorily. I know he did not explain it satisfactorily, and I suppose he could not offer an explanation as to how he intended to raise the stock by borrowing Walsh's three hundred shares, when he already had three thousand of his own.

You know, after leaving the revenue service, where he had met Walsh in 1875 or 1876, according to the testimony of Mr. Brady himself, he had become Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he held that office until April, 1881, when he left the office, during Mr. James's administration. The position in the revenue service that he held was, as you know, a comparatively small one. I do not know what the pay is, but at all events, it strikes me that a millionaire would hardly hold it. A man who was worth a quarter or half million dollars would hardly hold such a position as that. But afterwards, in 1876, he became Second Assistant Postmaster-General; he would rather, I suppose, take the position of Second Assistant Postmaster-General. But after he became Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he got into operations that involved this large amount of money, $240,000 worth of Chattanooga stock.

And in addition to that he made some other ventures that he told you of. On page 3589 he says:

A. I learned the printing trade, or, at least, partly learned it, when I was a boy, and always had something of a hankering for newspapers. I have owned the Muncie Times for a long time. I went into the Republican originally largely as a public benefactor.

The Republican newspaper here:

I thought to make it a great deal better paper than it had ever been or that Washington had ever had. I bought it to make Mr. Kilbourn manager of it, and Mr. Gorham editor; and I think I succeeded in making it a much better paper than it had ever been before or has ever been since.

Gentlemen, this is a fine commentary upon the gentlemen who are running the paper at the present time, and it also shows you the light in which General Brady regarded himself and his ability as an editor—made it “a better paper than it ever was before or has been since.”

The COURT. Mr. Gorham is the editor.

Mr. KER. [Continuing:]

Q. You found it very profitable, did you not?—A. No; I can't say that I did. But I got out finally about what I put in. I think you had something to do with it.

Directing that remark to Colonel Bliss, who was interrogating him. Colonel Bliss replied:

I had $1,000 to do with it.

A very small amount.

Q. Besides the Republican, you bought the Capital?—A. I loaned Mr. Buell, originally, the money to buy The Capital. He had a very grand idea about what he could do with The Capital—how profitable he could make it. Finally it did not pan out as well as he thought for, and I had to take the paper off his hands.

Q. When did you loan him this money?—A. I do not remember distinctly. It was some time early in 1880, in February, March, or April, along there some time.

Q. Pending the Congressional investigation, was it not?—A. I believe that had not yet been closed. It is possible the deficiency had been voted, though the general bill had not been passed.

Q. The investigation was still going on, was it not?—A. I think so.

Q. Then you invested also in the Critic, did you not?—A. That was in 1881.

Further down, on page 3590:

Q. The Critic still holds on, does it not?—A. The Critic is still, you might say, under my control; that is, I have a controlling amount of the stock.

Q. And have had it ever since you bought it, have you not?—A. Practically, yes. There have been some changes in the mere matter of the way the stock was held, but practically it is the same.

Q. Have you told us all your newspaper interests now?—A. So far as I now remember. I believe that covers my experience in newspapers.

There, gentlemen, he tells you that he had one paper, the Muncie Times, in Indiana; that he purchased the Capital at the time the Congressional investigation was going on; that he purchased the Republican, and that finally he purchased the Critic.

Mr. WILSON. No, Mr. Ker; you are again mistaken about the facts.

Mr. KER. How so?

Mr. WILSON. He did not say he purchased the Capital while the investigation was going on. He said that he loaned Buell the money to purchase the Capital before the investigation closed, and afterwards he had to take the Capital off Buell's hands, because Buell could not pay him the money.

Mr. KER. Here it is.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; just exactly as I say.

Mr. KER. Here it is.

Mr. WILSON. He reads it, and then misstates it. It is precisely as I say. [To Mr. Ker.] Go ahead.

Mr. KER. Let me read it again for you:

Q. Pending the Congressional investigation, was it not?—A. I believe that had not yet been closed. It is possible the deficiency had been voted, though the general bill had not been passed.

Q. The investigation was still going on, was it not?—A. I think so.

Any doubt about that?

Mr. WILSON. Not the slightest doubt about it. But he commences after the material matter has been testified to by him. What was done now?

The COURT. He says he loaned the money to Buell.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; that is what I say, that he loaned the money to Buell to buy the paper; then further along he says that Buell not being able to pay him he had to take the paper off his hands. The time Mr. Ker has been reading about is before this investigation closed, that is, since he made the loan, but he acquired the Capital afterwards in satisfaction of the debt. There is no use in misstating his testimony.

The COURT. He does not say when he acquired the Capital. He says:

Q. When did you loan him this money?—A. I do not remember distinctly. It was some time early in 1880, in February, March, or April, along there some time.

Mr. WILSON. And afterwards he states——

The COURT. [Interposing.] He afterwards said he had to take the paper off his hands.

Mr. WILSON. Exactly.

The COURT. But he does not say when he took the paper off his hands.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. Mr. Ker said that he had bought the Capital pending that investigation. I say he said no such thing.

The COURT. He did not exactly say that. Go on, Mr. Ker.

Mr. KER. Well, he had the Muncie Times. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. WILSON. Not the slightest.

Mr. KER. He had the Republican; any doubt about that?

Mr. WILSON. Not the slightest.

Mr. KER. He loaned Buell the money. Any doubt about that?

Mr. WILSON. Not the slightest.

Mr. KER. Does anybody know who Buell is? Everybody knows him. Brady did not take him for a millionaire. The money was loaned to Buell, Brady says. The Capital was purchased during the pendency of the investigation in Congress. Buell had not the means to pay Brady, and Brady took it off his hands after the investigation closed, if you please. It does not make any difference to me; any way at all that will suit you. He took it off Buell's hands. Buell had not the money to pay for it. But at all events it was purchased at that time, and immediately afterwards, when Brady was turned out of office, along came the Capital to be put alongside of the Republican, the Capital being a Sunday paper, so that Brady could, every day of the week, make a defense of his case. Gentlemen, there was not a second-hand newspaper anywhere in this city that was for sale that Brady did not buy. There were some of them that were not for sale, and some were not worth buying, and those he rented. They were not the only papers that he had control of. Every paper throughout the country that he could rent he rented. And in addition to that there was not a newspaper correspondent who was impecunious and without character that he did not buy up also. Everything to manufacture newspaper capital for Brady, who was pursuing the same course with the general public that his colleague, Senator Dorsey, was pursuing when he went on his impudent mission to the White House.

Mr. WILSON. Now, if your honor please, I simply want to know whether Mr. Ker is to be permitted to state things entirely outside of the testimony in this case. As to what he has just said, I undertake to say there is not one syllable of testimony in this case—not a syllable. If Mr. Ker is going to testify, let him be put on the stand and sworn. I shall have no objection to his swearing if we can cross-examine him.

The COURT. You say there is not a syllable of that in the testimony?

Mr. WILSON. Not as to what he has just said. He has said that he bought up the newspaper correspondents; who has testified about that? He has said that he bought up every second-hand paper in this town that was for sale; who has testified to that? He has said that he has bought up the newspapers throughout the country; who has testified to that?

Mr. KER. Rented them, I said.

Mr. WILSON. Rented them; who has testified to that? It is simply a question, if your honor please, whether the counsel for the Government is to stand here and state to the jury that as to which the court must know there has not been a syllable of testimony.

The COURT. Yes, the court knows that there has not been any evidence of that kind.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The COURT. Counsel will confine himself to the evidence in the case in regard to the newspapers.

Mr. MERRICK. I have just come in, having been at the office of the Attorney-General this morning, but I see the scope of the discussion. The evidence is that Brady himself purchased Buell and purchased the Capital and Critic.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. There is no controversy about that.

The COURT. Mr. Ker expatiated rather widely after that for a time about other newspapers in the country, and about impecunious correspondents that had been bought up. There is no evidence upon that. It is a flight of imagination, not founded upon the evidence in the case.

Mr. WILSON. I say it is not a flight of imagination, if your honor please. It is a misrepresentation of the evidence in this case, and that is why I protest against it. I have no objection to his rhetoric. But I shall not interrupt him further. He may make what misstatements he chooses.

Mr. MERRICK. I am very glad to hear counsel object, but I am sorry to hear him put it in the shape in which he does. I am glad to hear the objection, because we will now understand, from this objection, that in the course of the discussion counsel must be limited strictly to the testimony in the case. And I hope my brother who has just spoken with so much vehemence will recollect the rule, the enforcement of which he has asked, and which on all occasions has not been observed by him, though I do not believe he ever wantonly failed to observe it.

Mr. WILSON. The counsel need not read me a lecture. If I ever transgress the rule of court and the proprieties of this place by stating anything to the jury that is not a fact proven in the case, or which I have a right reasonably to argue is a fact proven in the case, I hope the court will at once reprove me for doing that. No counsel has a right to do it, and I do not think that I am amenable to any criticism of that kind.

Mr. MERRICK. At the last trial, during my absence, my brother criticised very severely the circumstance of the relation of counsel to a certain paper in this city, about which there was not one word of testimony.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, we have nothing to do with that. Mr. Ker, you will clip the wings of your imagination a little, and confine yourself strictly to the evidence in the case.

Mr. KER. I am very sorry that my temper is not so even as your honor's. I have been receiving from these papers their evident attentions. I know your honor has also, but your honor bears it better than I do.

The COURT. Those newspapers have not done anybody any harm except their owners, I guess.

Mr. MERRICK. I think it is turning out to be the case now. One of them is moribund at present.

Mr. KER. I do not want to indulge in flights of imagination, as his honor says. But I want to say this to my friend, Judge Wilson. I am sorry that I annoyed him at all, very sorry indeed, because there is no gentleman here whom I esteem more than I do him.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you.

Mr. KER. I entertain the highest esteem for him, and if it were ever my misfortune to get into trouble, I do not know of any gentleman whom I would sooner have to represent me than Judge Wilson; he is honest, manly, and able.

Mr. WILSON. Now, your honor, I must take back everything I have said.

Mr. MERRICK. It is the first time the judge has ever heard that about himself; he did not know it before.

Mr. WILSON. I am very much like Mr. Lincoln was at one time when having a discussion with Mr. Douglas. Mr. Douglas told the people he wanted them to listen to Mr. Lincoln, because he was a kind, amiable, intelligent, and able gentleman. Mr. Lincoln immediately replied that he was very thankful for that. Said he: "I like Hoosier gingerbread; I like it better and get less of it than any man I know of." [Laughter.]

Mr. KER. [Resuming.] The next one I will take up is John W. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey in some things takes a prominent part, and in others a minor part in this transaction. I will give you his general testimony.

He says that he kept store at Benson, Vermont, a sort of hardware store, and then he traveled for some company; that he came to Washington in 1878. That was the first time he came here about mail contracts. You know the advertisement was in 1877, and they were getting everything ready at the time. In January, 1878, John W. Dorsey came over to Washington. He told you also that immediately after they had received these contracts Congress investigated the matter, in 1878. In this connection I want to read what Mr. Boone says, at page 1530:

Q. What did John W. Dorsey say to you at that time?—A. He said he wished he was out of the business and at home.

Now, gentlemen, remember that he said pretty near the same thing to Moore. When it came to his examination, he denied that he had ever said anything of that kind to Moore. But when it comes to Boone, who testifies to a somewhat similar conversation, Mr. John W. Dorsey does not deny it. On page 1531 Mr. Boone says:

A. Pending that investigation in Congress, I did say to Stephen W. Dorsey to keep John W. Dorsey and John R. Miner away; that I would attend to the business; that they knew nothing about it.

At that time, of course, Boone was in the concern, and his advice to Stephen W. Dorsey, who was then a Senator, was to keep those two men away (Miner and Dorsey) and he, Boone, would attend to the business. John W. Dorsey testifies that he started West in April, 1878. He also gave you some general testimony as to the different amounts of money he had, some $500 or $800, and he says:

I gave the money to Stephen W. Dorsey.

Upon being pressed to know why he gave it to Dorsey, and not to his partner with whom he had a written contract—not to Miner or anybody that was connected with him in the mail business—he said that he gave it to his brother; that “there was a private understanding” between them. He never put a dollar into the concern, so far as the testimony goes, and he never paid it out, like some others, for postage-stamps or printing, but he handed it over to Stephen W. Dorsey. Before he went out West he had made an arrangement with his brother. He says: “I gave my brother directions to sell out my interests for $10,000.” Before he started West, before there was any service put on, and with these contracts were taken at such low figures, John W. Dorsey had raised his interest up to $10,000, and that is the price he wanted to get for it.

He says, also, that he had a conversation with Vaile, and in that conversation he told Vaile that he was willing to sell out, and Vaile said to him, “How much will you take? How will $10,000 do?” John W. Dorsey replied that he “would think about it.” That is on page 4102. At that early stage he had it pretty well fixed in his mind that $10,000 was the extent of his interest and he wanted that sum for his interest in the business. I forget exactly how much he put in; $2,700 or $3,000 I think was the amount he put in the business.

Then, gentlemen, after Stephen W. Dorsey had bought John Dorsey out, had given him $10,000, and made the arrangement with Vaile and Miner by which the interests were to be divided—I want to read you what John W. Dorsey says upon this subject, because it becomes a matter that is of interest to you, and I know it will be, for when his honor comes to instruct you I am sure he will tell you, as I said yesterday, that they could not divide up the routes among them, and have an agreement to supply all the ammunition to enable others to defraud the Government, and then make a claim that they had no interest in it. At that very time they each was furnishing the other with the papers and other means by which the fraud was kept going along. They were still in the conspiracy, and they were still participating in it. Here is what he said, at page 4105:

Q. At the time you sold out, was there any understanding about your making papers?—A. That was a part of the agreement. I was to sign all the necessary papers to carry on the business.

Then, at page 4124:

By the COURT:

Q. You agreed to sign what?—A. All the necessary papers to carry on the business.

His honor saw the point at once and asked him about it to get a full and clear explanation, and he gave it to his honor just as clear as I have read it—that he was to sign “all the necessary papers to carry on the business,” and we will show you that he did sign all the necessary papers to carry on the business, and when he did not do it somebody else did it for him.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Any papers that the parties having the routes might ask you to sign you agreed to sign?—A. All the necessary papers, and they claimed that these affidavits were necessary papers.

Q. Was that your agreement, or was it the agreement of all the parties that were engaged in that settlement?—A. I had nothing to do with that. I sold out for so much money, and that ended my connection with it.

Q. You sold out for so much money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In consideration of so much money you transferred all your interest in these contracts, and further agreed to execute any necessary papers in the course of carrying out those contracts?—A. Yes, sir; that was the agreement as I understood it.

So much for John W. Dorsey.

The next one whose general acts will be investigated is John R. Miner, (I do not see General Henkle here.) I suppose, gentlemen, you have a sort of recollection of John R. Miner. He was on the stand, and showed that he was a man of some intelligence, quick and nervous; he could neither sit nor stand, and when he got into any sort of a tight place, or when he said anything that he thought was peculiarly smart, he would shut his mouth and eject some spittle through his teeth. I often wondered how his ho'r stood it, because I saw him moving his feet away to keep from being hit. Miner went on and gave his testimony. In some respects it was very unique testimony, and will make very interesting reading. You know he says he used to come to Washington every winter; that he used to come here to get away from the air of the lakes; that he came here for “fun and recreation.” He had been in a manufacturing business, he said; he does not tell us what he was manufacturing; I think he said something, though, about wagons-pokes. He was in the manufacturing business in Sandusky, Ohio, and was the figure-head in a corporation to which Stephen W. Dorsey belonged. He said he was a director, a mere nominal thing, and, therefore, I suppose he was a figure-head, just as in some of these corporations, run by one man with the names of half a dozen attached. He had no interest in it, was only a director. He had formed the acquaintance of Stephen W. Dorsey. I do not know at what period of time it was that he formed the little acquaintance he had with the United States officials. You see he had branched out. He was a man that liked to make money; a man of energy and ambition. He had dropped the spoke business, had gone into the whisky business, and while he was in the whisky business the United States paid its respects to him in the shape of a bill of indictment. Of course he says he was not near the place when the thing was done. Well, I suppose that is likely. It does not require a man to be near the place when he sends somebody else to do it. But he was brought up before the United States court while he was in Sandusky, a little irregularity in whisky—a conspiracy, I suppose, it would be called. I do not know what he would call it. At all events, when the time came he paid $1,800 to the Government rather than be dragged through a trial. A very sensible thing for him to do. He paid the $1,800, and there was a nol. pros. entered in that case.

Well, this was the man that came on to visit Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey at that time was a United States Senator, was a man of consequence in the community, a man who lived well, had a nice house, a fine establishment, and moved in good society. However that did not affect Mr. Miner at all, because when Miner came to Washington he hunted up Mr. Dorsey and always put up at Dorsey's house. Now, I do not know what claim Miner had upon Dorsey, but he must have had some claim that brought them together, because I do not think that Stephen W. Dorsey, bad as he is, is the kind of a man to associate with and bring into his family a man like Miner. However, Miner put up there, and he must have had some hold upon Dorsey, because, when the time came, Dorsey selected Miner as the man who was to go into these contracts.

Miner says that he knew Peck, that he talked to him in the spring of 1877 about going into the mail business. You remember the way he expressed himself—"Yes; I had a talk with Peck about it in the spring of 1877, and we concluded to take a fly at it." He did not explain what he meant by "fly." I suppose he meant to take it as a matter of course, one of those little things that a man sometimes takes in as a matter of business. A half a million or so did not amount to anything—take a fly at it. He came to Washington the 1st of November, 1877, and commenced to help Boone with the bids. You know he says he came here upon a letter from Stephen W. Dorsey. My recollection of the testimony is that Boone sent him out a lot of those blank proposals to fill up and a letter; that he answered the letter to Boone, and came on immediately after the letter, arriving here about November 1, 1877. There was an arrangement by which bondsmen were to be obtained. I told you, yesterday, that Boone said he was to furnish one bondsman, and did it. But Miner was also to furnish a bondsman. That becomes interesting when you remember the testimony of Stephen W. Dorsey, that Peck was a man who could have given bonds to the extent of a million dollars in Arkansas. But still they had to fall back upon Boone for one, and wanted Miner to furnish the other.

[At this point Mr. Henkle came into the court-room.]

Now, on page 4159, I want to read to you what Miner said in that connection:

Q. And you were to furnish your own bondsmen?—A. I intended to and endeavored to, but did not succeed, however.

Q. Why did you not succeed in procuring bondsmen?—A. Well, my acquaintances did not understand the business, and thought they were going to put a mortgage on their houses and lots when they went on bidding-bonds for mail contracts, and I did not press them particularly hard.

There is the estimate which his friends, neighbors, and acquaintances placed upon John R. Miner. [To Mr. Henkle.] General, you are here.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes, I am here to hear what you have to say.

Mr. KER. They thought they were going to put a mortgage on their houses; they did not understand the mail-contract business; but they did understand John R. Miner, and he could not get a solitary one to go on his bond. But, of course, after trying them all, he "did not press them particularly hard."

Then he says that he met Rerdell in 1877. He says that he came on here to Washington, went to Dorsey's house, and met Rerdell "hanging around Dorsey's house with some of these Arkansas fellows"—hanging on to Dorsey.

Another thing he says is that he sent Moore out to put on service. Well, that part of it is true, with the exception that Stephen W. Dorsey gave him some instructions, and Miner gave him some more, particularly about getting up petitions and fixing them so that some of the signatures could be torn off and pasted on to others. You saw some of those in evidence, and I will take pleasure in showing them to you again. Then he goes on to contradict Moore seriatim. I want to do him the justice to say that he stood up like a man, and said that what Moore said was not true; that there was "not any truth in it at all;" "none whatever," he says. On page 2223 is what Mr. Rerdell said:

Q. State all that conversation between you and Miner, what he said and what you said.—A. He stated that the service was in a bad condition; that in some cases they had failed to make subcontracts, and in other places they had not prepared for stocking it; that they could not do anything as long as Mr. Boone remained in; that General Brady was very hostile to Mr. Boone; that Boone talked too much, and that they would not be able to do anything until they got him out; that Mr. Vaile was coming in in place of Boone; that Mr. Vaile was an old contractor, and had plenty of money. He asked my opinion about taking in Mr. Vaile, and what I thought about how Mr. Dorsey would approve of his coming in.

Q. Did he say anything of Vaile's relations to Brady?—A. He did.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. HENKLE. I object to that.

The COURT. The objection is overruled.

Q. What did he say?—A. He stated that Mr. Vaile was very close to General Brady.

Of course Miner contradicts that, and says it is not so. But it bears out what was testified to by Boone, and the general arrangement as testified to by all the others. Brady was hostile to Boone, and the best evidence of Brady's hostility to Boone was that Boone had been a contractor for years, held eleven hundred post routes, and never had one expedited from the time he began to the present day. Eleven hundred—one-ninth of the whole star postal service of the United States, and not one route ever expedited. Dorsey held thirty-three, and there was not one of them, I suppose, that was not expedited to the fullest extent.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not so, either.

Mr. KER. He says he met Vaile in 1878. On page 4162 is where he testifies:

Q. When did you first make the acquaintance of Mr. Vaile, and where?—A. I probably met Mr. Vaile in the spring of 1878, though the acquaintance was merely casual, and made no great impression on my mind. I next met him about the 20th of July, when I returned from Denver; the 23d or 24th probably, according to some checks that are in evidence.

Here, you see, he was in Denver, the very place where Moore says he met him, and where he had the conversation in which he said, "They are all good affidavit men, and they propose to make a pretty good thing out of it."

Q. Did you consult him with regard to your business?—A. I did.

Q. Here?—A. Here.

Q. Why did you consult him?—A. Well, I was ready to consult anybody that would help me out of the difficulty I was in.

Q. What was your difficulty?

This was his examination-in-chief.

A. I had a large amount of service that had not been started, and I was threatened with being declared a failing contractor, and was without the available means to put the service in operation, and was trying to give it away to anybody that would take it as a holy gift. Among others, I offered to give it to him. He declined to take it.

He was then being examined in chief, and he says that he offered to give it to Vaile "as a holy gift." I do not know what he means by a holy gift, but when you come to see what he did do, I think it amounted to a "wholly cut out" for Stephen W. and John W. Dorsey; and if it had not been that the Senatorial term expired, and that Stephen W. Dorsey was not the kind of a man to suffer himself to be cut out, I think it would have been a gift that would have wholly left them all out. On page 4166 he says, speaking about Boone going out:

A. He went out for the purpose of making a place for whomever had means to carry on the service. Vaile and Boone were not friendly, and had not been for some years. I could not mix them.

You see how he stuck to his old whisky business—"I could not mix them." He had been used to mixing whisky, but Vaile and Boone were too much for him. [Laughter.]

Q. Did you inform Mr. Vaile at that time that Mr. Boone had had any interest in these contracts?—A. I did not. I did not inform him of anything that I thought would keep him out.

Q. Why did you not tell him the fact about Boone?—A. I was afraid it might keep him out, and I was very anxious to get him in.

A friend of Stephen W. Dorsey's, who used to come to his house and stop for fun and recreation, was anxious to get Vaile in. Then, he says that he met Brady—I am giving you this as it comes along, according to the dates. At the bottom of page 4170:

Q. When did you first make the acquaintance of General Brady, and how?—A. As to acquaintance, I was in General Brady's office in the summer of 1877 with regard to a patent mail-fastener—

He had been in the patent business, too—and saw him perhaps three or four minutes, and was referred to the head of the division that had charge of that matter. The next time I saw him was in July, 1878, when I went in to see him to try and explain why the service had not been begun, and got bluffed near out of my boots—

He went first to see about the mail-fastener, and Brady took no stock in it, but handed him over to the chief of the division. The second time when he went to see him, I suppose they had a little game of skin euchre, and Brady "bluffed him out of his boots"— and I never spoke to him again, I think, until the spring of 1881, when I went to see him about a box at the theater.

I suppose he wanted a dead-head pass to the theater, and went to Brady about it, as he was a newspaper man. On page 4164 is a short paragraph which I will read to you, to show how Mr. Miner testified:

Q. Did you consult Mr. Dorsey and Mr. Peck about making that contract?

That is, the contract with Vaile:

A. I wrote to them immediately after Mr. Vaile gave me these propositions to put in, asking their assent to such an arrangement if I could effect it, and they responded favorably.

On page 4225—you see a little time had elapsed, and it was not quite such plain sailing in the cross-examination as it had been when he had General Henkle to talk to him in his mild and persuasive way—here is what he says in regard to that:

Q. Did John W. Dorsey and Peck know anything about the execution of those subcontracts, or did you do it in fraud of their interest?—A. I do not remember whether they knew anything of it or not. I did it by virtue of the power of attorney which they had given to me for the purpose of protecting Mr. Vaile's interests.

Now, there is his testimony. In one place he says he did notify them and they agreed, and in the other place, on cross-examination, he says he did not notify them. He had forgotten what he had testified to before, so he answered the last question in that way.

In the last part of April, 1878, there was a quarrel because of Vaile's coming in and filing the subcontracts. I read from page 4168 :

We had filed the subcontracts of the carriers on other routes, thereby cutting out the drafts to the bank and allowing the notes to go to protest. Mr. Dorsey was very angry that that had been done, and his credit impaired. They were both of them very obstinate men, and the fire flew pretty lively. I was sort of between them. Dorsey was angry at me because I staid with Vaile, and there was a grand row.

The fire flew and there was a grand row. Then, on page 4225 :

Q. That quarrel was going on all through the winter of 1878-'79, was it?—A. That quarrel was hot during December. During January and February, so far as I now remember, there was no meeting between the parties at all. They kept apart from each other so far as I know. I know I did not see Senator Dorsey during January and February. I say I know it. It is my best recollection that I did not see him, and so far as I know Mr. Vaile did not see him.

On page 4169 he gives us the terms of the division :

A. We took a list of the routes, and estimated their value or non-value (plus or minus). We then drew straws or cuts for choice, and each selected in turn a route. When we had gotten through we charged each party where routes were of any value, and gave them credit where they were a loss. Mr. Vaile had 40 per cent., Dorsey 30, and myself 30. This occurred some time in March, 1879, previous to the 29th, as I know by some memoranda. Then, after the quarter was ended, and the expenses of the routes that we were running upon had been approximately ascertained, together with the fines, deductions, &c., we apportioned the debts in the same way each agreeing to pay the same percentage of the debts. And finally, on the 5th of May, as I see by some papers that are in evidence, the actual, final separation was completed.

Again he says that after that they signed the papers On page 4184 :

Q. After the separation did you write any letters to the department on business pertaining to either of your routes, and sign the name of Peck or John W. Dorsey?—

A. After the separation on routes that belonged to Vaile and myself, if Peck or Dorsey were the contractors, I signed their names, as I was empowered to do, by power of attorney. I wrote no letters to the department upon routes that belonged to Dorsey after the separation.

Q. Do you know whether anybody took the same liberty with your name upon routes upon which you had been contractor, and which passed in the division to Dorsey?—A. It was so testified in this case, and it is correct. Mr. Dorsey's agent, whoever he might be, was authorized to sign my name in correspondence on any route upon which I was the original contractor, but which now belonged to Dorsey.

Q. Did you authorize him to use your name in that way?—A. I did.

Q. And you were authorized by power of attorney to sign the name of these other gentlemen?—A. I was.

Q. Did you use the names of either Peck or Dorsey for any other than these formal purposes?—A. I never used it except in letters—correspondence.

Q. Did you write their names?—A. I never wrote their names to any paper other than letters which I was authorized to write.

He says that he put in $800 or $1,000, and at the division he got 30 per cent. He having put in $1,000, the contracts only having been awarded at that time, no service having been put on, and nothing at all having been done by him except probably to sign his name, no bondsmen furnished, or anything of that kind, he was asked how it came that he got 30 per cent. of the routes. He said, "Well, I probably made a pretty good bargain." He had no other explanation to make. John W. Dorsey put in $3,000, according to his story, and there was Peck's interest. Miner got 30 per cent. of the routes and Vaile got 40 per cent., and only 30 per cent. of the routes went to Stephen W. Dorsey. You will remember, gentlemen, that in this division Vaile said to Miner that Miner could go with Stephen W. Dorsey, or he could go with him, Vaile. Miner said, "We took our routes, Vaile's 40 per cent. and my 30 per cent., and we put them together." That was the way that Miner took to recompense the man whose bread and butter he had eaten free. When the time came in which they were hostile to each other, when they came to have the division, when they were quarreling, when they were fighting, then Miner took sides with the wealthy Vaile and deserted his old-time friend Stephen W. Dorsey. He left Dorsey and went with Vaile. He said near the close of his cross examination, when he was cornered so very tightly about Captain Jackson going up and talking to him, "Why, he came and wanted me to plead guilty." I think, gentlemen, if the Government had been disposed to give him a show at all, he would have deserted Vaile and the whole crowd, and turned on them.

I want to show you another characteristic of Mr. Miner. He had lived in the house with Dorsey and Rerdell, and finally Rerdell and Miner went to live together. I read from page 4182:

Q. What were your relations with Rerdell in the spring of 1879?—A. I had a quarrel with Mr. Rerdell in the spring of 1879, and I did not speak to him at all from that time until after the finding of the indictment.

Q. What time in the spring was that?—A. Well, the quarrel with Mr. Vaile began on the 8th of May, as I find from reference to letters. It was about that time. I remarked to him on Pennsylvania avenue one day that if he ever spoke to me again I would mash the nose all over his face. He obeyed me, and did not speak to me after that.

There is the man that Brady "nearly bluffed out of his boots." When he met Rerdell on the avenue, if you will believe what he says here, he told him he "would mash the nose all over his face;" and exhibiting something of the egotism that belongs to the whole crowd, he says:

He obeyed me, and did not speak to me after that.

The next man to take up is Mr. Vaile himself. Mr. Vaile had been a lawyer. He lived in Independence, Missouri. That is the place where the James boys came from, and where they steal horses. Vaile says he went into the mail business in 1861. At that time he put in his bids in the name of a relative, a man named Sprague. Vaile went on the bonds. Sprague was what they call a "dummy." He allowed his name to be used, for a judgment obtained against him would not amount to anything. Vaile says, "I never saw Peck at all. I never have met Peck." Remember, Peck did not come to Washington, and after 1876 never was near here. He says, "I did not see Peck at all." He also says "At the time I went into this business, or was talking about going into it, I did not know the condition of these routes. I did not know the condition of these routes when they offered the contracts to me." He says that he got a telegram from Brady on the 20th of August, 1878, and that three days after that he telegraphed back to Brady that he would take all the routes of Dorsey, Miner, and Peck, but not of Watts. Watts had originally started in the thing, but, like Boone, they shook him off and got rid of him, boiling the combination down to active business men who had a good pull with Thomas J. Brady. There was a partnership agreement entered into. It will be found on page 4013. It is dated the 16th of August, but it was really made in October. It was written out by John R. Miner:

This agreement, dated the 16th of August, 1878, by and between H. M. Vaile, of Independence, Missouri; John R. Miner, of Sandusky, Ohio; John M. Peck, of Col-tax County, New Mexico; and John W. Dorsey, of Middlebury, Vermont, witnesseth as follows:

I do not want to read it all to you. I will only read a part.

3d. Said J. R. Miner is hereby made secretary of the said copartnership, and shall keep an accurate record of the receipts and expenses of the company, and of correspondence with subcontractors and others.

It appears to me that was a direction for him to keep what they have not produced, what counsel say they will not give you, and what some of them have denied—books. There were no books produced, but in this very agreement Miner was to keep the books:

6th. The subcontracts heretofore made between John R. Miner and H. M. Vaile on routes 32020 and 32021 are bona fide, and this copartnership have no interest in said routes.

Now, gentlemen, what does that mean? We are at liberty to interpret this agreement. He goes in with the other parties in August or October, 1878, as to the routes specified, and there is to be ostensibly, a partnership between these people. Now, mark you, it was really a partnership with Stephen W. Dorsey, and Vaile knew that when the time came there would have to be a division in which Stephen W. Dorsey would get his share. To provide for that he says that the routes given by Miner to him, Vaile, mentioning them, are bona fide, which in plain English means that those two routes were given in good faith, and also some two or three others specified, but all the rest were held by the terms of that agreement, and by another agreement that was not reduced to writing. Is it not the plain meaning of this agreement, or who would doubt that there was an understanding between them, and they were providing for the contingency that would arise on the 4th of March, 1879, when Stephen W. Dorsey was to go out of the Senate; and when that time arrived the routes that Vaile then held were to be given up, excepting the ones that this agreement states he held in good faith. The rest were not held in good faith. Then he says he had a quarrel with Dorsey, and that there was a division of the routes. I want to read to you what he says about it on page 4017. I will not read the question. I will start with the answer:

A. I met Senator Dorsey here early in December, and the question of cutting out the drafts given to the bank came up. I believe he was indorser on notes there.

Q. Upon which these drafts were collateral?—A. Upon which these drafts were used for collateral; and he thought I had—

Q. [Interposing.] What did he do, Mr. Vaile?—A. He accused me of taking the advantage. I considered it was a proper thing for me to do, as there was some $11,000 to $13,000 only in money, and I think some $30,000 of these drafts pledged.

On page 4118 he says further:

Q. Now, can you recall when you had the next meeting with reference to an adjustment of the differences between you?—A. I have no recollection of meeting him again until about the 5th or 6th of March; it is possible I may have met him during the winter, but I have no recollection of it.

Then, at the bottom of that page:

By the COURT:

Q. What time was this, did you say?—A. About the 6th of March, immediately after Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate; I think it was on the 6th of March. I know I intended to reach here immediately after the 4th and get it fixed in some way.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. I want to know, from the state of feeling between you and Senator Dorsey, whether you had determined that you would not go on in business with him or not?—

A. I had; nothing on earth could have made me go on with him.

Now, gentlemen, what did he mean by that? If he had not been going on with Dorsey what did he mean by saying that nothing on earth would make him go on with him?

Q. Then you were determined to have a separation?—A. That was my determination.

Q. And you say it was with that view that you called upon him at his house?—A. It was.

Q. And you made him a proposition which he accepted?—A. He at first refused, but subsequently accepted it.

Q. Who were present when this final settlement and division was made?—A. Mr. Miner, S. W. Dorsey, and myself.

Those three. No John W. Dorsey and no Peck—only those three.

Q. Anybody else?—A. Nobody else that I recollect of. I don't think there was.

Q. When did you next see Mr. Dorsey?—A. We divided the routes in March, and it was then agreed that I should collect the money on all of them for the quarter ending 31st of March and liquidate the debts so far as that would go, and then the final separation should be made perfect. I may have seen him about the 4th or 5th of May. The collections were made the last days of April, or the first days of May. As soon as they were made we knew, as we supposed, our status, and the separation was made final, and I never saw him after that until June, I think, 1881, and then only for a moment.

I call your honor's attention to the date he mentions as when it was finally accomplished, in May, after the amendment to section 5440 had been made:

Q. How did you say the debts of the concern were divided?—A. In the same ratio of the routes.

Q. I want to know whether you took certain indebtedness, and Mr. Dorsey took certain indebtedness?—A. We did.

Q. You apportioned the indebtedness in that way?—A. We did. I, of course, was to pay myself, and Dorsey was to pay himself, and he was to pay John W. Dorsey and Peck. I was to pay the bank and did. There may have been something else. I do not recollect now.

Now, if your honor please, may we take our recess?

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, the next point in Mr. Vaile's career is his general explanation as to how he came to go into this matter, under what terms he took the routes, and his motives in general for coming in to assist in contracts that at that time were in very bad shape. The best way to show you how he came in is to read to you what he says himself, and then I will make no mistake, and not misquote him. I read from page 4047:

Q. Why did you except Watts from the number of those inquired about by Brady, whose contracts you declined to take up?—A. I hardly know what kind of an answer you want.

Mr. BLISS. Give us the truth.

Mr. MERRICK. Tell us the fact.

A. But the fact is that I had become, by reason of the calamity that was resting upon Miner's head, a good deal interested in him, and he seemed to be in charge here of the Miner, Peck, and Dorsey contracts. I knew nothing of Watts whatever. And again, I thought that was just as big a load probably as I could stand, although large and strong myself.

Q. And as you have said you could not say that you knew how many or what routes Watts had, why did you except him on the ground of not wanting to take too much load?—A. I did not know whether it was many or few that he had; but this obligation that I had taken upon myself for these three parties was quite enough for a man of my status and caliber.

Q. You assumed that liability simply from the sympathy that Mr. Miner had excited in your breast, you stated on your direct examination?—A. Yes.

Then, again, on page 4053 :

Q. If you were in that position in which you could have let them fail by declining to take up the service in August, and could have had the contracts with all the profits to yourself, why did you go on and take up the service without allowing them to fail, and with an obligation to divide the profits?—A. Well, Mr. Miner offered me all those contracts. I could have had them absolutely by a subcontract, without anybody else having any interest in them whatever, and I did not want to cut him out. I knew that other parties had advanced the money, or I supposed they had, and I thought to myself, not being over selfish, if I could do this and not lose any money I would be willing. I was not ambitious to lose any money, but if I could do it and save myself I was willing to do it.

Q. But would you not have been more likely to save yourself if you had taken all the profits than by taking only 40 per cent.?—A. Oh, yes; I could have made a great deal more if I had just let them fail and picked them up again. I could have made a great deal more if I had gone into a conspiracy with some of the other contractors who were here. There were very few who were able to put on the service. If I had gone into the conspiracy with them and parceled the contracts out and run them up to a very high figure for the basis, saying, for instance, to Salisbury, "You take these routes in Oregon," and to somebody else, "You take the routes in Arizona," and others to others, by that kind of a conspiracy I could have made very large money, but I did not see fit to do it.

Q. You did not go into that because of your sympathy for Miner?—A. Oh, well, I never brought any scandal into any business that I was engaged in. This irregular way of doing things has never pleased me.

Q. Your sympathy for Miner led you to take these contracts up, did it?—A. That was the beginning, and I could mention other things.

Q. What other things?—A. Well, now, a man gets no credit for that which I should mention, because here in Washington City it is very hard to believe. I did not want to take any advantage of the Government in any way. I knew that if these contracts failed the Second Assistant would necessarily have to run up the line—"offer them up," as we call it—and as it was late in the fall no one would take them without perhaps three, four, five, six, or may be ten times the price of these bids; and then they were of such a character that they must necessarily be expedited and increased, and instead of having the sums which we have now in this case it would have amounted probably to very large sums, and as this has made a scandal I do not know what on earth that would have made.

Q. Were you under any more obligations than any other citizen to save the Government from loss in that way?—A. Not a particle.

There, gentlemen, there is the secret of the whole matter. Mr. Vaile said that he gave Miner an offer before he went home, so that if they were declared failing contractors on these routes Miner could put in the offer of Vaile to carry the mail. They were not declared failing contractors. Vaile was willing to go into it because of his great affection for Miner. But he tells you, also, the true reason. He says, "These routes were of such a character that I knew they must necessarily be expedited and increased." How he got that knowledge, how he knew that they must be expedited and increased immediately after they were let, is a question that I will leave to you to solve. I have my own idea about it. Mr. Vaile never heard of expedition before. Nobody ever heard of expedition on a route before, and yet, right after the service should have been put upon the routes, Vaile said "I knew they were of such a character that they must necessarily be expedited and increased." I think, as far as that goes, that Mr. Vaile was testifying to the truth, because he knew from Mr. Miner, he knew from Mr. Dorsey, and he knew from Brady and the people who were engaged in it, that the arrangement was that the routes were to be increased and expedited. John Dorsey has given the explanation that the routes were taken low so as to cut out other people, but that they knew they were to be expedited and they knew they were to be increased.

Now, I have given you this general outline of what has been testified to by the different people who were engaged in this conspiracy, so as to bring your attention down to the facts that will be offered as I go along, and so that you can apply what I have refreshed your memory with, and see how well, how concisely, and how ingeniously it fits into the different acts that were performed by the different parties. I will go over these routes in a short way, and explain to you again the orders and the circumstances attending them. I know that you could never arrange in your mind, nor could any of the counsel engaged in this case, no matter what his ability may be, all the mass of testimony that has been offered to you, and all the facts and circumstances attending each particular order on each particular route. I will endeavor to trace them up and bring them back to your recollection, and refresh your memory about them, putting the acts in consecutive order according to dates, so that you can see how it was all managed. I know, when the facts are brought to your attention, there can be but one conclusion in your mind, and that will be the conclusion the Government officers arrived at long before I came into this case, and long before my colleague, Mr. Merrick, came into the case, that the Government has a good case against these people, and that they are all guilty of the acts that are alleged against them.

Route 34149, from Kearney to Kent. Nebraska.

This is a route that was taken by Vaile and Miner in the division. It was one hundred and twenty-five miles long, one trip a week, and the time was sixty hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $868.

March 4, 1878, there was a letter from Peck to Brady to send the contracts to lock-box 714, Washington. May 3, 1878, Brady ordered:

From July 1, 1878, embrace Fitzalon next after Sweetwater.

June 5, 1878, a subcontract was made with C. H. French. September 24, 1878, Brady ordered:

Allow contractor $112.24 per annum additional pay for fifteen miles increase for Fitzalon from July 1, 1878, being pro rata.

February 1, 1879, Peck's oath was made. February 2, 1879, there was an offer from Peck to carry the mail on a reduced schedule of thirteen hours. March 8, 1879, Vaile's subcontract was filed. April 3, 1879, the oath was put in the office. July 10, 1879, Brady made an order increasing the service from Kearney to Loup City, seventy-five miles, and expediting the schedule to thirteen hours. February 7, 1882, Vaile sent a letter to the office about the subcontract of French. These are the official dates. I do not know whether you have your maps or not, but I would like to have you take these maps and look at that route, so that you can understand what I am telling you about.

The FOREMAN [Mr. Crane]. It is as well photographed on my mind as if I had the map.

[The maps of this route were then distributed to the jury.]

Mr. KER. This route was one trip, sixty hours, and was one hundred and twenty-five miles long. On March 4, 1878, there was a letter from Peck to Brady to send the contracts to lock-box 714. Mr. Boone wrote the body of that letter and Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to it.

On the 3d of May, 1878, Brady made an order to embrace Fitzalon next after Sweetwater from July 1, 1878. You see Fitzalon was already on the route. It was an office that had not been mentioned when the contract was given out, but it was already on the route. There was no order made for any pay at that time, but just simply to embrace it upon the route.

On the 5th of May, 1878, John W. Dorsey wrote the following letter to French, which is marked 14 A on page 611 :

[John W. Dorsey & Co., mail contractors.]

BRANCH OFFICE,
Kansas City, Mo., 5, 6, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 1st is received, and we would say that as others have bid lower, we could not accept yours. The first man who will bid $700 for one round trip per week, $1,300 for two trips, $1,800 for three trips, and $3,300 for six trips per week, if the service is increased, and if the time is expedited, we to pay him 65 per cent. of the increased pay, can have the contract. Hoping we shall hear from you again soon, and that you may be the lucky man,

We remain yours, truly,

J. W. DORSEY & CO.

This letter he wrote to French on the 5th of May, 1878. On the 5th of June, 1878, one month afterwards, there was a subcontract made with C. H. French. That was one of the subcontracts into which Mr. Boone said he put the expedition clause that Stephen W. Dorsey told him to put in. It provided, in case of expedition, that 65 per cent. should go to French. John W. Dorsey signed the contract as the attorney for Peck. At the same time that he was there making the contract he also had a conversation with French. This was the 5th of June, 1878.

I read from page 697 :

Q. [Resuming.] Did you ever have any such conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was it?—A. On the night I made the contract with him.

Q. What was that conversation? Give it to us as near as you can.—A. In talking to him and trying to get a larger price for carrying the mails, and making my statement plain now why I wanted him to do this, I told him of my having to supply Cedarville before always by side supply, and we wanted he should do all he could to get this office from this next route. He said he would, but he would not promise to do it, but if I could make arrangements with the postmaster at Cedarville, they would never object to my supplying it by side supply.

This is a conversation that John W. Dorsey does not deny, and therefore it stands as an undisputed fact. He told French that if he could arrange with the postmaster to supply Cedarville by side supply, as there were no mail bills coming from there, and as there was no means of knowing whether or not——

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] I desire to call the attention of the court to the fact that my recollection is that his honor ruled that conversation out.

Mr. MERRICK. Where?

Mr. KER. Let us have it. Find it.

Mr. HENKLE. I will try to find it. I want to call attention to it now. If I do not find it, very well.

Mr. KER. I will go along, and if you find it just let me know.

Mr. HENKLE. Go on.

Mr. KER. Now, after having put Fitzalon on the route, on the 24th of September, 1878, Brady ordered, on page 589, 11 A.

Allow contractor $112.24 per annum additional pay for fifteen miles increase for Fitzalon, from July 1, 1878, being pro rata.

You know that Fitzalon was already there, and there was no occasion for making an allowance of fifteen miles for the service that they were already performing. The subcontractor testified that he always went by way of Fitzalon; he always passed through there, and it had always been on the route. Still there were fifteen miles added and an additional allowance of $112.24 for dropping the mail at a place where he had always dropped it.

The next was on the 22d of October, 1878. There was a letter from Peck to French. It is marked "34 A," and found on page 668:

WASHINGTON, October 22, 1878.

C. H. FRENCH, Loup City, Nebr.:

DEAR SIR: Every office on the route must be supplied or a reduction will be made, provided the fact that the office has not been supplied is reported. The only way to manage such difficulties as you have is through the local postmasters. You can supply an office once a week by a side supply, provided the postmaster at that office is satisfied and don't kick. The department will not authorize it, but they will not find any fault unless reported. It is better to send petition for increase to your Senator, but notify us when you have done so, that we may help it.

Truly, yours,

JOHN M. PECK, Contractor.

Now, you see the statement there made. Cedarville ought to have had as many mails as the other points between, according to the order, but they were going to supply it only once a week "if the postmaster did not kick," and the proper way, of course, to prevent the postmaster from kicking was to make it an object to him not to kick. That letter is signed John M. Peck.

The COURT. Who signed the name?

Mr. KER. I am coming to that point. Miner wrote and signed that letter.

The next in order is dated January 28, 1879. It is marked "21 A," and is found on page 613. I will read it to you:

LOCK-BOX 714, WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1879.

C. H. FRENCH, Loup City, Nebr.:

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 23d received. There is little probability of increase in service until after first of July, as the appropriation is nearly or quite exhausted for this fiscal year. I will do what I can to have Cedarville put on another route. Cannot promise that it will be done by any means, and in any event it is likely to take some time.

Yours, truly,

JOHN M. PECK.

Gentlemen, that letter was written by John R. Miner. The next is dated February 1, 1879, and is the oath 3 A on page 571. I will leave the heading off in reading it, but it may be put in the record.

CHICO SPRINGS, N. MEX., February 1, 1879.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route No. 34149, from Kearney to Loup City, three times a week on the present schedule, is two men and four animals. The number necessary to carry the mails on that part of said route, on a schedule of thirteen hours three times a week, is six men and fourteen animals.

Very respectfully,

JOHN M. PECK.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,

County of Colfax, ss:

On this first day of February, 1879, personally appeared before me John M. Peck, and, being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above statement is true, as he verily believes.

Witness my hand and seal.

J. S. TAYLOR,
Notary Public.

Now, you know the increase was made from Kearney to Loup City—about half the distance. It was not made all the way up to Kent, but only on that part of the route. Here is a statement of the number of men and animals then used and the number of men and animals that would be required to carry it in thirteen hours. The body of this oath was written by Miner. Miner gives his explanation of how it was done, on pages 4228 and 4231:

Q. I do not know whether this affidavit, 3 A, has been handed to you or not. I think it has.—A. It has.

Q. It will do no harm to have you repeat. Tell me in whose handwriting that affidavit is?—A. That affidavit is entirely in my handwriting, except the signatures, which are not in my handwriting.

Q. Entirely in yours?—A. Entirely.

Q. Was that affidavit all written at the same time?—A. So far as I remember it was, about the same time.

Q. Do you see anything in the paper to refresh your recollection?—A. I say about the same time. It evidently was not written continuously.

Q. It evidently was not written exactly at the same time?—A. Not exactly at the same time.

Q. It was written, you say, at two periods, whether remote or near you cannot tell. What part of it was written at the same time?

Mr. HENKLE. Let him answer the first part of your question.

A. I have already answered that the appearance of the paper would indicate that it was not written at identically the same time.

Q. Tell me what words in that affidavit were written at one time and what at another.—A. The body of the affidavit was evidently written at one time, and the words "two," "four," and "six" were apparently written at another time, judging from the space there is between those words and the next.

The numbers "two," "four," and "six" were the numbers of the men and animals.

The COURT. Does he say anything about filling up the "fourteen?"

Mr. KER. In that affidavit?

The COURT. Yes. Does Miner say that the word "fourteen" was filled up afterwards?

Mr. KER. No, sir; he speaks only of the two, four, and six.

The COURT. Fourteen is there also.

Mr. MERRICK. They were all filled up afterward.

Mr. KER. I read now from page 4239:

Q. Now, I will ask you about another affidavit. I show you the paper marked 9 A; probably that will refresh your apparently failing recollection. What is that paper?—A. It is a proposal to carry the mail on route 34149.

Q. Is that the same route mentioned in the affidavit?—A. The same route.

Q. What day does it bear date?—A. The 2d of February, 1879.

Q. What is the date of the file marked on the back?—A. April 3, 1879.

Q. The same date as the affidavit?—A. Yes, sir; they were filed at the same time.

Q. In whose handwriting is the second paper?—A. It is mine.

Q. Is it all yours?—A. All mine.

Q. Do you not recollect sending that affidavit?—A. I do not.

Q. Does not that paper refresh your memory at all?—A. It does not. If you want me to tell what I believe about it I can do so.

Here is his explanation about the affidavit, admitting that those words in the affidavit were filled in at different times. The affidavit is headed Chico Springs, New Mexico, February 1, 1879. On the 2d of February, 1879, is the offer of Peck to carry the mail on a reduced schedule of thirteen hours. It is marked 9 A, and will be found on page 582:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1879.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I hereby offer to carry the mail on route 34149, from Kearney to Loup City, three times a week, and once a week the residue, at pro rata, and on a reduced schedule from Kearney to Loup City of thirteen hours for an additional compensation of $2,200 per annum for the expedition, being less than pro rata.

Respectfully,

JOHN M. PECK.

Gentlemen, this letter of John M. Peck's was written and signed by John R. Miner. The oath was dated February 1; this letter was dated February 2. If you will believe what Miner told you, he had to send the oath of February 1 to Chico Springs to be there sworn to, yet it must have been brought back from Chico Springs to Washington so as to reach here the next day, in order that Miner might write the offer that he tells you he wrote.

Mr. HENKLE. Excuse me for a moment. I desire to call the attention of the court to page 614, referring to Cedarville:

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. You did supply it in some way, did you not?—A. I supplied it from Loup City.

Q. Did he tell you not to supply the office at all?—A. He told me I could supply it by side supply if I could make the arrangement. I had been carrying that mail for ten months, and always made a side supply.

Q. Mr. Dorsey told you then you would have to supply it direct?—A. If I could not make the arrangement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that way of examination.

The COURT. I shall sustain your objection.

Now, passing along;

Q. Just what did Mr. Dorsey say to you in connection with that matter?—A. He said that I would have to make arrangements with the postmaster, or supply it going and coming both ways.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. With whom do you mean?—A. With the postmaster at Cedarville. I was talking with him in regard to supplying it with a side supply.

Q. You said you could not do that unless he arranged with the postmaster?—A. Yes, sir.

The COURT. I do not perceive the relevancy of this.

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Facetiously.] It may be connected hereafter.

Mr. BLISS. That is true. Mr. Davidge is right for once.

Mr. HENKLE. Then we object to it.

Mr. BLISS. If he is right, do you object to it?

Mr. HENKLE. His honor says he does not see the relevancy of it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have been in that frame of mind for some time.

Mr. BLISS. It is not important, any way.

Mr. HENKLE. There is a great deal to follow that has no more connection with the case than this. Is that ruled out, your honor?

Mr. BLISS. We do not care for it. Let it be stricken out.

The COURT. Then all that may go out.

The COURT. Was that the conversation between French and the postmaster?

Mr. HENKLE. Between French and the postmaster. Now, further along, on page 616:

Mr. WILSON. Now, Cedarville was on the line of this route. What they are trying to prove before this jury is a higgling between Mr. French and John W. Dorsey, in which John W. Dorsey insisted upon his carrying the mail by Cedarville, according to the contract. But Mr. French said the road was too rough, and he could not go that way, and he wanted to give it a side supply. That is the sum and substance of it. Dorsey was insisting upon his complying with the contract as it had been advertised and let. How that can be relevant to this case I am unable to conceive. The Post-Office Department had fixed the lines. I cannot for the life of me see any relevancy in it.

The COURT. I cannot see any relevancy in it either.

Mr. BLISS. It is not a matter of any great importance.

The COURT. It may be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIDGE. All about Cedarville?

The COURT. Yes; and the conversation between him and the postmaster.

Mr. BLISS. Between him and Dorsey about Cedarville?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. This was a conversation with Dorsey and not with the postmaster. Subsequently the same thing was established by a letter of Miner's to supply Cedarville three times a week, or see that the postmaster sent no more registers.

The COURT. That is not the question.

Mr. HENKLE. That is not the question. His honor ordered the conversation between the postmaster and French to be stricken out, and afterwards this conversation with Dorsey.

Mr. MERRICK. Now look at page 697:

Q. [Resuming.] Did you ever have any such conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was it?—A. On the night I made the contract with him.

Q. What was that conversation? Give it to us as near as you can.—A. In talking to him and trying to get a larger price for carrying the mails, and making my statement plain now why I wanted him to do this, I told him of my having to supply Cedarville before always by side supply, and we wanted he should do all he could to get this office from this next route. He said he would, but he would not promise to do it, but if I could make arrangements with the postmaster at Cedarville, they would never object to my supplying it by side supply.

Q. Did you arrange with the postmaster?—A. I did, and I always carried it that way, too.

Q. Both before your contract was made with Dorsey and afterwards?—A. Yes, sir; I was a carrier before.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw my objection to that question.

The COURT. [Facetiously.] You had better insist upon your exception.

Mr. HENKLE. I want to call your honor's attention to what was said by the court on page 654.

Mr. MERRICK. What is the question before the court first?

Mr. HENKLE. I am presenting a question to the court now. Mr. French was on the stand and was asked:

Then, after reading something:

I desire to move, your honor, to strike from the record those remarks. I think they ought not to have been made.

The COURT. There is no part of it that I like better.

Mr. HENKLE. I make the motion to strike it from the record, and upon your honor declining I take an exception.

The COURT. You cannot strike from the record what the court says. You can take an exception to it.

So it was in the record and not struck out; it was in, in the most emphatic shape, when it came in the second time.

Mr. HENKLE. The court did strike it out.

Mr. MERRICK. The court did not, the last time. It is all in.

Mr. HENKLE. I simply want to call attention to it now. I will present the matter again hereafter.

Mr. KER. I was giving Miner's explanation about the oath of Peck, dated the 1st of February, 1879, and sworn to at Chico Springs, New Mexico, and the offer to carry the mail, signed on the next day by John R. Miner. I want to read to you now from page 4231 in continuation:

Q. Did you read the paper?—A. I did sufficiently to know what it is.

Q. Let me read it to you and call your attention to it a little:

“WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1879.

“Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

“Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

“SIR: I hereby offer to carry the mail on route 34149, from Kearney to Loup City, three times a week, and once a week the residue, at pro rata, and on a reduced schedule from Kearney to Loup City of thirteen hours for an additional compensation of $2,200 per annum for the expedition, being less than pro rata.

“Respectfully,

“JOHN M. PECK.”

You inclosed the affidavit in this paper, did you?—A. There is nothing there to show that I did, and I have no recollection that I did.

Q. This letter was filed April 3 and the affidavit was filed April 3. Does that refresh your recollection?—A. It does not.

Q. Did you file any other affidavit at that time on this route?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. You have no recollection whatever of these papers?—A. I have not.

Q. Don't you recollect that this affidavit being in your possession immediately after the division that you spoke of, you antedated your letter to February 2 to bear date along with the affidavit, and sent this affidavit in your letter to the Post-Office Department?—A. I do not.

Next, on the 4th of March, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to Brady, notifying him that all the subcontracts given by Miner were to be disregarded. This was the day that Dorsey went out of the Senate, the day his time expired. I have read that letter to you before. I only want to call your attention to it now in this connection, because on the 8th of March, 1879, Vaile filed a subcontract, and that subcontract was dated April 1, 1878. Miner signed as attorney for Peck, and Rerdell signed as a witness. On the 3d of April, 1879, the oath and the proposal to carry the mail were both sent to the office together. On the 10th of July, 1879, Brady made an order. The oath was made on the 1st of February, 1879; the proposition on the 2d, and on the 10th of July Brady made the order which is marked 1 A, and found on page 567 :

From August 1, 1879, increase service Kearney to Loup City, seventy-five miles, to three trips a week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $1,122.41 per annum additional, being pro rata. Expedite schedule between the points named to thirteen hours, and allow the contractor and subcontractor $2,200 per annum additional, being less than pro rata, as agreed.

The distance from Kearney to Loup City is given as seventy-five miles in the order. The real distance, gentlemen, was only forty-eight miles. He had put on Fitzalon, and given them fifteen miles for Fitzalon, and then added the fifteen miles to the real distance, forty-eight, and not being particular in the addition, he made it seventy-five miles. In truth, it was only forty-eight miles, but he counted the alleged fifteen that was added. Brady put on two more trips and reduced the time to thirteen hours. Now, gentlemen, do you not remember that Mr. French was on the stand, and do you not remember that French said, "Why, I always carried the mail from Kearney to Loup City in twelve hours." He actually carried the mail in one hour less time than Brady ordered it to be expedited to, and carried that way before the order was made and after the order was made. Mr. French also says, "I never heard of the expedition. Nobody ever told me anything about it." The first thing he knew about it was when he came here to Washington. He was going ahead and carrying the mail in twelve hours, as he had always done, and, unknown to him, Brady had brought it down to thirteen hours, and allowed $2,200 for bringing it down, besides adding $1,122.41 for two extra trips. Mr. Brady gives an explanation on page 3550 :

Q. Was your attention attracted by the fact that the oath in that case appears to have been made by John M. Peck at Chico, New Mexico, on the 1st of February, 1879; that it was filed in the department April 3, 1879, at the same time with the offer of the contractor, which offer is dated in Washington on the 2d of February, 1879?—A. It was not, that I remember; and I do not know that it would have made any difference if it had been.

Away back in February they were preparing for expedition that was granted in July, and Brady said that, although the letter was written in Washington and the oath in New Mexico, it would have made no difference to him if his attention had been called to it.

Gentlemen, this expedition and this increase of service was all made upon one petition—only one. The “great people” between Kearney and Loup City, “the people whose wants ought to be respected,” combine their wants into one petition, and acting upon that one petition Brady generously made the order. Let us analyze this petition. It is the petition 2 A. You remember, gentlemen, that the words “schedule thirteen hours” were written into that petition. [Exhibiting petition to the jury.] That one petition is what did the work. John R. Miner wrote those words in that petition. Mr. Nightingale said, “I circulated the petition. I got the names signed to it. I mailed it, directed to lock-box 714 (Miner’s box), Washington, D. C. Those words were not there when I sent it on.” Two men say Miner wrote that petition. Mr. Miner says he does not think he did; he is not satisfied that he did.

Mr. HENKLE. He says he did not write those words.

Mr. KER. Oh, well, gentlemen, of course he says so.

Mr. HENKLE. Nobody says he did but Rerdell.

Mr. KER. Two witnesses say he did write them.

Mr. HENKLE. No, they do not; I beg your pardon; nobody but Rerdell.

Mr. KER. If nobody but Rerdell said it, when you come to argue it show it.

Mr. HENKLE. I will.

Mr. KER. Mr. Boone says “I think it is Miner’s handwriting.” When questioned about it he said “I put the other circumstances with it and that is what makes me think so.”

Mr. HENKLE. Independently of the circumstances he did not know about it.

Mr. MERRICK. Boone says it was written by Miner.

Mr. HENKLE. Turn to what he says.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what he said.

Mr. HENKLE. What is the page?

Mr. MERRICK. I will find it directly.

Mr. KER. On page 699 Mr. Nightingale says, “I circulated the petition. I mailed it. I sent it to Miner, Peck & Co., lock-box 714, Washington, D. C. Those words were not in the petition when I mailed it.” Box 714 was Miner’s box? He had the key of it, and he so testified. John R. Miner forwarded the petition to the department.

Mr. WILSON. There is no proof of that either. On the contrary, the proof is right the other way.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Well, go ahead.

Mr. MERRICK. On page 2684:

Q. [Submitting paper.] Please look at the paper now shown to you, which is 2 A, and tell me in whose handwriting the words “Schedule 13 hours” are?—A. I should say that was in the handwriting of John R. Miner.

Mr. HENKLE. Now, go to the cross-examination.

Mr. MERRICK. That is enough. You cannot analyze a man’s testimony in that way. Take it up when you come to it. That is what he swears to.

Mr. WILSON. That is not all he says.

Mr. MERRICK. That is no justification for an interruption. Mr. Ker has quoted his testimony just as it is, that Boone thinks the paper is in Miner’s handwriting.

The COURT. Proceed, Mr. Ker, in your own way.

Mr. KER. Now, gentlemen, I told you yesterday that we were required to prove, in addition to the conspiracy, some overt act. One overt act that we allege is, that this oath was placed in the department as the basis for Thomas J. Brady to make the order.

Mr. HENKLE. Will your honor allow me to call attention to what Mr. Boone said on cross-examination?

The COURT. It makes no difference about the cross-examination. If he testified even indistinctly, counsel have a right to comment on it to the jury and you will have the like privilege when your time comes.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly. You cannot interrupt counsel in that way.

Mr. KER. [Exhibiting paper to the jury.] There it is, gentlemen. The jacket is dated the 10th of July, 1879. There is no mistake about it. That is alleged in the indictment as the date upon which he made his order. Right in that jacket was this oath. [Exhibiting oath.] There it is

Mr. WILSON. One moment. As this petition, 2 A, has been shown to the jury in the progress of the argument, and as it has been pasted on to a piece of linen, I desire that the jury may also notice what has been covered up by what is pasted upon the paper.

Mr. KER. Oh, yes. There is an indorsement there by Senator Saunders, and it was sent to lock-box 714.

Mr. MERRICK. It was pasted together because it was coming apart.

The COURT. The court requested that that should be done.

Mr. MERRICK. The court ordered it to be done.

Mr. WILSON. I am not contending about that.

Mr. MERRICK. That has nothing to do with the line of argument now being pursued.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, right in that jacket, dated the 10th of July, was this oath upon which Brady made this order and which he says was less than pro rata. Right in that jacket was this false petition, this fraudulent and altered petition, this petition that was altered after it had been signed by the people. Right in that jacket are those two papers. They are alleged as overt acts, and I submit to you, can there be any doubt about the truth of the allegation?

And right in this connection, on the 13th of October, 1879, there was a claim for the third quarter ending September 30, 1879. Your honor will remember the allegation of the claim for pay based upon these fraudulent orders. The claim for pay was a fraudulent claim against the United States, and that also is alleged in the indictment, and it has been proved—the day, the date, and the amount. No doubt about it.

Next, on the 10th of January, 1880, Miner wrote to C. H. French, 35 A, page 668:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1880.

C. H. FRENCH, Kearney, Nebr. :

Yours of 29th received. I have never heard of Alexander Baillie, much less thought of employing him on route 34149.

Yours, truly,

JNO. R. MINER, Agent.

P. S.—The postmaster at Cedarville has sent a register which shows only two mails a week. No register is required from Cedarville, as that is not a schedule point. Either furnish that office three mails per week, or see that the postmaster sends no more registers.

You remember that John Dorsey told him if he could arrange with the postmaster he could supply it by a side supply once a week, and there would be nothing said; and Miner comes in and reiterates the thing in the letter. The postmaster has foolishly sent on a mail bill, or register, which showed that they were neglecting the business, and Miner wrote, You must either supply the three mails, or get the postmaster to stop informing the Department about it. It would not do to have that on record. There was Miner's honest advice given to the subcontractor.

On the 20th of February, 1880, 38 A, page 669, is another letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1880.

DEAR SIR: By a general order of the Postmaster-General issued to-day all mail service, except railway and steamboat, will be reduced to one trip per week, commencing March 1, 1880. You will take notice thereof, and from that date make only one trip per week on route No. 34149, from Kearney to Kent.

This reduction is in consequence of the failure of Congress to appropriate a sufficient sum to pay for service on any greater basis for the remainder of the year ending June 30, 1880.

It will be well for the people of your section to send to the member of Congress from your district such petitions as will express their opinions on the subject of this reduction.

Truly, yours,

JNO. R. MINER, Ag't.

Did I not point out to you that Congress had investigated this matter, beginning in January, 1880? This letter was sent out by Miner to the subcontractors to get them to send petitions to warn members of Congress that they must stand up for expedition, and must stand up for increased trips, to influence the members of Congress. This is dated February 20, 1880, just at the time Congress was examining into the matter; and when it became a little doubtful whether they were going to appropriate the $2,000,000 extra that Brady called for these letters were sent broadcast throughout the country. This is a specimen of them. I do not want to read all of them. They were sent to every subcontractor to get up petitions to influence members of Congress. And finally by act of Congress, on the 7th of April, 1880, they gave Brady $1,100,000—cut off $900,000 from what he asked. The service was not cut off. It still went on. They appropriated that amount for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and they informed Mr. Brady in the same act that he should never afterwards expedite a route at a greater expense than 50 per cent. of the original contract price. These letters were intended to influence Congress.

On the 7th of February, 1882, there is a letter from Mr. Vaile, marked 98 A, found at page 751:

NATIONAL HOTEL, F. TENNEY & Co.,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1882.

R. S. ELMER, Esq.,
Second Ass. P. M. Gen'l:

SIR: Yours of 4th inst. at hand concerning a subcontract of one C. H. French, an alleged subcontractor.

I know nothing about this alleged subcontract and I believe there must be some mistake in regard to it. My subcontract, now on file, was executed by J. M. Peck in person and received by me in good faith. Mr. French's subcontract purports to be executed by J. W. Dorsey's attorney, John Peck. I doubt Mr. Dorsey's authority to execute such a contract. J. R. Miner has had all the correspondence with Mr. French and may know something of this alleged subcontract. He is now absent, but will be in the city again in a short time, and I would like to have the matter rest until I can confer with him. Mr. French is our carrier, and has been paid, according to agreement, promptly.

Yours, very truly,

H. M. VAILE.

Gentlemen, that letter is dated February 7, 1882. You remember that Dorsey made a subcontract with French, and that subcontract called for 65 per cent. of the increased pay for expedition. They were to give that to French. Mr. Vaile came along and filed his subcontract on the 8th of March, 1879. Now, you know that when Vaile's subcontract was on file, nobody else could receive any recognition. Mr.

French was doing the work. He was carrying the mail under a legitimate contract made with John W. Dorsey, acting on behalf of Peck. But French says, "Why, they never told me about expedition; they did not give me the 65 per cent." When this investigation began, and French heard about the subcontract of Vaile being on file, and heard that he was entitled to 65 per cent. of the amount of money that they were receiving for expedition, naturally French wanted some of it, but when he applied to the department there was Vaile's subcontract in the office staring him in the face, and Mr. Elmer wrote to Vaile about it, and Vaile said, "My subcontract was signed by John M. Peck in person." Gentlemen, did he not tell you on the stand that he never saw Peck? And yet he deliberately writes to the Assistant Postmaster-General that it was "signed by Peck in person," and "I doubt the authority of John W. Dorsey to make such a subcontract." This was to deceive and cheat the poor subcontractor. His pay was arranged by a schedule of prices that John W. Dorsey had fixed. They allowed him an increase, pro rata, for the number of trips, but not the 65 per cent for expedition, and there is where all this trouble came in.

The pay on this route was drawn by Vaile upon drafts signed by Peck. He drew, I believe, the entire amount of the pay, and Miner signed the receipts.

I want to read you again some extracts from Mr. French's testimony:

I carried the mail from Kearney to Loup City from 1878, and always carried it inside of twelve hours, which was less than the time to which it was expedited. I did not hear of the expedited schedule. I never received any pay for expedition. I did not know that Vaile's subcontract was on file. My letters were addressed to Vaile, Miner & Co. Miner sent me this petition to circulate, and I had it circulated by Mr. Nightingale, and Mr. Nightingale mailed it on to Washington, and those words were not in that petition when it was sent. The mail never averaged over twenty pounds.

Now, gentlemen, let us analyze the oath. Peck's oath, written by Miner, says: "On the present schedule two men and four animals are used from Kearney to Loup City." Two and four make six. "On the proposed schedule it will require six men and fourteen animals." That is twenty. What Mr. Miner, acting for Mr. Peck, or Mr. Vaile, who had taken this route, was to receive, would be the difference between six and twenty, which would be fourteen; and multiplied by fourteen it would bring the expedition up to something like $2,400 or $2,500. But, generously, they agreed to carry it for $2,200 for expedition alone. This is what Mr. French says:

On the then schedule I used two men and five animals.

That was seven, making one more than Dorsey said. Dorsey brought it below the estimate:

On the increased schedule I used three men and ten animals.

That is thirteen. That is seven less than Dorsey said it would require.

But then I was carrying the mail to Cedarville, and I counted that in. But when I did not carry the mail to Cedarville then it required three men and seven animals.

Ten. Just one-half of what was in the oath written by Miner. Three men and seven animals—one-half of what Miner's oath said it would take. And, acting upon the basis of that oath, Brady gave them the expedition at the rate of $2,200. I pointed out to you the law, that he could not allow for shorter time, or expedition, unless by carrying it in that short time it required more men and more animals; and I have shown you that they were carrying it in less time than was required in the order Brady made. And I have shown you that it took no more men or no more animals to carry it. This oath was written out by John R. Miner, and admitted by him to have been altered, and you can see that it was altered, because it is interlined in red ink. And it is a proper explanation of the intention of these people, because I go back and bring to your recollection the old saying that Miner said to Moore: "They are all good affidavit men."

The original pay was $868. It was increased to $4,302.65. The subcontractor's pay—French's pay—you know I told you they allowed him for the trips but not for expedition—the subcontractor's pay was $1,587.40. Subtract that from $4,302.65 and you have a nice, clean, and clear profit coming to them of $2,715.25 each year. And, as Miner said to Moore, "They proposed to make a pretty good thing out of it;" $2,715.25 clean and clear into the pockets of these people in Washington who were doing nothing.

Now, gentlemen, you know the law says that the Postmaster-General must have "due regard for productiveness." That is one of the main elements to be considered in making an order. Let me show you what the productiveness was from a little statement I have here:

The revenue for the year ending June 30, 1879, including all offices, Kearney (on the railroad) to Kent, $2,348.32. Exclude Kearney, that was supplied by the railroad, and whose revenues, of course, ought not to go into the statement of the route, and the revenue was $227.48.

In 1880 the total revenue was $2,785.96. Throwing off Kearney, it was $401.51.

In 1881, including all offices, $2,874.55; but throwing off Kearney, it was $513.84.

Right on the jacket where Brady made his order is a statement of the revenues of those offices. The order was made in July, 1879, when it was shown that the entire revenue that the Government derived from every office on this route was $2,348.32, and throwing off Kearney left the miserable sum of $227.48. That was right on the jacket before him; and notwithstanding that fact, he allowed $2,200 for shortening the time alone. Remember, he did not make it a daily mail. His policy was, he said, "to make a daily mail;" but he only made it three trips. He was interrogated concerning that, and I think it is due to him that I should put in his explanation about it. It is given on page 3404:

Q. It appears from the papers in evidence here that on the route from Kearney to Kent the annual pay was by the contract, $868 over the whole route—

Not from Kearney to Loup City, but over the whole route—and that over seventy-five miles of the route, from Kearney to Loup City, it was $561.20.

That was the price paid from Kearney to Loup City.

If $561.20 be taken as the pay for a single trip from Kearney to Loup City, why did you not increase the trips from Kearney to Loup City to six, instead of expediting the service and using the money in that way?—A. Will you let me see the papers in that case? [Papers submitted and examined.] It seems that the petition demands or asks that this service, which at that time was once a week, should be increased to three times a week, and the running time reduced to thirteen hours. I presume that is the reason it was done.

Q. You made the order because that was what the petition asked?—A. It is frequently of as much importance to a people to have a fast service as it is to have a frequent service. This was done in accordance with the petition and the recommendation of Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine, I believe.

Yes, Senator Saunder's name is on that petition, put there after it left Loup City and went into Miner's office. But there is no petition from Mr. Valentine, not one. The whole expedition was granted on that one petition:

Q. Did it occur to you when you added $4,302.65 for one trip and expedition that you might have made the service six trips a week at the old rate of speed, and it would have cost the Government $935.42 less than you paid for two trips on an increased speed?

You see, he could have given him six trips a week and saved $935.42 over the price paid for the three trips.

A. I do not know that that occurred to me at that time. Probably this occurred to me: That a fast service with three trips a week might be better than a slow service six times a week.

Do you understand that, gentlemen? If you are corresponding with a man in Georgetown in regard to business, receiving letters from him and sending letters to him, which would you sooner have, which would be the greater benefit, for you to write a letter and keep it in your pocket two days before putting it in the post-office, and then have a man ride with the mail over to Georgetown fast enough to almost break his neck, or have the mail carried every day at a lower rate of speed? It seems to me that Mr. Brady's reason is very narrow:

Q. Did it at that time occur to you that when you were expediting this money for a fast service you were expediting the mails so that you gained nothing in the connections at either end of the route?—A. I do not know that that was brought to my attention at all. I cannot remember concerning it.

You remember it. It was testified that the mail missed connection. The thirteen hours made no difference, the carrier always carried it in twelve hours, but there was no connection. It was a mere matter of accommodation to the carrier. He did not want to loiter on the road, and he carried it in twelve hours—four miles an hour; four twelves are forty-eight:

Q. You do not remember whether you considered that?—A. I do not.

Q. In making that increase and expedition, did you examine into the revenues of the offices on the route?—A. I believe the revenues are given on the jacket here.

Q. You examined into them, did you?—A. I presume I looked at them on the jacket. The revenues of offices like Kearney and Kent and upon routes of that description were a very poor criterion of the value of the service. The revenues, you understand, only show what stamps are sold at the office. The revenues do not show anything of the mail that comes into the office.

Q. I understand precisely what the revenues show. Did you consider the fact that excluding the terminal offices the entire revenues of all the other offices upon that route were, at the time of the increase and expedition, only $227.48?—A. I do not know that I did. The probability is that the principal consideration acting upon my mind in that matter was the fact that it was a new country, and Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine wanted it done very badly.

Q. Is it not stated upon the jacket what the revenue of each one of the offices upon that route was?—A. I believe so. I said so a moment ago.

Q. You said the revenue was there, but you did not say it was in detail by offices. Do you know whether you considered that fact of the small revenues of the intermediate offices?—A. I have answered already that I do not know that I took it into consideration at all.

Q. You considered, then, as I understand you, the wishes of Senator Saunders?—A. And the representations made by him.

Q. And by Mr. Valentine?—A. Yes, sir.

Further down, on the same page:

Q. On that route what weight did you give to the petitions in deciding to make increases and expeditions?—A. I stated a moment ago that in all probability, according to my recollection, the personal recommendations and importunity of Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine had more to do with it than anything else. The exact weight I may have given to the petitions I cannot say.

Q. That being so, should a Senator or Representative ask an increase of you, say, upon this route, which you did not grant, what would govern you with reference to it?—A. Possibly he might not have been sufficiently earnest in the matter, or possibly he might have wanted too much done. We might have done some things he wanted done and not others. We could not give every man all he asked. We had to distribute these little things.

Q. You had to distribute the plums. Therefore, when Senator Saunders came in and apparently sought an increase to six trips on this route, can you tell us why it was not granted?—A. I cannot. Possibly we were not in an increasing mood that day.

Q. Then you governed your increases by the moods that you were in on given days, did you?—A. Well, I am somewhat given to moods, and some days might be more liberal than other days.

Q. You think that may have been the reason why you did not make that increase?—A. I say it may have been. I do not know anything about it. I do not remember anything about it.

Q. If Senator Saunders made more than one application for that increase and did not get it, do you mean to say that it was because you remained in the same mood all the time?—A. I say I do not remember anything about it.

Q. But you know that at times you were governed by your mood?—A. Sometimes; yes, sir.

Q. It was principally the imperative mood, was it not?—A. Well, I was rather imperative, I confess, in a good many things.

Gentlemen, let me explain that to you. As we went along we found that there was another jacket. You know he ordered three trips and short time. This other jacket had petitions in it asking for six trips from Kearney to Loup City. It was indorsed by Mr. Saunders; it was indorsed by Mr. Valentine. It is there. It was not acted upon. There were a number of petitions asking for six trips a week. And Brady gives his answer as I have read it to you. When the people wanted six trips that he could have given and saved $935.42 over the amount he allowed for reducing time, he said, "I was not in the mood." That is his answer. He was not in the mood to gratify the people and give them six trips, but he was in the "imperative mood," to allow $2,200 to carry that mail in thirteen hours, when it was already being carried in twelve hours. There is Brady's answer, his own testimony, as to why he did it. He said he would have made it all daily mail, and if he had gone on and acted he would have been in the mood to double the price up and give them twice the four thousand and odd dollars that he had already put on this route. It is a fine answer for an editor, a man who made a newspaper better than it had ever been before or ever has been since; a better editor than Mr. Hatton, or anybody else who runs a newspaper; a man who knew the law, because there is scarcely a respectable editor in the country who is not well versed in the law; a man who had bought out three newspapers. And yet he says, when he is brought upon the witness-stand and interrogated as to his official acts, and where petitions are shown him asking for six trips, "I was not in the mood." Does he pretend to say, or will his counsel pretend to say, that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States is the dictator to the people; that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States is the lord of the Treasury, and at his own sweet will and pleasure he can donate $2,200 to his fellow-conspirators and refuse the reasonable request to put on three more trips? Did it all lie in his hand? Was he the man that exercised the discretion? Was he to be the judge? Or was the law to be disregarded openly, plainly, and flagrantly, as I have pointed it out to you? He could have increased the trips, he could have increased the service only with due regard to productiveness. The poor, miserable little sum of $227.48 came into the Treasury, and the large sum of $4,302.65 was paid out for carrying the mail on this route.

Gentlemen, I will go right along, without any loss of time, so as to get through as fast as possible.

38135, SAINT CHARLES TO GREENHORN, COLORADO.

The next route is 38135, Saint Charles to Greenhorn, Colorado. This route was taken by Dorsey in the division. It was thirty-five miles in length. It was advertised as thirty-two, but really it was thirty-five. There were two trips in twelve and one-half hours. This is the water-tank route. [Handing maps to the jury.] Look at the map again. Keep it fresh in your memory, gentlemen. There is nothing like seeing what you are doing.

In advertising this route they advertised it as from Saint Charles down to Greenhorn. It ought really to have been advertised from Pueblo to Greenhorn. The correct distance was given, but there was a mistake made in the place of beginning or the place of ending. Saint Charles was a water-tank station. They had a little post-office there, where the mail was thrown off the train, and it was distributed to the surrounding farmers, including, I believe, Agate.

John R. Miner was contractor on this route. The pay originally was $548. John W. Dorsey witnessed the contract in this case, and the proposal that was originally put in was partly written by Boone and partly by Miner, and the amounts filled in by Rerdell. I will read you a memorandum of the official papers that we have.

July 18, 1878, Postmaster Ingersoll, of Pueblo, informed the department of a mistake in advertising the route.

August 15, 1878, Postmaster Fairhurst, at Saint Charles, called Brady's attention to the mistake.

August 30, 1878, the route was extended to Pueblo.

October 1, 1878, there was a subcontract of E. M. Ames filed.

April 16, 1879, there was a letter from Miner to Brady, transmitting proposal for carrying the mail on expedited schedule.

April 17, 1879, there was an oath made and signed.

April 22, 1879, there was a letter of Mr. Chaffee, of New York, filed.

May 5, 1879, request for communications to be addressed to Rerdell.

May 8, 1879, the oath was put in the post-office. On the same day there was a letter sent accompanying the oath.

June 26, 1879, Brady made an order of increase and reducing the time.

July 31, 1879, there was a change of schedule.

November 11, 1879, S. W. Dorsey filed his subcontract.

July 23, 1880, Brady ordered another change of schedule.

October 13, 1880, Postmaster Piper wrote that mail once a week to Agate would be sufficient.

November 10, 1880, Brady made an order to embrace Agate on the route.

December 14, 1880, Brady ordered Agate omitted.

December 7, 1880, Stephen W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract.

Gentlemen, those are the official papers that were put in. There are other papers that were proved by the witnesses, and I will read them in their proper places.

July 18, 1878, Postmaster Ingersoll, of Pueblo, wrote to the department stating that there was a mistake made in advertising the route. You know the mail began on the 1st; this was on the 18th.

On the 15th of August Postmaster Fairhurst, of Saint Charles, again wrote to the department calling attention to the mistake.

On the 30th of August, 1878, the route was extended to Pueblo, increasing the distance twelve miles, and the contractor was allowed $328.80 per annum. You know the miles were given correctly, but the order said to increase it twelve miles. Now, it was advertised at thirty-five. Add thirty-five to twelve and you will understand the subsequent orders that were made giving the distance. Whenever they made such an addition to the distance they always took care never to reduce it again. On page 3413 Mr. Brady testified as to why he made this order:

Q. Suppose the contract was made before the error was discovered, how could it be remedied?—A. By not letting it and readvertising it.

Q. Suppose it to be discovered after the contract was made; what mode was there of remedying it?—A. The same thing could have been done if it was discovered in time—before the advertisement was gotten up—by paying the contractor one month's extra pay after he had entered into the contract.

Q. Suppose the error was discovered, say the middle of July, 1878, how could it have been corrected?—A. My impression is that the miscellaneous advertisement would be in the hands of the printer by that time, and the contract would be made.

That is, the middle of July.

Q. Suppose the contract to have been made and the service to have been entered upon by the contractor from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, and then the error discovered, how could it be corrected?—A. The service could have been discontinued, allowing the contractor a month's extra pay, and temporary service could have been gotten up from Pueblo and the route readvertised.

That is the law. Brady made no mistake about that. If there was a mistake in the advertised points he could have given the contractor a month's extra pay, readvertised the route, and relet it to somebody else. I ask you to bear this in mind, because you know if you rely on the petitions it will appear that it was afterward necessary to increase the trips and reduce the time.

On the 1st of October, 1878, Miner wrote and signed the name of E. M. Ames to a subcontract. He says that Ames was a young man, was a relative of his, and of course it did not make any difference to Miner; he was in the signing business anyhow, and he just simply sat down and signed the name of E. M. Ames to the subcontract, and put that subcontract in the office. It was necessary to do that. He might as well use Ames as anybody else when he wanted to get the best of the man who was doing the work. It did not make any difference whether it was Vaile or Ames who signed the subcontract; so Miner signed the subcontract and put it in the office.

Now, on the 14th of April, 1879, S. W. Dorsey begins. He writes a letter to J. L. Routt, which is marked 33 X, and it is found at page 2275:

WASHINGTON, April 14, 1879.

Hon. J. L. ROUTT, Denver:

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I wish to introduce my friend, Mr. M. C. Reddell. You will find him a thorough-going Republican and an upright man, in whom you can confide. He has, together with Colonel Peck, a great many mail routes in your State, and if you can aid him in any way I shall be very thankful to you.

Sincerely yours,

S. W. DORSEY.

You see he was getting ready to send Rerdell out to attend to the business, and here is one certificate of good character that he gives Rerdell: "He is an upright man and a thorough-going Republican."

On the 16th of April, 1879, Miner wrote a letter to Brady, transmitting a proposal for carrying mail on an expedited schedule; or rather Miner did not write the letter; Rerdell wrote it for him, and it is just one day ahead of the time when the oath was taken, if it was taken at all on the day that it specifies. The oath was not made at that time, but Rerdell says: "Dorsey told me to write that letter, and I wrote it, but it was written before the oath was made." On the 16th, the same day, S. W. Dorsey wrote another letter, 34 X, page 2276:

WASHINGTON, April 16, 1879.

The other was the 14th.

Captain M. S. PADDOCK, Denver:

DEAR MART: This will introduce M. C. Reddell, a friend of mine, who has large interests in Colorado, and whom I trust you will find it convenient as well as pleasant to serve. He is a gentleman of the highest character and first-rate ability.

Anything you do for him you do for me.

Yours, truly,

S. W. DORSEY.

This is in April, 1879, and in December, when Miner reached Dorsey's house, he says, "I found him hanging around Dorsey's house with some of these Arkansas fellows."

On the 17th day of April—and I want you to be particular about these dates, gentlemen; I would like you to remember them as near as possible—Rerdell started for the West to make subcontracts; and on page 2232, I will read you what he says he was to do:

Q. Did you have any arrangement to take charge of mail matter for S. W. Dorsey in April of 1879?—A. I did; I had an arrangement with him.

Further down on the page:

Q. What time did you leave?—A. I left here either on the 17th or 18th of April; the 18th, I think.

Then, at the bottom of the page:

Q. Under whose instructions did you go West on that occasion?—A. Under instructions of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. What were those instructions?—A. Those instructions were to go to certain named routes, to make new subcontracts, and at each place to get up petitions and letters asking for an increase of service and expedition, and to stop in Denver and to get as many letters written for increase and expedition as I could, from the governor and the other State officers.

Q. What new subcontracts did you make in the course of your visit to the West; on what routes, if you can name them?

The WITNESS. Shall I state all the routes?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, as far as you can recollect them; I mean those that are in this indictment; you know what the indictment contains.

A. I made one on 38135, and another on 38134.

38134 is on your map, gentlemen, Pueblo to Rosita. It runs up at an angle from Greenhorn, and then across.

Q. What are the termini of those routes?—A. One of them is Pueblo to Greenhorn, and the other is Pueblo to Rosita.

Q. What other routes in this indictment?—A. I do not think I made any subcontracts at that time on any other routes in this indictment.

Q. Were those subcontracts filed?—A. I think not. No, sir.

Q. Did you give any directions as to their being filed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What instructions did you give?—A. My instructions were to prevent their being filed if possible.

Q. From whom did you get those instructions?—A. From Mr. Dorsey.

Q. Which Dorsey?—A. S. W. Dorsey.

Q. Did S. W. Dorsey explain to you the reason for his making any change from the original form of the subcontract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What explanation did he give you of the new covenant in the new subcontracts which was to be substituted for the old?—A. He said that very few of these men who were subcontractors knew anything about expedition, and for me to be sure and not tell them where they did not know anything about it—to make the subcontracts without any reference to any expedition with subcontractors.

Q. Where they did not know anything about it, not to tell them anything about it?—A. Yes, sir; and where they did, I was to make the best terms I could.

Q. What excuse were you to give these people for wanting a change of subcontracts?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is that the proper way to examine the witness?

The COURT. That is rather leading, perhaps.

Q. What instructions, if any, did he give you as to what you were to say to the subcontractors in negotiating for a change from the old form?—A. That the old firm had dissolved and he now had these routes and would guarantee the payment; he was to guarantee the payment providing they did not put the subcontracts on file.

Q. When did you return from that visit?—A. I returned about the 5th of May.

Well, that is sufficient about that. Then, on the 17th day of April, Miner wrote and signed an oath. It is 5 B, and is found on page 778:

Mr. MERRICK. What year?

Mr. KER. 1879.

WASHINGTON, D. C., 17th April, 1879.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mails on route No. 38135, three times a week, on the present schedule, is one man and one animal. The number necessary to carry the mails three times a week on a reduced schedule of seven hours is two men and four animals.

Respectfully,

JNO. R. MINER.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

County of Washington:

Personally appeared before me the above John R. Miner, and made oath to the above statement this 17th day of April, 1879.

W. F. KELLOGG,
Notary Public.

W. F. Kellogg was the private secretary of Stephen W. Dorsey—the man that Dorsey kept in his house to do the swearing for these people, or, rather, to affix his signature when they did it before him. It was handy to have a notary public in the house, for they were doing considerable of it. Gentlemen, just take the oath and look at it. [Handing the original paper to the jury.] I will tell you what Miner says about it. He knows more about it than any of us, or ought to. At page 4184 he says:

Look at that paper, 5 B.—A. That is all my handwriting except the signature of the notary.

Q. What is the date of that paper?—A. The 17th of April, 1879.

Q. That Saint Charles and Greenhorn route was not one of the routes that you and Mr. Vaile took in the division, I believe?—A. It was not; but this affidavit was dated eighteen days before the final consummation of the separation.

Q. That is what I wanted to ask you to explain. How came you to make that affidavit after the separation?—A. I never touched pen to paper for them after the separation was complete in any shape or form.

Q. When did you say that was completed?—A. The 5th of May, 1879. If you will look at 16 B you will find out from that.

Q. Do I understand you to say that was the only affidavit you made on any Dorsey routes after the separation?—A. That was the only affidavit I ever made on Dorsey's routes at any time, and that was eighteen days before the separation was finally consummated.

Q. What affidavits did either Peck or John W. Dorsey make on any of your or Vaile's routes after the separation?—A. They made none.

On the 22d of April, 1879, there was a letter from Mr. Chaffee. This letter was written from New York, and it is dated April 23, 1879. It is marked 8 B, and it is found on page 784. Now, gentlemen, I would like to know how a letter written on the 23d of April, in New York, could be put on file in the Post-Office Department in Washington, on the 22d of April. That is one of the things that I cannot find out. You know we had another man in this indictment, Mr. Turner, but as he is not in the indictment now, I do not want to mention what he did. It is not worth while to trouble your minds with that. He was there. He is not here now. But I just call to your attention this little eccentricity, as it shows that the dates did not amount to anything; had nothing at all to do with it. But when my friends come to argue they will say, "Oh, this was done on such a day." Yes; so it appears by the writing. But the truth is that it was not. As Rerdell said in his testimony: "Why, I altered that after it was put into the post-office." This letter of Chaffee's is put in here asking for an increase upon this route and is dated on the 23d of April, in New York, and it was written by John S. Sibbald, another one of Dorsey's clerks or secretaries, who is in one of the departments here to-day. Sibbald wrote the letter, and Chaffee signed it, and it is dated the 23d of April, and it got into the post-office on the 22d. May be they had an expedited mail from New York that we did not know anything about.

On May 5, 1879, Miner asks to have all communications addressed to Rerdell, box 706. His own box was 714. He says, "I fix the 5th of May, 1879, as the date when we separated, because these letters were all sent on that day, and therefore we divided up on that day." I am exceedingly obliged to him for fixing it in that way. It might have led to a little trouble, but as he fixes it we will take it as he says.

On the 8th of May, if we believe the writing on the back of it, the oath was left in the Post-Office Department. And on the 8th of May Rerdell wrote and signed Miner's name to a letter to Brady transmitting oath and accompanying petition. They were 7 B, 11 B, and 12 B.

Your honor, shall I keep on?

The COURT. No; I think you may suspend. We will adjourn now.

Mr. KER. I am not particular. This clock is five minutes too fast. I am starting out to explain something.

The COURT. If you have reached a stopping-point, we will adjourn. [To the crier.] Adjourn the court until Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until Monday morning, April 23, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, APRIL 23, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock:

Present: counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, we were examining into the record on the Saint Charles and Greenhorn route, or Pueblo to Greenhorn, as it ought to have been. I will just run over the facts again, without making any comments, so that you will remember them. The postmaster at Pueblo informed the department that there was a mistake in the route, that it ought to have gone to Pueblo. The postmaster at Saint Charles sent the same notice. The route was then extended up to Pueblo. Then Miner put in a contract in the name of Ames, he signing it himself. I told you about the letter of S. W. Dorsey to Governor Routt, introducing Rerdell. Then there was a letter of Miner to Brady, transmitting a proposal for carrying the mail on the expedited schedule. Rerdell wrote that letter by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. At that time the oath was not made. I then read to you the different letters that Stephen W. Dorsey gave to Rerdell to take out West.

Finally, on the 17th of April, 1879, Rerdell started West. Then the oath was made by Miner. This was one of Miner's routes. Then Miner gave his explanation as to how it was that he came to make the oath. Then there was a letter of Mr. Chaffee, written from New York on the 23d of April, and put in the Post-Office Department on the 22d, which I showed to you in order to convince you that the dates written on the backs of these papers do not amount to much. On the 5th of May, 1879, Miner asked to have all communications sent to box 706. That was Rerdell's box. On the 8th of May, 1879, Miner's oath was received in the Post-Office Department. On the same day that the oath was received Rerdell wrote and signed Miner's name to a letter transmitting a number of petitions. The petitions are marked 7 B, 11 B, and 12 B. This is the letter that accompanied these petitions [exhibiting letter]. 7 B had the words "and faster time" written in it. Here it is [exhibiting paper]. It simply asked for an increase, but the words "and faster time" were written. On 11 B the words "and a faster schedule" were written. You have had all these before. On 12 B the words "on quicker time" were written. These three petitions were inclosed in this letter by Mr. Rerdell. Rerdell says, "I wrote those words in those petitions. I did it by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey." That was the testimony given by Rerdell. Mr. Dorsey makes his answer to that on page 3770:

Q. Do you recollect about his going West some time in April, 1879?—A. I think he did.

Q. Do you know for what purpose he went?—A. He went there to re-sublet the contracts and see that the service was put on in good shape; that is, the service in which I was interested.

Q. Did you give him any instructions as to petitions or letters or anything of that character with regard to increase and expedition of service?—A. I presume I did. I have always supposed we had a right to petition in this country.

Then, again, he says further, on page 3935:

A. I did everything that I knew how to do that was lawful and proper to have the routes that I thought ought to be increased and expedited increased and expedited. If I left anything undone I do not know it.

Next, on the 26th of June, 1879, Brady made an order. It is marked 4 B, and found on page 778:

First, increase service one trip a week from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $438.80 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second, reduce running time from sixteen hours to seven hours from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $2,630.40 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

At the time that this order was made, and on the very jacket upon which the order was made, the revenue was given, the amount being stated to be $513. With those figures before Mr. Brady, he made an order which for expedition alone took from the Government $2,630.40. Let us see what his explanation is. It is found on page 3412:

Q. Do you remember anything about the increase of trips on the route from Saint Charles to Greenhorn?—A. I remember very little about it.

Q. Do you remember ordering an increase of trips and a reduction of time?—A. I think there was such an increase and expedition ordered. Let me see the papers, and I can tell more about it.

Mr. BLISS. I want to get your memory, Mr. Brady.

Q. Now, it appearing that by the contract there were to be two trips a week at an annual expense of $548, which, applying pro rata, would make $1,644 for six trips a week, why, when you were doing something for that route, instead of giving them six trips at an expense of $1,644, did you add one trip and reduce the time at an expense of $1,345.60, thus paying $2,301.60 more for service than would have been paid had you given the people there six trips a week?

Do you understand that question, gentlemen? It is, why he allowed expedition and only three trips a week, when if he had given them six trips a week without the expedition he would have saved to the Government $2,301.60; in other words, why he paid $2,301.60 more for three trips on short time than he could have given them six trips a week for?

The WITNESS. Let me see the paper.

Q. Do you remember why you did that?—A. I do not. [Witness examines the papers which had been handed to him.] I did it for the reasons, I believe, stated on this jacket.

Mr. BLISS. That jacket is marked 4 B.

Q. Do you remember how you arrived at the time to which service should be reduced, as reducing it from sixteen hours to seven hours?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether you evolved that from your inner consciousness or whether you got it from the papers?—A. I could not say that without looking at the papers.

Q. You do not remember independently of them?—A. I do not.

Q. [Submitting papers.] Please look at the papers and see if you find any paper which asks for seven hours' schedule?—A. I find in this first petition, indorsed by Senators Teller and Hill, a request for an additional trip and faster time.

Mr. BLISS. Here is a letter of Senator Chaffee asking for daily mail service. There is a petition, marked 10 B, to which I call your attention, asking for eight hours, and another one, marked 11 B, asking for the same.

The WITNESS. For eight hours?

Mr. BLISS. For eight hours; you will find it at the end.

The WITNESS. I could not say how we arrived at the seven hours. But if they asked for eight we may have concluded that we preferred seven. That would make a little over four miles an hour, and that is about as slow as an expedited route ought to be.

Q. Then you do not know how you arrived at the time, seven hours, upon that route?—A. I do not, except that seven hours is better than eight hours.

Gentlemen, there were two petitions that mention eight hours. I have shown you the petitions in this case, excepting one that asked for eight hours, which is 10 B. I call your attention to the fact that these petitions were put in on the 8th of May, 1879, and I also call your attention to the fact that only two petitions mention eight hours. Mr. Brady reduced the time to seven hours. Now let us go back. On the 17th of April, as I told you, before these petitions were brought in, and before anything had been done at all, Miner made his oath for seven hours. I ask you to remember that away back in April Miner was getting up an oath for seven hours, and that finally Mr. Brady accommodated him by making the time seven hours, one hour less than the petitions asked for, and I think you will say the proper explanation of the case is that it had been talked over among these defendants, and as the petitions asked for eight hours, they concluded to make it seven in order to make it appear that there was something in the expedition, and that really the Government had got a bargain in running the mail in seven hours.

The next thing was an order to change the schedule, made by Mr. Brady. Then on the 11th of November, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey filed his subcontract dated the 1st of April, 1879, to carry the mail from the 1st of July. This was one of the routes taken by Dorsey. Rerdell witnessed this subcontract, and it was signed by Miner.

On the 23d of July, 1880, Brady made another change of schedule. On the 13th of October, 1880, Postmaster Piper wrote that a "mail to Agate once a week would be sufficient." His letter is 22 B, and on page 790:

If we could have service on this route at this office once a week each way, say from the Saint Charles office on Saturdays to this office, and thence to the Greenhorn, returning on Monday via this office and the Saint Charles, it would be satisfactory.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. S. PIPER,
Postmaster.

On November 10, 1880, Brady ordered :

From December 1, 1880, embrace Agate in this route next after Saint Charles, increasing the distance three miles, and allowing the contractor and subcontractor $369.90 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

That is 20 B, on page 789. The postmaster said that one trip would do, and Brady ordered the office put on the route, which, of course, meant three trips. This order was to take effect on the 1st day of December. On the 14th of December, 1880, Brady made another order :

Omit Agate and allow one month's extra pay.

That is 23 B, and found on page 791. At the bottom of page 790 he gives his reasons for omitting Agate :

An order issued November 10, 1880, to embrace Agate on this route, increasing the distance three miles and the contractor's pay $369.90 per annum. It now appears that the distance should have been increased eight miles. The importance of the office will not justify the expenditure.

Agate should be made special.

Then he goes on and gives his order :

From January 1, 1881, omit Agate from this route, decreasing the distance three miles, and deduct from contractor's and subcontractor's pay $369.90, being pro rata.

Allow contractor and subcontractor one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

Now, gentlemen, Mr. Piper, the postmaster, was on the stand in the other court-house. You remember that he testified that he never received a letter. On one occasion the carrier came around that road, but did not leave him a letter, and went on down to Greenhorn. We put in the returns of the postmaster. He did not take in one single penny for a single postage-stamp in that office. Nothing was taken in, good, bad, or indifferent. We asked him what he received for his salary, and he said "Nothing at all;" he had not received a cent. Here are his returns in this record ; not a penny received in the office and not a letter ever carried. Yet with this fact staring Brady in the face, after making the order to put Agate on the route for three times a week, fourteen days after the service should have been put on Brady made the other order to omit Agate from January 1, 1881, and allow the contractor a month's extra pay. Remember, he did not cut it right off, but allowed it to run. The contractors had never carried a letter, and they were not entitled to a month's extra pay ; but in this way they secured two months' pay for the unperformed service to Agate. We asked Mr. Brady why it was that he made such an order as that, and why he did not cut off the service and allow them nothing : "Why," he said, "under the law I was bound to allow them one month's extra pay when I cut off the service." You know that is not so, because he could not put an office on a route at a greater expense than two-thirds of the pay of the postmaster ; and two-thirds of Mr. Piper's pay would have been two-thirds of nothing. Then he said, "I think it was a just order." That was all the explanation he had to make—"I think it was a just order." It is a very small thing. I do not want to dwell too much upon it, but it was in perfect harmony with Mr. Brady's orders all the way through.

On the 7th of December, 1880, S. W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract.

On this route first Vaile drew the pay, and next Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay; that is, by taking the warrants. I want to read to you some extracts from what the witnesses said. You remember, gentlemen, that the order was made to increase one trip on the 26th of June, 1879, and to reduce the time from sixteen hours to seven hours. The route was started at twelve and a half hours, and I told you they made an addition, because they said twelve miles was added from Saint Charles to Pueblo, and in order to compensate for that supposed twelve miles the time was made sixteen hours, while in reality the carrier had always been going over the whole of the route from Greenhorn right up to Pueblo. If Brady had left the time at the old figure, twelve and a half hours, it would have been well enough, but he raised it up to sixteen, and came from sixteen down to seven. Mr. Farrish, who was the subcontractor, says, "I always carried the mail in from six to ten hours before expedition. I carried the mail from Greenhorn up to Pueblo. I did not stop at Saint Charles." There he was carrying the mail in from six to ten hours when Brady allowed sixteen hours to do it in, and finally brought it down to seven, when, if we believe the two petitions that were put in, eight hours was the shortest time asked for. Mr. Sears, the postmaster at Greenhorn, testified to the same thing. Mr. Marks, the clerk at Pueblo, says: "The mail left Pueblo for all points at 1 o'clock p. m. Under the expedited schedule the mail arrived at 2 p. m., one hour after the time for connection." When Brady brought the time down to seven hours, and the mail arrived from Greenhorn at 2 o'clock, that was one hour after the mail had left Pueblo for all points. Pueblo is on a railroad, and the train had left when the mail arrived. What difference did it make whether that mail reached Pueblo at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, or at 5 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon, when it could not leave the place till next day at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

Now let us analyze the oath upon which all this was done. I want to read to you what Mr. Miner says, on page 4242, because he is entitled to his explanation as to why he made this oath. There is the oath, gentlemen [exhibiting oath to jury], which he says was all written within a few hours of the same time. You see there is a space between where the figures are written in and the rest of the writing:

Q. When you made that affidavit did you consider that you had any interest in that route?—A. I did not consider that I had any interest, pecuniarily, after the first of the pay after the 1st of April, 1879.

Q. Then why did you make the affidavit of the 17th of April, 1879?—A. Probably because I was asked to make it, and because it was more convenient that I should make it than that the subcontractor should make it.

Q. That is the only reason you can give for it?—A. I know of no other reason.

Q. You did make it on the day it bears date?—A. I have no reason to suppose that I did not, and I haven't any reason particularly to suppose that I did.

Q. It was filed on the 18th?—A. It was undoubtedly made on the day it purports to have been made, though I don't remember.

Q. I do not recollect now—for these intervening discussions have blurred my memory a little—whether you said it was all written at the same time or not?—A. It has the appearance of not having been written all at the same time, but it must have been written within a few hours of the same time.

Q. Why do you say it must have been written within a few hours of the same time?—A. Because it was dated on the 17th and filed on 18th.

Q. Have you any recollection about it?—A. None.

Q. No more than you have about the other?—A. No, sir. I simply know that I would not make an affidavit in blank myself and fill it up myself; that would be stupid, and I am not charged with that.

Q. That is the only reason, because you would not make the affidavit in blank and fill it up yourself?—A. That is the main reason.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is enough.

Q. But you would make an affidavit in blank for somebody else to fill up, would you not?—A. I never did, although I was requested to do so by your assistant counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, I thank you for that suggestion, but I am not defending the man that you refer to. You were all mixed up in the same transaction, but if you suppose that I am defending him you are mistaken. [Handing the paper to the jury.] Look at that affidavit, gentlemen.

Q. You were making an affidavit at his request, were you?—A. I made the affidavit at his request, and made it truthfully, as I believed.

Q. What did you know about the number of men and horses necessary on that route?

The WITNESS. What did I know?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

The WITNESS. Do you mean to ask if I had been on the route?

Q. Had you been on the route?—A. I had not.

Q. What did you know about it?—A. I suppose I knew that to carry the mail thirty-five miles in sixteen hours one man and one horse would do it.

Q. Whether over a mountain or not?—A. I had looked at the map of the country and I knew that it was not over a mountain.

Q. You knew it was a straight road?—A. I knew it was out on the plains.

Q. How many men and horses did you provide for carrying the mail on the lowest time?—A. I provided two men and four horses.

Q. Does that affidavit (5 B) provide that?—A. It does.

Q. How much is the time reduced?—A. Sixteen hours.

Q. Do you not know that there never was any increase in the number of men or the number of horses on that route at all from the original schedule?—A. I have been directed by his honor not to retestify to the testimony given in this case. At that time I did not know it.

There is his statement of the affidavit that he made. He had not been on the route. He made it, he says, at the request of Rerdell. He did not know how many men and animals were required. He said that on the present schedule one man and one horse were required, and on the proposed schedule of seven hours two men and four horses would be used. It was the difference between one man and one horse, two, and two men and four horses, six. Two from six would leave four. Four was the figure he made his proportion on. On that point Farrish, Higgason, and McDaniel all testified to the same thing. On the old schedule they used one man and two horses. When the time was expedited to seven hours they made no change, but used one man and two animals all the time. There was no change at all. The law says there shall be no pay unless more men and animals are required. By this oath of Miner they took out of the Treasury $2,630.40 by means of the falsity of that very oath. There were $47.60 on fines on this route. Mr. Brady very promptly remitted them and paid them back. Before speaking of the pay I want to call your attention to 7 B. Here it is. [Exhibiting it.] It is indorsed by Belford, Teller, and Hill. Mr. Rerdell testified that he wrote in that petition the words "and faster time." That only goes to show that a member of Congress will put his name to anything, and send it along as a matter of course. I will show you a lot of cases of that kind as we go along.

The original pay for two trips was $548. The route was increased to $3,945.60. The mail was carried for $840, which was the pay that was given to the subcontractor. Subtract that from the amount that Brady allowed for this service, and you will find the contractor's profit to be on this route alone, $3,105.60; a clean and clear profit over and above everything that was paid to the subcontractors, with the subcontractors to pay all the fines and deductions. The amount of money that they put in their pockets over and above all the expense was $3,105.60, all through Mr. Miner's affidavit. That will remind you again of what Miner said to Moore: "We are all good affidavit men, and we propose to make a pretty good thing out of it." I have shown you the productiveness of this route. It is there on the jacket. Five hundred and thirteen dollars was the amount of money that was received into the public Treasury for $3,945.60 paid out.

Now, gentlemen, there is one thing I want to call your attention to in this connection, because it will answer for all the routes in this case.

There is one other thing I want to call your attention to. The overt acts you have to find. [Handing paper to jury. [There is the oath, dated June 26, 1879, the very day Mr. Brady made his order. Gentlemen, I hand it to you because I do not want any of the gentlemen on the other side to say these dates are wrong. June, 1879, is the date of Mr. Brady's order. In that jacket was this oath. It is marked here 1879, April 18, yet it was used on the same day that the order was made upon which that calculation was based. False petitions, altered petitions, changed petitions—there they are. Rerdell says "I wrote those words in"—the words put in there. They are not the petitions that the people sent; they are changed, altered, fraudulent petitions. Vaile got the money. Miner made the oath. Stephen W. Dorsey drew the money on his subcontract that was put in. Rerdell assisted. They were all in this thing excepting John W. Dorsey; he is the only man whose hand has not appeared in this route at all.

No. 38134, PUEBLO TO ROSITA, COLORADO.

This is the route that runs by way of Greenwood over to Rosita, and this route was taken by Dorsey in the division. The foreman says these things are photographed in his mind, and I do not doubt but they are, but there is one point I want to call your attention to. [Handing maps to jury.] I just show you the maps and, as I go along, you will see the necessity for it. Here is the railroad running up here. [Pointing.] You know the route does not run by the railroad; it runs across.

This route was forty-nine miles; there was one trip a week, time fifteen hours. John R. Miner was contractor, and the pay was $388. John W. Dorsey commenced by witnessing the contract. I told you in the other route that John W. Dorsey had nothing to do with it. I find he had; he assisted in the proposal. I will read you the official orders:

August 30, 1878, letter from M. N. Megure to Brady.

March 17, 1879, letter from Postmaster Monroe, at Greenwood.

April 21, 1879, John W. Dorsey made oath.

April 22, 1879, petitions filed.

April 25, 1879, letter from Governor Pitkin filed.

April 26, 1879, letter signed by Chief-Justice Thatcher.

May 5, 1879, order to change address.

May 5, 1879, letter from John W. Dorsey.

May 6, 1879, oath of Dorsey filed.

May 8, 1879, John W. Dorsey asked to withdraw his oath.

May 8, 1879, second oath of Dorsey filed.

July 8, 1879, Brady made an order for increase and expedition.

October 17, 1879, change of schedule ordered.

October 22, 1879, subcontract of Eli Hanson filed.

May 8, 1880, letter from postmaster at Greenwood.

July 31, 1881, route discontinued.

Let me go back. Frank Tuttle was the contractor upon this route. He made a contract with Miner to carry the mail at $700 a year. Remember that. They were getting $388. Tuttle says, "I made a contract with him to carry it at $700 a year, and I made him put up the cash in the bank." He was on the stand in the other court-room. You may remember him—a tall, thin man, who said he was running the route up the other way. On the 19th of August, 1878, there was a letter sent to Tuttle. It is 14 C, page 885:

[Branch office, Kansas City, Mo., John W. Dorsey & Co., mail contractors.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1878.

FRANK A. TUTTLE, Box 44, Pueblo, Colo. :

DEAR SIR: Yours 14th received. We accept your proposition, provided (so that there shall be no conflict) that a friend of ours, who has recently gone to Colorado, has not made different arrangements before we can get him word.

The petition for expedition should be separate from the petition for increase of number of trips. We make no boast of being solid with anybody, but can get what is reasonable.

Yours, truly,

MINER, PECK & CO.

Gentlemen, that letter was written and signed by John R. Miner. He was beginning to get the thing under way, and wrote to Tuttle to make the petitions for increase separate from the petition for expedition, and he says:

We make no boast of being solid with anybody, but can get what is reasonable.

And, for fear that Tuttle might mistake it, he underscored the word "solid." That was on the 19th of August, 1878.

On the 30th of August, 1878, Mr. Megrue wrote to Brady about this route. It is 1 C, and is found at page 865:

COLORADO STATE PENITENTIARY,
WARDEN'S OFFICE,
Cañon City, August 30, 1878.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Post-Office Department, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I understand that there is a petition in circulation to have the schedule changed on the route from Pueblo to Rosita from once a week, as it now is, to three times a week. You are aware there is now a daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita, by way of Cañon City—

That is not the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt. Do not get the places mixed in your minds—and all the mail for Rosita goes and comes by way of Cañon City, and would continue to do so if there was a daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita by way of Greenwood. The object in having the service increased is not to better accommodate the people, but for the increased pay.

Yours, truly,

M. N. MEGRUE,
Contractor, Route No. 38132.

Megrue, you know, was a man who was running another route, but he notified Brady that no matter whether he made daily mail or not, of course it would go along the railroad.

September 3, 1878, there was another letter to Tuttle. It is 15 C, and is found on page 886:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 3, 1878.

FRANK A. TUTTLE:

DEAR SIR: Yours 23d received. We have been looking into the chances of having route 38134 increased to three trips a week, and they do not look promising. The only office supplied by the route is Greenwood, according to the rule of the department, as Rosita has mail six times a week from route 38132, and Pueblo is on R. R. We will, however, do what we can to accomplish it. If we fail we have an offer to carry the mail once a week at a reasonable price.

Truly, yours,

MINER, PECK & CO.

Miner wrote and signed that letter. You remember that Tuttle said he did not want to carry the mail on this route; that he took it at this big price simply because he said he just wanted to accommodate them, but he made them put the money into the bank. He did not care about carrying it. They were asking him about the increase and about getting up petitions, and they said, "If it cannot be increased, then we will get somebody who will take it at a less rate" than they were paying him! You know they were losing. They were paying him nearly double what they got for it. They got $388, and they paid him $700.

On the 17th of March, 1879, there was a letter from Postmaster Monroe, at Greenwood. That is 8 C, and is found at page 869:

GREENWOOD, COLO., March 17, 1879.

Mr. JAMES H. TYNER,

First Assistant Postmaster-General:

My duty to the department requires that I should suggest the discontinuance of the present mail service [weekly] from Pueblo to Rosita, as we now have a tri-weekly from Florence to Greenhorn, by which we receive all our mail at present, and while we should much prefer the route from Pueblo to Rosita, yet so long as we have the mail promptly by the other route the service from Pueblo to Rosita is superfluous and a needless expense to the Government. I do not make this suggestion at the instance of any interested parties, but simply as a saving to the department.

I am, dear sir, yours, very respectfully,

A. Q. MONROE, Postmaster.

Indorsed:

P. M., Greenwood, suggests discontinuance of service.

I have shown you that in April, 1879, S. W. Dorsey wrote letters and gave them to Rerdell, and on the 17th of April, 1879, Rerdell started out West. Stephen W. Dorsey testifies to the same thing.

On the 21st of April, 1879, John W. Dorsey made an oath. Gentlemen, this route was Miner's. J. W. Dorsey made an oath as subcontractor. Here it is, 4 C, for increase to seven trips, ten hours, and he says it takes seven men and thirty-eight animals. Kellogg, who was Stephen W. Dorsey's secretary, and who testified here on the stand, wrote the body of this oath. Rerdell filled in the figures. John W. Dorsey signed the oath.

There were petitions filed on the 22d of April for a daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita; not one of these petitions specified which route it was, whether along the railroad, or across the other way by the stage line.

On the 25th of April, 1879, there was a letter of Governor Pitkin's filed, indorsed by J. B. Belford. Gentlemen, Rerdell wrote that letter and Pitkin signed it. Rerdell had letters from Stephen W. Dorsey to different people out there, and he wrote that letter and Governor Pitkin signed it.

On the 26th of April, 1879, there is a letter signed by Chief-Justice Thatcher and Associate-Justice Stone, both of the supreme court of Colorado. Rerdell wrote that letter and those gentlemen signed it, because Rerdell's letters of introduction called for some courtesy, as coming from Stephen W. Dorsey. Rerdell put the letters in his pocket and brought them home. Stephen W. Dorsey says, at page 3770:

Q. Do you remember giving him any instructions in reference to getting letters from prominent men, governors or judges, or officers of any kind?—A. That is possible.

He does not deny that he did it. He says: "That is possible."

Then came the letters to change the address to care of Rerdell. May 5, 1879, John Dorsey's oath, that is, 4 C, was transmitted to the department. Rerdell wrote the letter of transmittal. You remember that Rerdell testified: "I got back on the 5th of May, and when I got back I found a lot of blank affidavits. Stephen W. Dorsey told me to fill them up, and I filled them up." He says on the 5th of May he got back, and on that day he wrote the letter transmitting this oath of John W. Dorsey's to the department.

On the 8th of May, 1879, John W. Dorsey wrote a letter asking leave to withdraw this oath, and making the statement that there was an error in it as the reason why he wanted it withdrawn. The oath was not taken from the files but was left there. He simply wrote a letter stating that he wanted it withdrawn.

On the same day, the 8th of May, the second oath of Dorsey was filed, and this oath is dated 26th of April, 1879. Both oaths are dated the same day. Rerdell says: "I wrote the body of that oath, filled it in, and John W. Dorsey signed it." Now, we questioned John W. Dorsey as to why it was that he came to put in these two oaths calling for a different number of men and animals. He says, in 4 C:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route No. 38134, on the present schedule, is three men and twelve animals.

In this other affidavit he says:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route No. 38134, on the present schedule, is two men and six animals.

There is a vast difference between those two statements, and we wanted to know how it was that he came to make those two statements. On page 4134 he says:

Q. Did you know anything about the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on that route at the time you affixed your jurat to those affidavits?—A. I don't suppose I did practically. I don't think I did.

Q. Don't you know you did not?—A. Yes, sir; I know I did not.

Q. What did you swear to it for?—A. I swore to what my belief was.

Q. How did you found that belief?—A. As I stated this morning, I pretended to no experience in the business, but I relied upon another man, and swore to what I believed at the time to be true.

Q. Who was the other man?—A. Mr. Rerdell.

Q. What did he know about it?—A. He claimed to know about it.

Q. Did you not know that he knew as little about it as you did?—A. No; I think he knew a good deal more.

Q. Why did you not make Rerdell swear to it?—A. He could not legally, I suppose.

Then, again, on page 4136, he says:

The WITNESS. I know what he wrote me well enough.

Q. I don't care about it. How do you know what he wrote you; do you recollect it?—A. I don't recollect it particularly, but every time he sent me something to sign he would write me in regard to it—

Q. [Interposing.] Then, you don't recollect?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Let him go on.

A. [Continuing.] I never wrote that word "subcontractor" in there.

Q. You say every time he sent you anything to sign he wrote you about it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But you have no recollection of what he said to you when he sent you these affidavits, have you?—A. No, sir; nothing particularly.

Q. No independent recollection?—A. He wrote that word subcontractor in there. That is one of his tricks.

Q. How do you recollect it?—A. It is his handwriting.

Q. He wrote that in there for you to swear to, and you swore to it like a man?—A. He wrote it in there after I swore to it. I never swore to any "subcontractor."

Then, on the next page, at the bottom:

Q. On the same day you swore that the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on that same route was two men and six animals. Both of those statements could not be true. Which was a lie? [After a pause.] Which was the lie and which was the truth? Take the papers and look at them and tell the jury.—A. [After examining the papers.] If I made a mistake I probably corrected it, as far as that is concerned.

Q. You did not say you corrected it. Both were made on the same day, and both could not be true. Take your choice and tell us which is the truth.—A. I had not observed before that these were both on the same route. I would like to make an explanation.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly, sir; you are entitled to make any you can.

Then there was some conversation between counsel and the court.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want any information except what took place then. You swore to them up in Vermont.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Q. Was Rerdell there?—A. No, sir. One came in the early morning mail at 3 o'clock, and I went out and acknowledged that one and put it in the next mail, as he wanted it right off.

Q. Do you recollect that?—A. Yes, sir.

Then on the next page, near the top :

The WITNESS. I will tell you. My memory was refreshed when you called my attention to the fact that they were both on the same route. I went up and had one acknowledged, which came in the morning mail, because he said he wanted it immediately, and I mailed it in the 11 o'clock mail. In the afternoon at 2.40 another one came, saying that there was an error, and he wanted to have me acknowledge that, and he would destroy the other one, and so I went up and acknowledged that and sent it on the next mail. It came on the night mail.

Q. Do you recollect that fact?—A. I recollect it from my memory being refreshed.

Q. Refreshed or unrefreshed, do you recollect that fact?—A. Yes, sir; I think I do very thoroughly.

Then at the bottom :

Q. Did it suggest itself to you, when you got the second letter on that day to swear to the second affidavit, that you had been led into making an affidavit that was incorrect?—A. I do not know. I do not recollect.

Q. It did not make any difference to you, did it?

By the COURT:

Q. You say the letter was from Rerdell?—A. Yes, sir.

Gentlemen, those two affidavits were made on the 21st of April, 1879. When we found that John W. Dorsey was swearing that way there was a telegram sent from the Department of Justice to the West, and, with the aid of postmasters out there, it was soon ascertained where Rerdell was upon that date. We brought Mr. Rumsey from Sidney, Nebraska. He kept the Sidney Hotel, and he brought his book, showing that on the 21st of April, 1879, M. C. Rerdell was registered at Sidney, Nebraska. Then the book from Greeley, Colorado, showed that Rerdell was registered at that hotel for dinner on the 24th of April, 1879. On the same day (24th of April, 1879) Mr. Hinman, of Denver, says that Mr. Rerdell was registered at his house, the Grand Central, and he staid there until next morning. Now, gentlemen, how could Rerdell write and send those letters when he was away out West at that time? And in addition to that, John W. Dorsey swore to those two affidavits on that day, so he says, "not in blank," and he remembers it because "one came in the morning, and another came in the afternoon, because he got the letter from Rerdell——"

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] He says the letter came from Washington.

Mr. KER. Came from Washington; yes, that is right; "that they were sent by Rerdell, and that Rerdell told him he was going to destroy one and use the other." Gentlemen, he fixes the fact, and says that he is positive of it. I will show you right here, by this package of papers, that there were four affidavits on that one day—not two, but four, on three different routes: two on this one, one on another, and one on a third. There is Mr. Dorsey's explanation. When I come to the others I will call your attention back to them. We will see who was telling the truth.

On the 8th of July, 1879, Brady made an order, marked 2 C, page 866:

1st. Increase service to six trips per week from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $2,328 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Reduce running time from fifteen hours to ten hours from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $5,432 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

BRADY.

Now, gentlemen, in this jacket, upon which Brady made this order, is found a letter from Mr. Monroe, the postmaster at Greenwood, telling him that the route ought to be discontinued. Inside the jacket upon which he made this very order is another jacket, saying that this route ought to be discontinued, and right across that jacket where the clerk has marked down what the contents were: "Letter requesting it to be discontinued," he wrote: "Do this.—Brady." There it is, in blue pencil—"Do this.—Brady." We did not know which he meant by "Do this.—Brady," for he seemed to indorse what the postmaster said—to discontinue the route. He afterwards made an order granting them over $5,000 for expedition alone. One jacket was inside the other, and they were all together to make up the case. Brady has given us a short statement as to why he did it, on page 3432:

Q. In that case, there being two affidavits on file stating a different number of men and animals as then actually in use, do you know whether you still accepted as conclusive one or the other of those affidavits?—A. I believe those affidavits bring out the same proportion by the rule of three.

Q. But if one affidavit states that two men and six animals were then in use, and the other states that three men and twelve animals were then in use, did you assume that one or the other of those affidavits correctly stated the number of men and animals in use?—A. I do not remember anything about those affidavits; that was a small thing, but I think it has been shown that the proportion comes out just the same, whichever affidavit you take.

Then, on page 3433, near the bottom:

Mr. BLISS. My question is whether you took any means to ascertain whether John W. Dorsey was the subcontractor on that route?

A [After looking at jacket.] I do not remember that I did.

Q. Miner appears as the contractor?—A. Yes.

Q. If Dorsey had been subcontractor would it not have been stated on the jacket, under the practice of the department?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that. I have no objection if he asks, ought it not.

Mr. BLISS. Would it not?

The COURT. You can ask that question.

The WITNESS. It ought to have been stated; yes. It may have been a pure omission though; probably was.

Q. Were you in the habit of examining the affidavits for expedition?—A. Well, when those cases came up in these jackets I usually cursorily looked over the papers, and sometimes attempted to figure on the affidavits. I do not know that I did it uniformly though.

On page 3586:

Mr. BLISS. What were you going to say, Mr. Brady?—A. I was going to say that this seems to have been a jacket made up for the reduction or the discontinuance, I do not know which, of this route, and that it has been indorsed by me: "Do this.—Brady."

Q. But the order was not carried out, apparently; there is no evidence of it?—A. No; and why it was not carried out I cannot remember now.

Q. This letter having been received at the department on March 21, 1879, and you having, on the 8th of July, 1879, instead of discontinuing the route, made an order increasing it to six trips and expediting it to ten hours at an additional expense of $7,760 a year, does not that show why it was not carried out?—A. All the papers that were filed in the case will probably explain why it was not carried out. This is simply the jacket that contains the order, without the memorandum jacket.

Q. But 7 C has indorsed upon it the language of the letter from the postmaster, and across it are indorsed your words: "Do this.—Brady."—A. Yes, sir.

Q. After that have you any question that you saw that letter?—A. It would appear that I had seen that, but I say I have now no recollection of having seen it.

The question was whether he had seen the letter of the postmaster calling his attention to the fact that the route ought to be discontinued, and he admitted, from the papers before him, that he must have seen that letter.

You know, gentlemen, that John W. Dorsey had no more to do with this route than you or I had; that he was not interested in it at all; he was not contractor; he was not subcontractor. He had nothing at all to do with the route, if you take his statement. But he says, "It would not have been right for Rerdell to swear to it;" "he sent it to me and I swore to it;" and he did swear to it, and his affidavit was put in and used, and here both of them are.

The next was a change of schedule.

On the 22d of October, 1879, there was filed a subcontract with Eli Hanson, calling for $3,100 per annum. Rerdell signed as attorney for Miner.

On the 8th of May, 1880, there was a letter from postmaster Walters, at Greenwood, 9 C, page 869. This was after expedition.

GREENWOOD, COLO., May 8, 1880.

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,

Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We have received no daily mail by route 38134 since April 30, 1880, it having been carried to the former location of the office. While this office is located on the route on which the contract was let, they have persistently refused to deliver here. Both myself and postmaster at Rosita, Custer County, Colorado, also P. M. Ingersoll, at Pueblo, consider it a useless and expensive route to the Government, as this office is the principal one on route 38134, can be, and is now supplied by route 38169, which is ample to supply the demands of this office. We suggest that route 38134 be discontinued, and that Silver Park Office [a precinct containing about fifty persons all told] can be supplied by a tri-weekly mail from Rosita at a trifling expense to the Government compared with the present.

Hoping the above will receive your earnest attention, I remain, yours respectfully,

J. W. WALTERS,

Postmaster, Greenwood, Custer County, Colo.

There are two of them—Monroe first; Walters second; different postmasters from the same office, writing to the department that it is a useless expense to the Government; one before expedition, and the other afterward.

On the 31st of January, 1881, the entire route was discontinued—this useful route.

Tuttle, in giving his testimony, said, "I made three trips a week in twelve hours." You remember, gentlemen, that fifteen hours was the full time. Tuttle, the first man who got it, received $700, and said, "I made three trips in twelve hours; my contract only called for one." See? One trip was to be in fifteen hours. He made three trips in twelve hours; and that was done before expedition was ordered.

The COURT. You mean twelve hours for each trip?

Mr. KER. The time was fifteen hours, and he made each trip in twelve hours; yes, sir. He made two more trips than there was any necessity for. And the reason of that was, gentlemen, because he said he had a coach and was carrying passengers; but when he found it was no use, that there were no people coming over that route at all, but they were coming down the other from Cañon City, as I have shown, then he did not want to have any more to do with this route. He told us that on the stand. He did not care about carrying it anyhow, but while he was carrying it he made three trips in twelve hours. Brady brought it down to ten hours, and made it three trips.

Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay, and Bosler drew the pay on this route. And I call your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that in the first quarter of 1881 there was an order signed by Miner for the pay for that quarter. Do you not remember that Miner said, "I had nothing more to do with the routes after they passed into the hands of Stephen W. Dorsey?" Here is his order, dated on the 13th day of October, 1879, and he says: "We parted on the 5th of May," and this is dated on the 13th of October, 1879, and is not disputed. It is signed by John R. Miner for the pay to Stephen W. Dorsey for the quarter ending December 31, 1880.

Again, on the 7th of October, 1879, is another order signed by John R. Miner, and that order is not disputed.

Now, gentlemen, Marks testified that the mail on this route left Pueblo at 7 o'clock in the morning, and arrived at 6 o'clock in the evening. The railroad mail left at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. This mail got back from Rosita at 6 o'clock p. m. What difference would it have made to have it carried in fifteen hours, or twenty hours, for that matter? What was the necessity for making it ten hours when it got in five hours after the mail had left, and about nineteen hours before it could pass out of that office again? Then the postmaster says that "the mail for Rosita was sent by way of Florence and Cañon City." "When this route became daily only two or three letters passed over the route; sometimes one letter and sometimes only the mail bill." Not a thing going over it but the mail bill. Rosita got its mail by Cañon City. The mail from Pueblo did not go over this route. Greenwood was the only office that was supplied on the route, and that got its mail from Florence on the railroad.

A number of papers were shown you by the defense. They wanted to show that Mr. Brady had some good reason for making an order; and, among others, they exhibited to you an advertisement that was cut from the paper. I think, gentlemen, that when I handed you that clipping from the paper they thought it was something that ought to have had weight in Brady's favor. It was a clipping from a paper called the Chieftain, and it was said to have been edited with "vim, vinegar, and vitriol." I showed you the "vitriol" part. But I suppose it was sent along with the petition, because they knew that Brady was a newspaper man, and if anything would capture Brady it would be a newspaper article. That advertisement is printed in the record. It seems to have been a printed advertisement of the time the mail coaches left. But what that had to do with Brady making an order for expedition is a little more than I can imagine.

Now let us see about this oath. There were two oaths. One says that on the present schedule three men and twelve animals are required. That would be fifteen. The other says two men and six animals; that would be eight. There is a big difference between eight and fifteen. On the reduced schedule, the first oath says seven men and thirty-eight animals; that is forty-five. The second one says six men and eighteen animals; that is twenty-four. There is a big difference between twenty-four and forty-five. But Brady says, "There was the same proportion." Well, gentlemen, you can make the additions for yourselves. The figures that they would work upon, to give him the amount of pay in one oath, would be thirty, and in the other it would be sixteen; and for the life of me I cannot make the same proportion to come out of sixteen and thirty. There was not the same proportion, and if you will take the affidavits and put the figures together yourselves you will see that there could not have been.

Mr. Merrick suggests to me that it did not make any difference; that it is a question of veracity. Let us see how many men were actually used. Tuttle says that when he carried it he used four men and eight animals, and he carried passengers with the mail. He made three trips and used four men and eight animals; that is twelve. And John W. Dorsey says in one oath it required forty-five, and in another he said twenty-four. Tuttle says he used twelve. Tuttle was asked: "If you did not carry passengers how many would you have used?" "Oh," he says, "Two men and three animals;" that would be five. Heavens! John W. Dorsey says forty-five in one oath, and in the other he says twenty-four. Hull, another carrier, said he made seven trips. You remember the oath was put in for three trips, but he says: "I made seven trips, and I used twelve men and fifteen animals, making a total of seventeen. Dorsey's lowest was twenty-four; his highest forty-five.

The COURT. Twelve men and fifteen animals make how many?

Mr. KER. Twelve men and five animals, adding them together, makes seventeen.

The COURT. You said twelve men and fifteen animals.

Mr. KER. Dorsey's lowest was twenty-four and the other was forty-five. Now, it is upon the strength of that affidavit, and with utter disregard of the wants of the people and the advice that he received from the postmasters on the route, that the pay that originally had been $388 was jumped up by Brady until it reached $8,148.

You know the defendants here say: "Why, this country was growing rapidly; towns sprang up by magic; the population was pouring in." Where did that population come from? Where did this vast increase come from? Do you find, in your community, people with their goods packed ready to start, the moment they hear a whisper that there is a gold mine here or a silver mine there? I do not think that is your experience. A great many people come from other countries, and a great many people leave the East and go West. But the people here are not, as it were, dancing upon a wire, ready, the moment the wire is pulled, to shoot off West. Let me give you the explanation. Mathematics is, I believe, the only exact science in the world, and the figures will hardly tell a lie.

You know, that as the railroad went along from place to place, it was mapped out in advance by the engineers, and immediately towns would spring up. The railroad laborers would camp, and people would flock in from the surrounding places and settle there. In this way a place like Pueblo, when it started, drew its population from all the little villages that were anywhere in its neighborhood. Two or three families in each little village like Greenhorn packed up their goods and went up to Pueblo, where they thought they would be better off. And immediately the population from the surrounding country would come into Pueblo, and in that way Pueblo grew up, as it were, by magic. But it grew up at the expense of the surrounding country. If those people were, as is represented, Eastern people, used to mail facilities, anxious and eager to write, would they not buy their stamps at the office, and would not the office show that there was an increase in the revenues and mail? Would it not show that there was such an increase as warranted the idea that these were people who demanded increased mail facilities? Gentlemen, I tell you the figures will not lie. The figures show that in 1879, when Brady made the great majority of these orders for expedition, in the railroad towns that were then being started along the line of railroads, in Greenhorn and Greenwood and all those places of that kind not on the railroads, the population decreased and the revenues of the post-offices decreased, while the revenues of the post-offices at the other places on the railroads increased, but not in a double proportion, simply bearing a little more than the proportion of decrease in places like Greenhorn and Greenwood.

In 1880, one year afterwards, as I will show you, the revenues of the offices at those places not on the railroads fell off; in other words, the men who had gone up to Pueblo went back to the places where they started from, and the revenue of the offices back in the region where they came from began to increase. In 1880 the revenues of the old places were less than they were in 1879. The population out there, gentlemen, is a floating one. It is not one that is wedded to a place by old ties and old associations. The returns to the Post-Office Department show that the revenues of all such offices were less in 1880 than they were in the year 1879, and they were less again in 1881. The railroads were carrying the population out of Colorado clean on to Montana and Dakota. And I think that if you were to take the census of Dakota, Montana, and Colorado now, you would find that the population is drifting to the New El Dorado, which is Washington Territory. Washington Territory is growing, and growing at the expense of the rest of the West. Of course these places fall off from time to time; there is no question about that. But I say I will show you as I go along, as I have shown you in this case, that the revenues do not warrant the assertion of these gentlemen that "the people were flocking in from the East and that they were demanding an increase of mail facilities."

They paid Eli Hanson after the seven trips were put on $3,100. Gentlemen, they had a clean and clear profit of $5,048 out of this route; $5,048 over and above everything. And right on the jacket before Thomas J. Brady was the very evidence of that fact. The revenue of the only office upon that route, Greenwood, was $52.29, and yet Brady raised the pay of the route from $388 to $8,148. As I said to you in my opening, without Walsh's testimony and without any of the evidence that has come before you, there is no man who lives and breathes and has the sense with which Providence endowed him who would say that Brady made this order honestly.

The COURT I do not want to disturb the order of your argument, but I would like to know what petitions or Congressional recommendations there were in this case.

Mr. KER. There is a newspaper clipping and there are petitions filed for daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita, but not specifying the route. There are four of those signed by people living in Pueblo and by people living in Rosita. There is a letter written by Rerdell, signed by Governor Pitkin, and a letter written by Rerdell signed by Chief-Justice Thatcher and Associate-Justice Stone. Those are the papers upon which this increase and expedition were granted.

Now, gentlemen, let me call your attention to the overt acts in this case. There is no mistake about the 8th of July, 1879. I simply want you to see that is the true date as mentioned in the indictment. On the 8th of July, 1879, Brady made this order. [Exhibiting order.] No matter what you call it, improvident, fraudulent, or anything else, he made that order. In the jacket upon which he made that order are the two inconsistent oaths. They have been shown to be fraudulent. One of the oaths is marked filed May 6, 1879; the other is marked May 8, 1879, and is the oath that was used by Brady when he made his calculation for this order on the 8th of July, 1879.

ROUTE 38145, GARLAND TO PARROTT CITY, COLORADO.

This is what is called the Ojo Caliente route. The route was originally from Garland to Parrott City. Garland was cut off, and it was started at Ojo Caliente and ran to Parrott City. By cutting off Garland the route was reduced from two hundred and eighty-eight miles to one hundred and seventy-two miles. It was one trip a week, and the time was seven days. When they cut off this branch of the route the time was still seven days. It made no difference at all. They were allowed seven days to do what they ought to have done the whole route in. John W. Dorsey was the contractor. The pay was $2,745 for the entire route. The proposal was written by Miner and the amount was filled in by Rerdell. I will give you the official orders:

June 10, 1878, letter from S. W. Dorsey to Brady.

June 26, 1878, service curtailed to Ojo Caliente.

July 16, 1878, Postmaster Trew wrote Brady.

January 23, 1879, service curtailed to end at Animas City.

January 30, 1879, subcontract with Anthony Joseph.

March 11, 1879, J. W. Dorsey made an oath.

April 14, 1879, letter from Anthony Joseph to Brady.

April 16, 1879, letter from J. W. Dorsey.

April 17, 1879, letter from General Hatch.

April 24, 1879, letter from S. W. Dorsey to Brady.

April 24, 1879, letter of J. W. Dorsey.

April 24, 1879, order from Brady to embrace Pagosa Springs.

April 26, 1879, letter of General Hatch filed.

April 29, 1879, order for increase and expedition.

May 31, 1879, letter from the postmasters to Brady.

August 7, 1879, subcontract of Pedro J. Jaramillo.

September 29, 1879, notice sent of the subcontract.

April 4, 1880, Postmaster Trew wrote Brady.

January 8, 1880, agreement with Jaramillo.

June 12, 1880, subcontract with Sanderson.

August 16, 1880, letter of J. W. Dorsey to Brady.

August 19, 1880, Brady made an order for remission.

February 26, 1881, order for increase.

Now, let me go back and explain to you. I find by the papers that on the 31st of March, 1878, there was a subcontract made with a man named J. H. Watts that was not on file, though it is mentioned in the papers. This is a route that Dorsey took. On the 10th of June, 1878, S. W. Dorsey wrote to Brady asking to have the service increased to seven trips and the schedule reduced. Rerdell wrote the body of the letter. After the letter was written Stephen W. Dorsey wrote in the words, "Denver and," "river," and "this." Mr. Ingersoll, after looking at it, said, "There is no doubt about that." They admit it. This letter was written by Dorsey to Brady, asking him to make it seven trips, while Dorsey was still in the Senate. On the 26th of June, 1878, Brady made an order (2 F, page 1075) to curtail the service to end at Animas City, decreasing the distance one hundred and sixteen miles, and decreasing the contractor's pay.

On the 16th of July, 1878, John M. Trew, the postmaster at Animas City, wrote to Brady, "We have no use whatever for that route. No mail passes Parkview." You see, gentlemen, down here [exhibiting map to jury], "No mail passes Park View." That was the jumping-off place.

There was no mail beyond there. "Between that and Parrott City it is a useless expense." That is 69 F, page 1201.

On the 23d of January, 1879, there was an order made curtailing the service to end at Animas City, decreasing the distance eighteen miles. That is 3 F, on page 1075. I will show you when I come to the other route why they made it end at Animas City. There was a trail over here [indicating on map] which made the route thirty miles shorter, but Joseph told you, on the stand, that he was ordered to go around the other way, and he went around the other way, and Animas City then, of course, was on the route he passed over.

On the 30th of January, 1879, Joseph testified that Rerdell paid him a visit, and on that date he made a subcontract with Joseph. The testimony was that Miner sent Rerdell down there to make this subcontract. This was on the 30th of January, 1879. They had their lawsuit in February or March, 1879. This was while Rerdell was in the employ of Vaile and Miner.

On the 11th of March, 1879, John W. Dorsey made the oath 20 F. It was made up in Addison County, Vermont. I will give you another one after a while on the same route. You will notice it is filled in. Rerdell filled in the blanks. He filled it in afterwards. He says Stephen W. Dorsey gave him directions to fill it in. Now, I will read to you what Stephen W. Dorsey says about it on his examination-in-chief, page 3771:

Q. Mr. Rerdell has testified that you instructed him to have a lot of affidavits made in blank and sent to John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey to be sworn to. You may state what instructions you gave him, if any, upon that subject.—A. I never gave him any.

Q. He has also sworn that in some instances you filled up the affidavits purporting to have been made by John M. Peck or John W. Dorsey, in which the number of men and animals necessary on the then schedule was stated and the number of men and animals necessary on the proposed schedule. You may state whether you ever filled up any affidavits, and, if so, what.—A. I do not remember of ever doing any such thing.

Q. I now read the paper marked 22 F, being a sworn statement in regard to the number of men and animals required to perform service on the present and proposed schedule on route 38145:

"Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

"Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

"SIR: The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route 38145, on the present schedule, and three trips a week, is five men and fifteen animals. The number necessary on a schedule of fifty hours three times a week is twelve men and forty-two animals.

"Respectfully,

"JOHN W. DORSEY."

"CITY OF WASHINGTON,

"County of Washington:

"John W. Dorsey being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above statement is true, as he verily believes.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 26th day of April, 1879.

"W. F. KELLOGG,

"Notary Public."

You may state whether you filled up that affidavit, putting in the number of the route, the words "three trips," the word "five," the word "fifteen," the word "fifty," and the words "three, twelve, and forty-two."—A. I have no recollection about it at all.

Q. Can you now see what the writing is?—A. No, sir; I cannot, I am sorry to say.

Q. You have no recollection one way or the other?—A. None at all.

Q. You may state whether you have any recollection of filling up any affidavits.—A. I have no idea that I ever did. I have no recollection that I ever did.

I will pass the oath, gentlemen, until I come down to the place where it was filed along with the other, and then I will bring your attention to both of them.

The next was on the 9th of April, 1879, when Stephen W. Dorsey wrote a letter to Brady. It is 39 F, on page 1102. I want you to listen to this letter:

KANSAS CITY, MO., April 9, 1879.

Hon. A. JOSEPH, Taos, N. Mex.:

DEAR SIR: The department talks some about discontinuing the mail route from Pagosa Springs to Parrott City, and I write this to ask you to send every protest within your power by petition and letter against any such proposition. Do this forthwith.

That is all that is worth reading in the letter at the present time. On the 14th of April, 1879, Anthony Joseph sent a letter to Brady, which is 8 F, on page 1078:

TAOS, N. MEX., April 2, 1879.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington:

SIR: The postmaster at Ojo Caliente has placed before me your communication of the 21st of March, 1879, changing the schedule of departures and arrivals of the mail on route No. 38145 (Ojo Caliente to Animas City). As the subcontractor on said route permit me to inform you that it is impossible to carry the mail on said route once a week inside of one hundred hours. The distance is from Ojo Caliente to Animas City, one hundred and eighty-one miles; the road is mountainous and very rough; the mails are very bulky and heavy, and the rivers are very bad to ford four months in a year. The best that I can do under the circumstances is to carry the mail through on a schedule of six days.

Then he gives a schedule and continues:

This arrangement will satisfy all parties, make the proper connections, and allow me just time enough to make the service regular and efficient. Trusting that you will take the above facts in consideration, and do me justice in the premises, I remain your obedient servant,

ANTHONY JOSEPH,
Subcontractor.

On the 16th of April, 1879, John W. Dorsey filed his oath of March 11, the one I have shown you. The letter is 21 F, on page 1086. Let me read it to you:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 14, 1879.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I beg to transmit herewith my proposition to carry the mail on route 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, Colo., on an expedited schedule.

I have to state that there is an error in the distance of more than forty miles. The actual distance is about one hundred and ninety miles, which will be shown in due time by distance tables. The road is a difficult one, with many large mountains and streams to cross.

Hoping that the proposition will be acceptable,

I am, very respectfully,

J. W. DORSEY.

Rerdell wrote that letter and signed Dorsey's name to it. Now, in the letter I have read to you from Stephen W. Dorsey to Brady, he said that he had sent a letter to General Hatch and to other people. On the 17th of April, 1879, General Hatch, in answer to the letter that Dorsey sent to him, wrote to Dorsey. In that letter he said: "I would be very thankful for a daily mail from Pagosa Springs." Dorsey had written to Hatch, telling him he was going to apply for it, and Hatch wrote to Dorsey, saying that he would be very thankful for it.

On the 24th of April, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote a letter to Brady, and in that letter he inclosed a number of petitions. He said in the letter, 23 F, page 1087:

I am personally familiar with the facts stated, and know the necessity for the increase. I simply write this to add my testimony to theirs.

This was one of his own routes. Some of the petitions that he put inside of that letter were ones that he had written himself, and sent to Joseph on the 9th of April. One of those petitions was written by Rerdell, and two of them were written by Stephen W. Dorsey himself. Here they are [exhibiting petitions]. He wrote them and sent them out to Joseph, and they came back, and he sent them to be put on file in the Post-Office Department.

On the same day, April 24, 1879, there is a letter sent in from J. W. Dorsey with the oath. It is 19 F, page 1085. Here it is, gentlemen [exhibiting it]. That letter was written and signed by Stephen W. Dorsey. You will have an elegant chance now to see what a good penman Stephen W. Dorsey was, and how many different hands he could write. Inside of that letter was this oath [exhibiting it]. The body of the oath was written by W. F. Kellogg. Stephen W. Dorsey wrote the interlineations in the oath. I have just read you his testimony. He says he did "not remember it;" he has "no recollection of it." It is testified that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote those interlineations in that oath. The oath is dated the 26th of April, 1879, and is attested by Mr. Kellogg, who was in Stephen W. Dorsey's own office. Rerdell could not have done that, for Rerdell was out West. We had the books here to show where he was. I want to read you what Stephen W. Dorsey says about it.

The COURT. We will take a recess now.

At this point (1.05 p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I showed you the two affidavits. The last one that was put in is dated April 26, 1879. On the 26th of April Rerdell was out West, according to the testimony of the books. I now read from Stephen W. Dorsey's testimony, on page 3937:

Q. Did you not have that paper among your papers originally as a blank affidavit?—A. I could not say.

Q. Did you not, with your own hand, fill up this affidavit by writing the word "three" before trips, the word "fifty" before hours, the word "three" before times, the word "twelve" before men, and the words "forty-two" before animals?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Have you no recollection of it?—A. I have no recollection of it at all.

Q. Had you written it in, there would you have recollected it?—A. I probably would.

Q. You probably would have recollected it; do you say you did not?—A. I do not think I did.

Then, on page 3939:

Q. Are you willing to say that you did not write those words in that affidavit?—A. I am willing to say that I do not believe I did.

Q. Are you willing to say you did not?—A. I will not say that I did not, but I don't believe I did. That is as far as I want to go.

Q. That is as far as you can go?—A. Yes.

Q. Where was John W. Dorsey on the 26th of April, 1879?—A. I do not know.

Q. Was he in Washington City?—A. I don't know whether he was or not.

Q. Do you not know that he was not in Washington City?—A. I say I don't know whether he was or not.

Q. Try and recollect.—A. I can't recollect a thing I don't know.

Q. You may recall by an effort. Have you not located him in your testimony as elsewhere than in Washington City on that day?

The WITNESS. In my testimony?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I don't know that the question has been asked me.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. What date is it?—A. 26th of April, 1879. He went to California, but whether he went before that or not I do not know.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Did he not go to California to look after the Redding and Alturas route prior to that time?—A. Yes, I believe he did.

Now, John W. Dorsey testifies, on page 4140:

Q. [Interposing.] It is not what he told you, but what you state. I told you I would call your attention to two other affidavits, into which we happened to run. Will you tell me whether you signed those two papers, marked, respectively, 20 F and 22 F? I tell you beforehand that those are the two affidavits that I say are not consistent and you say are. I give you the benefit of knowing what are the facts. Look at them carefully and tell me if you signed them.—A. Yes, sir; I signed them both.

Q. Have you looked at them?—A. I have looked at the signatures; that is all.

Q. If you want to read them, read them.—A. One is made for an eighty-hour schedule, and the other for a fifty-hour schedule.

Q. And they are consistent, are they?—A. Yes, sir; I consider them so.

Q. These affidavits are made, one on the 11th of March, 1879, and the other on the 26th of April, 1879. The March affidavit is sworn to before Wainwright. That is in Vermont?—A. Yes.

Q. Then in April the other is sworn to before Kellogg. Now, in March you swore as follows:

"The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mails on route 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, three times a week, is three men and seven animals."

And in April you say:

"The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route 38145, on the present schedule, and three times a week, is five men and fifteen animals."

Which is true and which is false?—A. I could not tell you in regard to that.

Q. Look at them and tell the jury if they are consistent. You say in March "three men and seven animals," and you say in April "five men and fifteen animals." Both cannot be true. Tell us which is true.

Then there was some objection by counsel. Then, at the bottom of the page:

The WITNESS. One is made for a long schedule and the other for a short schedule.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the number necessary on the present schedule, which was not to be changed. You speak of that as an existing fact. Now, look at it and read that, and tell the jury what you have to say about it.—A. All I have to say about it is that I relied upon somebody else. I believed at the time it was correct. As I said before—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No, no, but—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Let him answer.

The COURT. Let him explain.

The WITNESS. As I said before, I had no interest in it—not a contingent interest.

Q. No pecuniary interest?—A. No, sir; I did not consider that I had.

Then, further, down on the same page:

Q. Who had charge of this mail route in March?—A. Vaile and Miner, as I understand it.

Q. Did Rerdell have anything to do with it?—A. I don't know whether he had or not.

Q. Who wrote this affidavit that you made before Kellogg?—A. All I can tell is my own handwriting.

Q. Did not Kellogg write it?—A. I can't say whether he did or not.

Q. Are there two handwritings in the body of it?—A. I can't say whether there are two handwritings. It looks rather like two different colored inks; one part seems to be a little blacker than the other; that is about all I can say.

On the 24th of April, the same day, Brady was getting ready to make the increase and expedition. He made an order, 63 F, on page 1192:

From July 1, 1878, allow $190.62, for Pagosa Springs embraced, the distance being twenty miles.

Now, gentlemen, in the first place, Pagosa Springs was already on the route. In the next place he made this order from the 1st of July, 1878, the beginning of the contract term, although the order was made on the 24th of April, 1879. Before I began upon these routes I read to you the law, which is that every order shall have its true date upon it, and that no order shall be made for the payment of money to take effect before the time of making the order. Here is a plain, palpable violation of that act of Congress that I read to you. On the 26th of April the letter of General Hatch was filed. Dorsey had written to Hatch, stating that he was going to make application for a daily mail to Pagosa Springs, and Hatch wrote back thanking Dorsey for his interest in it, and his letter was put in as a letter asking for the increase. Then, on the 29th of April, 1879, Brady made an order, 18 F, on page 1084:

First, increase service two trips per week from May 12, 1879, and allow contractor $3,316.80 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second, reduce running time from ninety (90) to fifty (50) hours from May 12, 1879, and allow contractor $8,457.84 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Mr. Brady gave his testimony in regard to this order, at page 3418, at the bottom of the page:

Question. Do you remember the route which was originally known as the route from Garland to Parrott City, and afterwards came to be known as the route from Ojo Caliente to Animas City?—Answer. I have a recollection of there being such a route.

Q. Do you remember whether you made any order for increase or expedition upon that route?—A. I think I did.

Q. Do you remember who interested himself in procuring that order?—A. I do not. If you will show me the papers I will tell you.

Q. You do not remember independently of the papers?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Upon that route the pay for a single trip from Ojo Caliente to Animas City was $1,467.78. At six trips a week, pro rata, the pay would have been $8,808.68. You made the expedition, reducing it from ninety hours to fifty hours, at an expense of $13,433.04. Assuming that you did that, can you tell us why you did not prefer to make it a six-trip route at the original rate of speed, thereby saving to the Government $4,626 a year?—A. As I said, I do not remember anything specially about that route. I repeat what I said in a general way before, that it was much better to have a fast three-times-a-week service than a slow six-times-a-week service.

Q. That was your general idea, was it?—A. That was my idea, especially as they wanted it that way.

Q. It has appeared in evidence here that the postmasters along the route, in reply to your circulars requesting them to fix a schedule within fifty hours, repeatedly replied that it was impossible.

The WITNESS. Impossible to do what?

Mr. BLISS. That was their statement. Why did you insist upon having the fifty hours?—A. Simply because nothing was impossible in that direction. They could have carried the mail in fifty hours if they had men and horses enough to do it. That was their business, not mine.

Q. Not the postmasters' business?—A. Not the postmasters' business.

Q. The postmasters so urged, and you considered that your judgment was better than theirs, did you?

The WITNESS. You say they said it was impossible.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

A. That was ridiculous on the face of it. It was not impossible.

There is Brady's answer to the statements that came in from the postmasters; first, that there was no mail coming from Park View up to Pagosa Springs, and no use for the route; and next, that it was impossible to make the schedule time. I read you Anthony Joseph's letters, in which he said it was impossible to do it inside of six days. Brady says it was not impossible; that fifty hours was what the people wanted.

On the 30th of April, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to Joseph. The letter is 43 F, on page 1104:

WASHINGTON, D. C. June 22, 1879.

ANTHONY JOSEPH, Esq., Taos, N. Mex.:

DEAR SIR: Your two letters to Mr. Rerdell have just come to my attention, and I make haste to answer them.

In regard to the schedule time of fifty hours from Ojo Caliente to Animas City being too fast, I have to say that you are evidently laboring under a singular misapprehension. Fifty hours' time is about three and a half miles an hour, which is slow walking time for a horse or man; a good horse will walk four miles an hour for eight hours every day in the year.

The time is slow compared with the time on almost every route in Colorado. The time on the route from Parrott City to Silverton, over a worse country than your route, is six (6) miles an hour. The average speed on nearly all mountain routes in Colorado is over four (4) miles an hour, and many of them as high as seven (7) miles, and that, too, over mountain roads.

Your statement that it would cost $12,000 to run this service in fifty hours is equally absurd. That would be at the rate of $26 per mile per annum, while the average cost of horse-back service is less than $5 per mile per annum. I am afraid the trouble is that you are not giving this matter your personal attention, which you will have to do before you will get it in shape.

Now, there is no use of writing to the department about these matters; we are responsible to the Government and you are responsible to us, and this service must be carried according to the instructions of the department. Furthermore you are doing yourself and us a great wrong in getting postmasters to write the department asking to have the old time restored. This, I hope, will never be done again. If you want anything, we are the proper persons to write to. You have nothing to do with the department, except through us.

Finally, you can easily make the time required by the department, to wit, fifty hours, and you must do it without further delay.

The mail must also be carried three times a week, or you will be fined until there will be nothing left to pay you or us.

Do no more writing, but go forward energetically and carry this mail according to your contract, and I will see whether we can pay you something over and above the amount you are now getting, which is $5,160 per annum, according to our calculation.

I do not promise to pay you any more than the contract calls for, but if you go forward as you should, I have no doubt I will do something additional. I hope to hear that this service is running on time, and three trips a week.

Yours, truly,

S. W. DORSEY.

Gentlemen, he says that fifty hours is not too fast, and explains how routes are run in Colorado. He says that $12,000 is equally absurd. Mr. Merrick calls my attention to the fact that it is stated here "This signature is also admitted."

Mr. MERRICK. Dorsey's signature is admitted.

Mr. KER. [Reading:]

Your statement that it would cost $12,000 to run this service in 50 hours is equally absurd.

$3,316.80 for two trips and $8,457.84 for expedition—a little over $13,000 given to him by Brady, for he had what preceded it for the other trip, $1,467. Gentlemen, Dorsey said that $12,000 was absurd, when he was getting over $13,000. $12,000 was Joseph's estimate of what it ought to be. Then he says also:

That would be at the rate of $26 per mile, while the average cost is $5 per mile.

Do you remember what Brady testified to? He had it in his mind that it was somewhere from $25 to $35 per mile that the proper price would be. "This is $26 a mile," and Stephen W. Dorsey says that $5 a mile is the price of carrying the mail.

The next is on the 31st of May, 1879, 9 F, on page 1078:

We, the undersigned, postmasters at the terminal points of said route, and subcontractor upon the same, do hereby recommend that, although the service requires to be increased from two times a week to three times per week, yet we deem it immaterial to the interests of the people on said route as to the schedule time; and furthermore, deem it impracticable and almost impossible to run the mail each way in the fifty hours herein stated, for the following reasons:

The said post route being a new one, the roads are mountainous and very rough;

the Chama, Navajo, and Blanco, all quite large rivers, are not bridged over, and will necessarily have to be forded over, and they are very high and dangerous to cross or ford in the summer season, and in the winter the deep snows that fall all along the said route are a great obstacle in the way. Consequently we recommend that for the present the tri-weekly mail service on this route may be allowed to run upon a six-days schedule, remaining the same through the summer and winter.

JESUS HERNANDEZ,
Postmaster at Ojo Caliente.
JOHN M. TREW,
Postmaster at Animas City.
ANTHONY JOSEPH,
Contractor.

This letter was sent forward and received in the department. They were willing to run the three trips, but the time was impossible. I want you to bear this in mind, because I will show you that Brady did not consider it impossible. He went on multiplying the service. He did not stop. He still went on. On the 30th of April, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to Joseph informing him of the increase. The letter is 42 F, on page 1103:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April, 30, 1879.

ANTHONY JOSEPH, Taos, N. Mex. :

DEAR SIR: The service from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City has been made three times a week with a schedule of fifty hours, to begin May 12, 1879. Do not fail to start the service promptly upon time, and be sure that the postmasters at the two terminal offices report your arrivals and departures promptly to the department the 30th of June. If the mail is carried well now I think it will be made daily July 1, 1879. I am personally responsible to you for all dues under your contract. Address all letters either to me or to M. C. Rerdell, box 706, here.

Truly, yours,

S. W. DORSEY.

There is no dispute about that handwriting either, gentlemen. He says, "I think it will be made daily July 1, 1879." We will see how his thoughts came out right. Remember, it had been increased to three trips. On the 7th of August, 1879, there was a subcontract made with Pedro J. Jaramillo. You know Joseph had to throw up his contract. He got no money. He had lost everything he had. He told you that the carriers instead of crossing at the regular place, when the rivers were swollen, had to go away up through the mountains and find a place to cross the river and then come down. He lost all he had and gave it up—dropped it. Then they made a contract with Pedro J. Jaramillo. Rerdell signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey, and John W. Dorsey indorsed the contract.

On the 22d of August, 1879, Rerdell wrote to Joseph informing him that Jaramillo had entered into a contract with them at an advance of $1,200, and demanding that Joseph pay the difference between his, Joseph's, compensation and the new contract with Jaramillo; that is, that Joseph should pay the $1,200.

In August, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey paid Joseph $109.39. I want to read to you what Joseph said about it on page 1113:

Q. State what he said, as near as you can recollect, in substance?—A. That is what he said, "We have not received a dollar for the service you have rendered, as the fines and deductions have consumed the earnings of the service."

Q. Did he pay you anything?—A. At that time he did.

Q. How much?—A. One hundred and nine dollars and thirty-nine cents, I think.

Q. Had you received any other sum from him or from any one else?

Then there was some interposition by counsel. Then, further down:

Q. [Resuming.] What passed between you and Dorsey at that interview as to payments made to you or fines other than what you have already stated?—A. I do not know that I understand the question.

Q. What did you say to Dorsey, and what did Dorsey say to you about any money that had been paid to you, or had not been paid to you for this service?—A. He said that the fines and deductions for the non-compliance with the schedule time of fifty hours on the trip had consumed the pay and consequently there was nothing due me.

Q. Nothing due you?—A. I except the $109 that he then paid me.

Q. What was that due you for; was it stated for the whole time from January up, or what?—A. For the first quarter of 1879 I received the sum of $383.89.

Again, on page 1115:

Q. What did you tell him?—A. I told him that I had received a statement and also a check for the balance due me for the second term.

Q. When did the second term begin, and when did it end?—A. The second term, I think, commenced on the 1st of April.

Q. Well, go on. What was said?—A. And that I thought it very strange that there was not any more than $109 due me for the services performed for that term, and it was then that he told me that the fines and deductions as reported had consumed the earnings. I told him furthermore that this check had not been signed by any one, and was in blank, and it was not negotiable in the condition it was then; and he then signed it himself, and furthermore told me to go back and go over the route and go to each postmaster and get a certificate of service rendered from each one and to forward all the certificates to him at Washington, and that he would then go before the Post-Office Department and endeavor to get the remissions of fines imposed upon me. Of course, after I related to him the difficulties that existed for the non-performance of the service, he said that he would do me the favor to represent the matter in that light to the department, and if he got these remissions that they should go to me.

Q. Did you do as he told you, get those papers from the men along the route?—A. I did.

Q. And send them off?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever get your remissions?—A. I did not.

Wait until I show you who did. The next is a notice from Brady to the Auditor of Jaramillo's contract. On the 13th of December, 1879, after the settlement that was made with Dorsey out in New Mexico, Rerdell again wrote to Joseph and told him if he did not pay up they would sue him. Of course Joseph paid no attention to that. On the 4th of April, 1880, Postmaster Trew wrote to Brady. The letter is 68 F, on page 1199:

ANIMAS CITY, LA PLATA COUNTY, COLORADO, April 4, 1880.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have to inform you that the mail carriers on route 38174, Animas City to Farmington, and route 38145, Ojo Caliente, N. Mex., to Animas City, Colo., have been compelled after a long and hard struggle against the elements to withdraw.

The past winter has been one of unusual length and severity, deep and drifting snow. Forage all consumed by the Army, and impossible to get from the railroad, distant two hundred miles, with from two to four feet of drifting snow blocking up the road.

The carriers have struggled with great energy, and endured great hardships, and lost many animals. It has been simply a physical impossibility to take the mail through on schedule time.

* * * * *

The subcontractor and carriers could do no other way, and have done the only sensible thing for them to do. They have endured great hardships, lost their animals, and are in debt to all their friends for supplies, and not a dollar from the Post-Office Department in payment for services rendered.

Respectfully,

JNO. M. TREW,
Postmaster.

On June 8, 1880, Jaramillo threw up the contract which he had made in August, 1879. Gentlemen, he did not get a dollar. As Trew wrote, he lost all he had. He was in debt to everybody, and he actually paid $500 to Stephen W. Dorsey to be released from his contract. They could not collect the money without showing that the subcontractor, whose subcontract was on file, had withdrawn it or been paid, and they put in the office this agreement made between them and Pedro J. Jaramillo, Jaramillo having by that agreement paid them $500, and in consideration of it they released him from his contract and he released them from all further payments. He lost all he had, he was in debt, and then paid $500 to get out of his contract. You remember that Joseph and Jaramillo were both on the stand. Both of them, it appears, were taken in hand by Stephen W. Dorsey, or some of his friends, while they were here; and before they testified, I suppose in order to make their testimony come as light as possible, and he gave them each $500.

On June 12, 1880, a subcontract made with J. L. Sanderson was signed by Rerdell as attorney for J. W. Dorsey.

On the 16th of August, 1880, John W. Dorsey wrote a letter to the department asking for a remission of the fines and deductions from the pay for the quarter ending March 31, 1880. On the 19th of August, 1880, page 1198, 64 F, Brady ordered:

Remit $1,655.98 for deduction reported week ending May 8, 1880.

Jaramillo says, "I never received it. I never got it." Joseph says, "I never received it." On page 1172 is Jaramillo's testimony:

Q. Were any fines and deductions imposed upon you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you receive any remission of those fines?—A. I have not received any remission.

While he was on the stand he said, "I have not received any remissions. Here is one of $1,655.98. Now, there were a number of petitions put in asking for a further increase upon this route. You know, gentlemen, up where Pagosa Springs was there was a railroad, and the people wanted to connect with the railroad. They did not want to communicate with Parrott City, but they wanted to reach the railroad, and as it was a short distance from the railroad down to Pagosa Springs, they asked to have the mail supplied in that way. Now, look at these papers, gentlemen [exhibiting petitions]. There they are, printed petitions. We have no testimony as to who did the printing. Here are the petitions which came into the office asking for a supply from Pagosa Springs up along this line that you see here [indicating on map] to the railroad. Let us see how Brady worked it.

On the 13th of January, 1881, Brady sent a telegram to put on service from Chama to Animas City. Now, gentlemen, you will have to fall back on the map. You see Chama is on the railroad just above Park View. Chama was not on this route. Brady telegraphed to put Chama on this route and to increase the service to seven trips. I want to show you how nicely it was engineered. You know that the postmaster said, "This route from here [indicating on map at Park View] to here [indicating at Animas City] is no good." Brady ordered it to be put on there [indicating], and the carrier had to go up to Chama and run thence to Animas City.

Then, on the 26th of February, 1881, Brady made another order, 11 F, page 1080:

From January 15, 1881, increase service to seven trips per week, and allow contractor $17,910.72 and subcontractor $10,666.64.

Here is an order made in February to take effect the 15th of January. That was retroactive. It increased the whole route to seven trips; not from Chama. Brady testified, "I telegraphed out there." The telegram will be found on page 4346. It is only from Chama. But he used that for his explanation, so as to make it appear, "I sent a telegram out there and made the order to increase it over the whole route." You remember the law I quoted. He could not allow pay for "service performed prior to the making of the order." He should have made the order and let the pay follow after the order. In addition to that, I have also shown you the act of Congress of the 7th of April, 1880, by which he got his certificate of character and vindication. They said in that act of Congress, "The Postmaster-General hereafter shall not have the power to order expedition upon a route to any sum exceeding 50 per cent. of the contract as originally let. The original contract price was $1,658. Under that law of Congress Brady could only allow $829 for expedition. I have here made a calculation that he does not make in his order, for the order embraces both allowances. He not only increases the trips but the time. For the expedition alone he allowed $11,278.82. That one order for expedition covered $11,278.82. Now, in the order, he allowed them $17,910.72, and he allowed the subcontractor $10,666.64. Gentlemen, with that order before him when he signed it he knew that he was allowing the contractor $7,244.08 over and above the price that it was being carried for by Sanderson, who was as good a carrier as Dorsey, and who was then carrying other mail on other routes and was a man well known. Yet Brady allowed that amount—$7,244.08—over and above the subcontractor's price. He made no effort to get a good bargain for the Government, but deliberately made this allowance upon these printed petitions; when he had received notice that it was impossible to make the time, he doubled the whole service up and made this outrageous order.

On this route Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay, and Bosler drew the pay. These petitions I told you only asked for increase over a part of the route. Brady made it over the whole. Postmaster Trew testified "They insisted upon a fifty-hour schedule. We protested against it always, but they kept sending in circulars, and I was tired of getting them and making protests, and I put them in the waste-basket." The postmaster at Animas City was tired of answering the questions about the fifty-hour schedule, and protested, and he said "I put them in the waste-basket." He testified to that right here on the stand. Joseph said "The mail was two hundred pounds; 25 per cent. of that was letters and papers, and the balance was fourth-class matter." I explained to you how, under the law, the Postmaster-General was directed to make different contracts to carry that kind of mail in a different way.

There were two affidavits, one specifying three men and seven animals, making ten, and the other specifying five men and fifteen animals, making twenty, which is just double. Joseph said "On the then schedule I used three men and six animals." That made nine. He said he could not use any more, it was of no use. On the proposed schedule of three trips, Dorsey said in his affidavit that it would take nine men and twenty-seven animals, that is thirty-six. He said in the second affidavit, the one that Brady acted upon, that it would take twelve men and forty-two animals, that is a total of fifty-four. Their active figures in the first affidavit would be twenty-six, and in the second fifty-four. Joseph's testimony was, "I carried it with six men and twenty-seven animals." That is thirty-three, or one less than Dorsey put it at. Jaramillo said, "I carried it with six men and twenty-six animals." That is thirty-two, or two less than Dorsey put it at in the second affidavit. But then they got the difference in the figure thirty-six, applying it to one hundred.

Animas City, as I told you, was taken off this route, and $171.56 was deducted for taking it off, and then a month's extra pay allowed. Then Animas City was embraced on another route, 38156, and John W. Dorsey was the contractor on that route. Brady allowed him for putting Animas City on that route $215.65. He took it off of one route, deducting $171.56, and put it on another route and allowed $215.65. On both routes the carriers passed through Animas City, and could not help it. Now, gentlemen, you will remember that Brady made his calculation as to Pagosa Springs before he ordered the expedition, so as to make the expedition mount up much higher. You know he put the mail bills in. I want to show you what the postmaster's return was. There are a whole lot of them, and I will give you a sample. I read from page 3003:

Mail, consisting of one leather sack, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Mail, consisting of one leather sack, was received this day.

Mail, consisting of two leather pouches, was dispatched this day.

Mail, consisting of one leather pouch, was received this day.

Mail, consisting of two leather pouches, was dispatched this day from Animas City.

Mail, consisting of one leather pouch, was received this day from Ojo Caliente.

Mail, consisting of one leather pouch, was dispatched this day.

Mail, consisting of one leather pouch, was received this day at Animas City.

That was about the extent of the mail. It was the same all the way through. The original pay was $2,745. Then it was decreased $1,279.22. Then it was increased to three trips, and $13,242.28; then increased to seven trips, and $31,343.46. Joseph's pay was $5,300; Jaramillo's pay was $6,200; Sanderson's pay for three trips was $8,000, and for seven trips $18,666.64. Gentlemen, if you subtract $18,666.64, the pay given to Sanderson, from $31,343.46, the pay allowed by Brady, you have a clear profit of $12,676.82 each year. Of course, as the trips went up, they had a little more to pay, but when it reached $31,343.46, the profit that they had over and above everything was $12,676.82.

I have shown you the extent of the mail. Let us see what the productiveness on this route was. That is a good way to get at the extent of Mr. Brady's order. In 1879 the entire revenue from every office was $402.26. Excluding Animas City the entire revenue was $78.05. In 1880 the entire revenues were $935.82; excluding Animas City, $244.68. Taking all the offices on the route in 1881 supplied by railroad and in every way the entire pay was $3,855.21, but throwing off the railroad offices the amount was $252.15, and at that time, in order to carry that amount of mail, by Brady's order the Government was paying $31,343.46 a year.

There are overt acts upon this route, gentlemen. It is one of the longest routes. I shall not take as much of your time with the others as I have with this, but I think it is due to you and to the Government that the case should be stated fully. Our friends on the other side insist upon it. On the 26th of February, 1881, Brady made that order [exhibiting order to jury]. I want you to look at it, and see that I give you the correct date, because that is the date specified in the indictment. I have shown you its illegality in every respect. It was retroactive. It increased the pay for the increase of service against the plain command of the act of Congress. It was not needed. It was not necessary. I think I have sufficiently demonstrated that fact.

The COURT. The act of Congress prohibited an increase of more than 50 per cent. in case of expedition.

Mr. KER. In case of expedition; yes, sir.

The COURT. This is increase of service, is it not?

Mr. KER. This was both. It doubled both.

Mr. MERRICK. He put both in one order.

The COURT. In the remark you just made to the jury you spoke of increase of service.

Mr. KER. I may not have made it sufficiently plain, but the amount allowed for expedition in that case was $11,278.82.

The COURT. I remember that very well, but what attracted my attention was your last remark, that it was increase of service.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, it was an increase of service.

Mr. MERRICK. Was it?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; that is just what it was.

Mr. MERRICK. Let us see. Judge Wilson says it was an increase of service and not expedition.

Mr. KER. If it was an increase of service they would multiply the trips by the original price.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, we had better understand this right here. Here there had been expedition as in other cases there had been expedition, and after the expedition was made, then they increased the trips. Now, Mr. Ker's proposition is, that in increasing the trips you can only go back and multiply the original contract price.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. That is his proposition, and that is the way he gets at the illegality.

The COURT. Is not that so?

Mr. WILSON. No, if your honor please. It is absolutely absurd.

Mr. MERRICK. Where there has been an increase of the trips and expedition, to double up the whole concern afterwards is to grant a new increase contrary to that law which says that the increase or expedition shall only be 50 per cent. of the original contract price.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no. That is not what the law says.

Mr. MERRICK. Where is the law?

The COURT. If that is not the law then I have misunderstood it all along.

Mr. MERRICK. Let us look at the law.

Mr. WILSON. That is just where the mistake is. It is this way—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Let us look at the law.

The COURT. Where the service, for example, is one trip a week at $1,000 and it is increased to three trips a week without any change in the expedition, then the pay will be $3,000. Then if another order is made to six times a week that would make the pay $6,000.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

The COURT. And if to seven times, $7,000.

Mr. WILSON. Exactly.

The COURT. So that the original contract for the service is the basis of the allowance for the subsequent increases throughout.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; the subsequent multiplication of trips.

The COURT. But in regard to expedition there is no such standard, because everything depends on the affidavits.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

The COURT. And in regard to affidavits there seems to be some looseness in the law.

Mr. WILSON. Will your honor allow me a word right here.

Mr. MERRICK. Allow me to read the law before we go on.

The COURT. Just allow me to finish. Before the passage of the act of April 7, 1880, the lower the contractor put the number of horses and men that were necessary on the existing schedule the better it was for him, because the more readily it could be doubled. It was to his interest, then, to swear down the original service as low as possible, and to his interest also to swear up the number required for the increased service as far as possible. After it was ascertained how many men and animals the existing schedule required and how many men and animals the proposed schedule required, then the allowance was fixed pro rata. If the proposed increase of men and animals was five times the existing number of men and animals, of course it would be five times the existing price. Well, the act of 1880, as I understand it—I may be in error, but that is the way I read it—provided that in increasing the speed in no instance was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to allow more than 50 per cent. for any amount of increased speed over the existing rate of pay.

Mr. WILSON. That is right. Now, your honor, let me—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Before Mr. Wilson goes on I want to read the act. He and I are a little bit at issue about it.

Mr. WILSON. Go on. I would like to have it made plain.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

The Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given to any rate of pay exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

The COURT. That is clear, I think.

Mr. MERRICK. As originally let.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Wilson, I will hear what you have to say about it.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, here is a contract, we will say, to carry the mail on a certain route once a week within a certain time for $1,000 a year. Now, it is to be carried, we will say, once a week, fifty hours, for $1,000 a year. After that contract had been let, and when it is just simply one trip a week, the schedule is reduced to thirty hours, and we will say that that adds $500 to the pay of the contractor. Now, that becomes the contract between the Government and the contractor. Whereas they started out with once a week on fifty hours, they have it now once a week on thirty hours; and whereas the contract originally was to pay $1,000, now on the schedule for thirty hours at once a week the pay is $1,500. That is the contract between the Government and the contractor. Now, something transpires by which it becomes important to have two trips a week. They do not change the schedule a particle, but it is to be two trips a week on a schedule of thirty hours. In that case you simply double the contractor's pay; you give him $3,000 instead of $1,500. But if you make it six trips a week instead of one, you just multiply the price that he is getting by six. The difference between us, which is a question of law, I presume, is this: They say that when you have got the schedule increased whereby the price has come to be $1,500, and that increased price is brought about by the expedition, then, when you require two trips instead of one, for this additional trip you can only give him $500; that is to say, one-half of the original contract price. In other words, according to their theory, the Government is getting an additional trip, with the expedition, at the same price that it got the original trip on the slow schedule. That is their theory of it.

The COURT. I think the statute refers to the original contract.

Mr. WILSON. That is the contract as it has been changed by the Government in expediting the service.

Mr. MERRICK. It says, "as originally let."

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; I know it says that. It is originally let at a certain price, and the Government changes that contract, and that becomes the contract.

The COURT. But that was not the contract at the letting.

Mr. WILSON. I know, if we were to be governed by the very strict letter of that statute, that would be what it would be, just as Mr. Merrick has said, and that is the reason I call your honor's attention to it.

The COURT. The reason of the law is this, as I understand: That no expedition absolutely shall be allowed at all where the expedition already allowed has exceeded the 50 per cent., and where any further expedition would increase the allowance beyond 50 per cent. of the original contract it is to be disallowed.

Mr. WILSON. That is not the construction that has been placed upon it by the department, your honor.

The COURT. May be not; and I can see a reason why Congress might take this course to stop that thing altogether.

Mr. WILSON. The construction that has been placed upon this by the department has been the uniform practice, and, I think, has been proved in this case; it certainly was in the other, and if it has not been in this case it is an oversight. Of course a construction can be given such as your honor suggests.

The COURT. It would stop expedition altogether.

Mr. WILSON. It would cut off the service; that is to say, it would cut off the Postmaster-General from supplying the needed service. That would be the effect of it.

The COURT. Congress had to judge whether it was needed or not. When expedition had been allowed already beyond 50 per cent., then, under that law, as interpreted by Mr. Merrick and as it seems to read, no further expedition could be allowed at all, and no expedition could be allowed, except where the original service still existed as let, and then only to the extent of 50 per cent.

Mr. WILSON. There is just where the difference is, and I want it understood right here, because this is just as good a place as any other to understand this feature of the case. I will take the case I supposed a while ago, where there is a route with service once a week at $1,000. There is no doubt about its being let at a proper sum, no controversy about the integrity of it. Then I will suppose that it becomes necessary to expedite that service with one trip; and there is no question about the integrity of the expedition, none at all. Just take a case of that kind, and the pay is increased to $1,500, and no question about its being all right. Now, it becomes absolutely necessary and essential to the public service to multiply those trips.

The COURT. But who is to judge of the necessity of that?

Mr. WILSON. Well, that is the question; I say the Postmaster-General.

The COURT. But the Postmaster-General has no discretion where there is a statute.

Mr. WILSON. That depends upon the construction of that law.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. And if he honestly thought that the meaning of the law was one way, although your honor and I might honestly think the meaning of the law was the other way, that is another question.

The COURT. That would go to his intention, of course.

Mr. WILSON. I only interrupted for the purpose of having that point brought to the attention of the court.

The COURT. It was a fair opportunity for the interruption.

Mr. WILSON. I do not want to interpose.

The COURT. My attention was not very closely called to this provision of the statute before, but I remembered that the law contained this provision. However, I was not aware that you, on your part, claimed that in a case where expedition had already been allowed beyond 50 per cent. the Postmaster-General, under that law, was at liberty to provide for increased expedition and allow 50 per cent. upon the former increase.

Mr. WILSON. No, no, not that, if your honor please. We do not understand each other yet, and I am glad you made that remark. You must remember that this subsequent order is not for expedition at all. This order that Mr. Ker has been talking about is an order for multiplication of trips.

The COURT. Then the act of 1880 does not apply to increase of service.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly not; he is applying that to the multiplication of trips.

The COURT. I agree with you altogether about that, that the act of 1880 does not apply to the increased number of trips; it only applies to orders for expedition. But I understand Mr. Ker is producing evidence before the jury of an allowance of new expedition upon former orders of expedition beyond the limits of the act.

Mr. WILSON. That is just what I am calling attention to.

The COURT. Then it is a difference of fact.

Mr. WILSON. I think I ought to apologize for having interfered.

The COURT. No, no; it is a good place to make the interference, and I shall invite Mr. Ker's attention to that point.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Ker.] The court wants you to explain the point instead of me doing it; you go ahead and do it yourself.

Mr. KER. The contract price is $1,658. On the 29th of April, Brady ordered increase of two trips and allowed $3,316.80; reduced time from ninety to fifty hours, and allowed contractor $8,457.84.

The COURT. What is the date of that order?

Mr. KER. April 29, 1879. There are two separate orders, as the law calls for, expressing the amount for trips.

The COURT. Then there was expedition there.

Mr. KER. Then he goes on: On the 13th of January—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] 1880.

Mr. KER. [Continuing.] He raised the price; he raised the trips four more and allows for the seven trips $17,910.72. The correct amount for seven trips would have been $11,606. But in this order he makes it $17,910.72.

The COURT. That is, you refer the expedition which has been granted first on the two trips to the whole increase?

Mr. KER. The whole of it; and deducting the contract price, he allowed for expedition alone $11,278.82 in this one order.

The COURT. That was prior to the passage of the law?

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly it was, your honor.

Mr. MERRICK. He adds to the original order two trips and expedition prior to the passage of the law; then after the passage of the law he puts on additional trips.

The COURT. What is the date of the order in January, 1880?

Mr. MERRICK. The order was in January, 1881. I misled Mr. Ker by saying that it was in 1880.

Mr. WILSON. You have it wrong.

Mr. MERRICK. January 25, 1881 the order went into operation, adding four trips. Now, for the four trips, he pays so much for the trips and carries on to the additional four trips a duplication of the expedition previously granted. Do you understand, your honor?

The COURT. Yes, I understand that.

Mr. MERRICK. Now he duplicates the expedition previously granted, applying it to the four trips.

Mr. WILSON. Let us get it exactly right.

Mr. MERRICK. Is not that so?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Then I do not understand it.

The COURT. He quadruplicates it instead of duplicates it.

Mr. MERRICK. Quadruplicates it.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to have those two orders. [Mr. Blackmar handed Mr. Wilson the papers asked for.]

Mr. MERRICK. Let me state it.

The COURT. I think you are right, Mr. Merrick. The original order was made on two trips a week, so that when four trips were added——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] It duplicates the whole, or more than that.

The COURT. It triplicates the whole.

Mr. MERRICK. $8,457 was the cost when he added the two trips a week, and gave the expedition for both. Then he doubled that.

The COURT. The two trips amounted to sixteen hundred and odd-dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. The original cost was $2,745. Then it was reduced, one hundred and thirty-odd miles being cut off. I have not the figures here.

The COURT. Mr. Ker stated it at sixteen hundred and odd-dollars.

Mr. KER. One hundred and sixteen miles was cut off from Garland to Ojo Caliente, leaving one hundred and seventy-two miles. Then it was to Animas City, or at least Parrott City was left off. Now it was brought down to $1,658. That was the pay.

Mr. MERRICK. That was the original letting; then when he added these two trips and expedition it was brought up for trips to $3,316, and expedition added on to that, $8,457; and then when he adds the other trips on he adds in the expedition, as I understand.

Mr. KER. Precisely.

Mr. WILSON. Let me state it: On the 29th of April, 1879, this order was made (recollect this law was passed on the 7th of April, 1880):

Increase service two trips per week from May 12, 1879, and allow contractor $3,316.80 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

The COURT. That is plain enough.

Mr. WILSON. That was April 29, 1879.

Second. Reduce running time from ninety (90) to fifty (50) hours from May 12, 1879, and allow contractor $8,457.84 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

The COURT. That is for expedition with two trips.

Mr. MERRICK. It was one trip originally.

Mr. WILSON. That made three; so that it was expedition on three trips.

The COURT. Originally there was one trip and that was sixteen hundred and odd dollars; and then when the order was made for the additional trip, it amounted to over $3,300.

Mr. WILSON. He added on two trips.

The COURT. That would make more than $3,300?

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. WILSON. $3,300 was the amount added to the original contract price.

The COURT. If it was so much added to the original contract price that would make it $4,700.

Mr. WILSON. This expedition occurred as stated in this same order. That was done prior to the passage of the act of the 7th of April, 1880.

The COURT. I understand that.

Mr. WILSON. The act of April 7, 1880, says:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service, under any contract either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

After that time there was no order expediting this service. After the passage of this act, 7th of April, 1880, no order was made expediting this service. There is no pretense that there was, and I have the order right here before me. It was made in February, 1881, and it reads:

From January 15, 1881, increase service to seven (7) trips per week.

It was not expedition; it was increase of service. The law simply says:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract, either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

The COURT. I understand your point now.

Mr. WILSON. So that what was done was simply to multiply trips upon an expedition that had already formerly been made.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. It was to carry the expedition of three trips up to seven trips.

Mr. WILSON. It was to multiply the service as then existing.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Ker.] Go on.

Mr. KER. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, on this route John W. Dorsey was the contractor. The proposal was written by Miner; the amount filled in by Rerdell. John W. Dorsey made two oaths. Stephen W. Dorsey furnished two petitions in his handwriting, and filled in the words and figures in the oath that I showed you last. Vaile helped to draw the pay. The whole of them engaged in some act that was connected with this route, including Mr. Brady's order.

NO. 38156, SILVERTON TO PARROTT CITY, COLORADO.

This route runs down from Silverton, goes into Animas City, and runs off then to Parrott City. This is one of Dorsey's routes. The distance was sixty-five miles, two trips a week; time, thirty hours. John W. Dorsey was contractor; pay, $1,488. Miner wrote the body of the proposal. Rerdell filled in the amounts. The official orders were:

January 14, 1878, Postmaster Trew sent a letter to Brady.

May 1, 1878, John W. Dorsey made subcontract with Earle.

June 14, distance circular sent out.

October 1, Earle's subcontract filed.

October 31, distance circular sent out again.

January 23, 1879, order to embrace Animas City.

March 1, changed schedule.

April 21, date of oath.

April 23, letter from J. B. Chaffee.

April 24, letter from A. McDonald.

April 26, letter from A. E. Reynolds.

April 28, letter from Governor Pitkin.

May 5, letter from J. B. Belford.

May 5, letter from J. W. Dorsey.

May 6, oath of Dorsey filed.

May 12, order for increase and expedition.

November 11, S. W. Dorsey filed subcontract.

November 25, J. W. Dorsey made subcontract with Steineger.

January 21, 1880, S. W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract.

January 21, Steineger's subcontract filed.

August 16, letter from J. W. Dorsey for remission.

August 19, order for remission.

September 24, letter from the postmaster for change of schedule.

October 5, Fort Lewis established.

November 8, petition for change of schedule.

November 12, petition to extend schedule.

December 28, order for allowance for increase to Fort Lewis.

Fort Lewis, gentlemen, is down there near the river. [Pointing on the map.] Now, let us return again.

January 14, 1878, Postmaster Trew, at Animas City, wrote to Brady stating that the carrier passes through Animas City, and that it should be embraced upon this route. This was in January, before the contracts went into effect, before the bids had been opened and the contracts awarded.

On the 1st of May, 1878, John W. Dorsey made a subcontract with Earle for two trips at $2,280. You see their pay was only $1,488, but he made this subcontract with Earle for $2,280. Miner wrote that subcontract. This was Dorsey's route.

June 14, 1878, there was a distance circular sent out showing Animas City upon the route.

October 1, 1878, Earle's subcontract was filed.

October 31, 1878, there was another distance circular sent out and returned, showing Animas City upon the route.

January 23, 1879. This was the same date upon which Animas City was taken off the other route, where I told you it was at a less price, and put upon this route. There was an order made by French to embrace Animas City next after Hermosa, increasing the distance ten miles, and allowing the contractor $215.65 per annum additional, and allowing subcontractor $330.03. The order added ten miles to this route, making it seventy-five miles, apparently, whereas it was only sixty-five.

March 17, 1879, Brady ordered change of schedule from thirty to thirty-seven hours, allowing seven hours for this increase of Animas City. April 21, 1879, is the date upon which John W. Dorsey made an oath for seven trips, fifteen hours. Rerdell wrote the body, he says, about May 5 or May 6, 1879, and S. W. Dorsey furnished the figures.

Rerdell says, on page 2347, at the bottom :

Q. I hand him the oath for expedition upon that route, marked 6 Q, and ask him in whose handwriting that is?—A. The body of this is in my handwriting. The signature is that of John W. Dorsey.

Q. Were the numbers in there before Mr. Dorsey's signature was affixed?—A. No, sir; I put those in after it was sworn to.

Q. After the jurat was there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know when you put them there?—A. Either on the 5th or 6th of May.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. What year?—A. 1879.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. When you put in those numbers there, how came you to select the particular numbers?

The WITNESS. On this?

Mr. BLISS. On any one of them; take that for instance.

A. On all that I have had presented to me so far, that I entered, except on the route from Toquerville to Adairville, 41119, the figures were made up by S. W. Dorsey.

Q. By whose direction did you put them in, if by anybody's?—A. I put them in by the direction of S. W. Dorsey.

Now, gentlemen, there is no testimony from S. W. Dorsey as to this particular affidavit. He was not questioned about it, either in his examination-in-chief or upon his cross-examination; and where a thing is stated and not denied by anybody it is not worth while to go into cross-examination upon it. And this is the 21st of April, 1879, the very same day as to which I called your attention to the two affidavits on the other route—the day on which John Dorsey said “I got one in the morning and the other in the afternoon, and I got a letter from Rerdell.” You remember that I showed you that Rerdell could by no possibility have been here, for he was away out in Nebraska at that time.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He said he thought it was from Rerdell.

Mr. KER. On the 23d of April, 1879, there is a letter from J. B. Chaffee, from New York, to Brady, asking for daily mail on fast schedule. The body of that was written by Mr. Sibbald. Gentlemen, I showed you in the other route a letter from J. B. Chaffee, dated 23d of April, and filed on the 22d. That was on route 38135, Saint Charles to Greenhorn, and here comes another letter from Chaffee, on this very route, written by Sibbald, who was a clerk in the employ of Dorsey. I do not know whether the signature is genuine or not.

On the 24th of April, 1879, there is a letter from New York, from A. McDonald to Brady, for an increase to daily, and fast line. And, gentlemen, by a strange coincidence or something of that sort—I cannot frame a word to express it—it was written in New York, and it was filed the very same day. Mr. McDonald must have been a very early riser, and got up about 2 o'clock in the morning to write that letter so as to put it in the newspaper train that reaches here by 11.15, because you know if he had waited for the limited express it would not have reached here until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and at 4 o'clock the department is closed. But on the very day it was written is the very day that it was filed in the department.

On the 26th of April, two days afterwards, along comes a letter from A. E. Reynolds, of Chicago, asking for daily service and fast time from Mr. Brady.

On the 28th of April there is a letter from Governor Pitkin and other State officers at Denver asking for daily mail and fast time. You remember that Rerdell wrote that, and it is the best evidence in the world that Mr. Rerdell was not here in Washington fixing up Dorsey's affidavit, for it was on the 28th of April, 1879, that he was fixing up this letter for Governor Pitkin and the State officers to sign, and upon those letters of introduction from S. W. Dorsey the State officers affixed their names to what he wrote.

On May 5, 1879 letter from J. B. Belford, House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C., asking for a daily service and fast time. Rerdell wrote the body of that letter, and Belford signed it. You know Rerdell got back on the 5th of May, and he lost no time; he was an active man, and he was still at work.

May 5, 1879, the same day, a letter of J. W. Dorsey transmitting the oath. Rerdell wrote and signed that letter.

On the 6th of May the oath of Dorsey was filed.

The COURT. I think Rerdell said he arrived here the 4th.

Mr. KER. I have read his testimony, and he says he arrived on the 5th or 6th of May, he did not know which.

The COURT. Very well; I stand corrected then.

Mr. KER. I will come to it some time, and when I do, I will call your honor's attention to it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I think, when he was called in rebuttal, he said the 5th or 6th; but it makes very little difference.

Mr. KER. On the 12th of June was Brady's order, 4 Q, page 1855:

1st. Increase service five trips per week from July 1, 1879, and allow contractor $4,259.12 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Reduce running time from thirty-seven hours to fifteen hours from July 1, 1879, and allow contractor $10,549.51 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Remember, before it was two trips, and five added made it seven, and for trips there is $4,259.12. You know it was thirty hours, and he made it by schedule thirty-seven, but allows, to reduce it down to fifteen hours, $10,549.51. Gentlemen, this increase and this expedition were all made upon the letters I have stated to you—the letter from Chaffee, the letter from McDonald, one from Reynolds, one from Governor Pitkin, and one from Mr. Belford. They brought the increase upon this route. Brady was interrogated as to how it was that he hit upon fifteen hours, and he says, upon page 3453, at the top:

Q. Does the fact that the contractor made the affidavit on the 21st day of April preceding, in which he specifies fifteen hours, and which is the only paper on file other than the order which specifies fifteen hours, aid your memory any?—A. It does not. Fifteen hours is about as slow as it ought to have been expedited to.

Q. On a route that passes ten thousand feet above the level of the sea, do you say that fifteen hours is about as slow as it ought to have been expedited to?—A. I do not remember how far it is above the sea. I do not know that I ever heard about that. I know it was a very difficult route.

Q. You have no knowledge how it happened that the contractor on the 21st of April and you on the 12th of June concurred in hitting upon the time fifteen hours, when you were to reduce it from thirty-seven hours?—A. I have not.

We attempted to get from Thomas J. Brady how he hit upon fifteen hours and allowed this vast sum for the change, but he did not remember how he hit upon it. But away back on the 21st of April the contractor got ready his oath in anticipation of the fifteen hours.

On the 11th of November, 1879, S. W. Dorsey filed his subcontract dated April 1, 1879.

On the 25th of November, 1879, John W. Dorsey made a subcontract with Fred. Steineger for seven trips, at $9,400. Why, gentlemen, for expedition alone they were allowed $10,549.51. Rerdell wrote part of that subcontract, John W. Dorsey part of it, and Stephen W. Dorsey guaranteed the subcontract. Steineger said in his testimony, at page 1866:

I told Mr. Dorsey that it was impossible in the winter time to make the schedule of fifteen hours. * * * He (Mr. J. W. Dorsey) told me that the Post-Office Department always made allowance in the mountains for bad weather in the winter.

You remember that John W. Dorsey did not deny that conversation. There were some that he did deny—two or three—but the balance of them he did not deny. And here on the 25th of November, 1879, in making his subcontract, he told this poor fellow, as an inducement to get him to take it, that the Post-Office Department always made an allowance for trips over the mountains in the winter. He was like his brother, he had a little "cunning" on his tongue.

January 21, 1880, Stephen W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract. Rerdell wrote and signed the letter.

January 21, the same day, Steineger's subcontract was filed.

August 16, 1880, letter of J. W. Dorsey asking for a remission for the quarter ending March 31, 1880. Rerdell wrote and signed that letter.

August 19, three days afterwards, Brady ordered (30 Q, page 1894):

Remit $1,845 of the deduction noted in report for week ended May 8, 1880.

Now, gentlemen, there was a remission of $1,845. To whom ought it to go? Steineger, I think you will agree with me. John W. Dorsey had brought him into signing the subcontract. I will show you where the money went to: $1,380 was paid to Bosler, and the remainder, $465, went to the attorney who collected it. $465 for collecting $1,845. It seems to me it was a good business, collecting that. The letter was put in on the 16th of August, 1880, asking to have the fines or deductions remitted, and three days afterwards Brady made the order remitting the fines, and, according to the testimony given as to the disposition of the money, the attorney who made the application to Brady got $465 for getting that remission. Walsh, you know, said that Brady got 50 per cent. I do not know how much Bosler gave him, but there was evidently somebody who got something out of it. That is in the books and (turning to defendant's counsel) if you will bring them here I will point it out to you. Laugh. Look at Mr. Davidge laughing. It is a funny thing to keep the books away from the jury.

On the 24th of September, 1880, letter from postmaster to have schedule changed. It is 14 Q, on page 1858. It is worth reading:

SILVERTON, COLO., September 24, 1880.

To the Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
Postmaster-General United States:

The undersigned, Fred. Steineger, mail contractor from Silverton to Parrott City, in the State of Colorado, being mail route No. 38156, and citizens residing upon said mail route, respectfully request you to issue an order changing the schedule time from Silverton to Parrott City from fifteen to twenty-four hours, from the 15th day of November until the 15th day of April of each year, until further orders, and that you fix the time of departure of the mail from Silverton at the hour of 10 a. m., and from Parrott City at the hour of 1 p. m. In support of this petition we have the honor to respectfully represent that during the period above stated, owing to the rigor of our winters here, heavy snow storms, snow slides, snow drifts, and the mountainous character of the country, all experience shows that it is physically impossible for any contractor to carry the mails over said route on the present schedule time, or in less time than twenty-four hours. Much of the time carriers on the route can proceed only upon snow-shoes. Hoping you will see the importance of these suggestions, we most earnestly and respectfully submit them to your consideration.

It is signed by Steineger, signed by all the postmasters, and with about two hundred names of people, asking him to change the schedule to twenty-four hours; that it was impossible to carry it in the schedule time.

On the 5th of October, 1880, Fort Lewis was established, and an allowance made for it.

On the 8th of November, 1880 (13 Q, page 1857):

DENVER, COLO., November 8, 1880.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: I inclose a petition of the citizens of Silverton to the effect that the time from Silverton to Parrott City on route 38156 may be extended from fifteen to twenty-four hours from November 15 till April 15.

This petition is signed by nearly every business man in Silverton, and by many in La Plata County. It is consistent with what many of them stated to me on the occasion of my recent visit to that part of the State. It is based upon the fact that it is nearly impossible to get the mail through when the snow is deep, and much of the time absolutely impossible to get it through in fifteen hours.

There is no use in my reading it any further. It is signed by nearly every business man, and every one of them willing to have it carried in twenty-four hours; they did not want it carried in fifteen. And yet the order was for fifteen hours, and $10,549.51 paid for carrying it in that time.

Then, on the 12th of November, 1880 (15 Q, page 1858):

PARROTT CITY, LA PLATA COUNTY, COLORADO,
 November 12, 1880.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: The western portion of mail route No. 38156, from Silverton to Parrott, lies in a country which during the winter is usually blockaded by snow, and the mail carriers are often obliged to traverse it upon snow-shoes. On this, the Parrott end, the altitude is nearly nine thousand feet, the winter vigorous, and the trip dangerous. A mail carrier lost his life here last winter, and in order to avoid the chances of such casualties it is requested that the following be fixed as schedule time for above route:

Leave Silverton 10 a. m.; arrive at Parrott 3 p. m. following day.

Leave Parrott 10 a. m.; arrive at Silverton 10 a. m. following day.

That is twenty-four hours' time, and the petition is from Silverton.

Then, on the 28th of December, 1880, there was an order from November 1 (47 Q, defense, page 3288) to allow contractor $716.66 and subcontractor $470 per annum additional pay for four miles' increase to Fort Lewis.

Clarence W. Cornell testified that the mail would not weigh over forty pounds, and that he carried it on horseback. Frederick Steineger says that in the winter of 1879-'80 the mail was carried for four months on snow-shoes part of the distance; that it was impossible to use horses over that portion. Do you remember that he said that he could slide down with the snow-shoes a great deal faster than a horse could go?

John M. Trew says, on page 1888—listen to what Trew says:

The people that were carrying the mail wished me to certify that by coming by way of Animas City it would add ten miles to the distance—I refused to do it until I could examine into the matter. I investigated the matter. I do not remember just how now and found they were getting pay for sixty-nine miles, which would make the longest road that was ever traveled between Silverton and Parrott City.

There is a specimen of an honest postmaster; one of the men that Brady ought to have paid attention to. He says they came to him and wanted him to certify that by going through Animas City it would add ten miles to the route, and he positively refused to do it. You remember also that he says they passed through Animas City on their way to Parrott City. You remember he wrote a letter to Brady telling him that. You remember that they took up a collection, and he and the citizens there had to pay the carrier to take their letters from Animas City up to Silverton.

On this route Vaile drew the pay, Dorsey drew the pay, and Bosler drew the pay. They all had a share in it.

Let us look at the oath. Dorsey's oath says that on the present schedule, seven trips, it would be three men and ten animals; that is, thirteen. Reduced to fifteen hours, it would take six men and thirty animals; that would be thirty-six. That would give him thirty-six to figure upon.

Cornell says, for seven trips in fifteen hours he used four men and twelve animals; that is sixteen. He says sometimes he had used sixteen animals; that would be twenty; but in the summer he used six men and twenty animals; that would be twenty-six. You know that in the winter they carried it on snow-shoes. John W. Dorsey had thirty-six. Steineger says that he used six men and fourteen animals; that would be twenty—sixteen less than Dorsey wanted it. He said that it was impossible to make the trip with more horses; that they had to make it with snow-shoes.

The original pay on this route was $1,488; it was increased to $14,870.01. Steineger was paid $9,400. The profit, after they got Steineger to carry it, each year was $5,470.01. I do not wonder that Miner said to Moore that they were "all good affidavit men." Now, if you take an account of what it costs the Government for putting Animas City upon this route, the figures are just $2,006. They always passed through Animas City, but by adding it to this route that addition cost the Government $2,006.

Gentlemen, here is the oath of Dorsey [handing it to the jury] filled in, dated April 21, 1879.

The COURT. Which Dorsey?

Mr. MERRICK. John?

Mr. KER. John W. Dorsey. Filled in by Rerdell and put into the office. In the indictment it is alleged the order was made on the 12th of June, 1879. There it is, June 12, 1879: "Do this.—Brady." There is the order that was made. And in this jacket was that oath upon which this order was based; that was the time it was brought into the case and became part of the records of the office. In this jacket were the letters that I have spoken of from people in New York and a man out in Chicago, and the whole of this work was done upon such evidence as that.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ker, you spoke of the time when Rerdell returned. I find on page 2233, the following:

Q. When did you return from that visit?—A. I returned about the 5th of May.

Q. State whether or not after you returned, about the middle of May, as you say, I believe—

A. [Interposing.] I said about the 5th of May.

Q. [Continuing]—about the 5th of May, 1879, you found blank affidavits among the papers connected with the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many did you find?—A. Well, there were several blank affidavits of John W. Dorsey's and several of John M. Peck's. I don't know how many there were.

Q. Were they blank affidavits?—A. Well, sir, they were blank affidavits—

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] May it please your honor, I object to the argument of the counsel to the jury being supplemented by Mr. Merrick.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not going to supplement anything; I was simply reading the testimony for Mr. Ker.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is very much like a supplement.

Mr. MERRICK. Not at all. There was a question raised by his honor as to the date when Rerdell returned, and I was going to read it all in connection. Read it, Mr. Ker.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You may read what you please, and Mr. Ker may make any argument he pleases, but do not let us have two at the same time.

The COURT. I am astonished at the objection of counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. It is most outrageous, ridiculous, and unprofessional.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor does not understand. Mr. Ker stated the time of the return of Mr. Rerdell——

The COURT. [Interposing.] He stated it as the 5th of May.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor does not understand me, I am sure. Your honor said that you thought it was about the 4th. I remarked that my recollection was that when he was recalled in rebuttal he said the 5th or 6th. Now, I have no sort of objection to Mr. Merrick calling the attention of Mr. Ker to this question of time, but I do object to Mr. Merrick going beyond that point of time and into other matters testified to by Rerdell.

Mr. MERRICK. My object was to help Mr. Ker along.

The COURT. This is the merest, smallest objection I ever heard.

Mr. DAVIDGE. In respect of time I make no objection.

The COURT. Certainly Mr. Ker's colleague may rise to read a part of the evidence to relieve him for a moment.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I would suppose, inasmuch as Mr. Ker proposes to take five days in his address to the jury, he would be able to read it all himself.

Mr. MERRICK. Who told you that?

The COURT. For that reason he needs the more assistance, probably, from his colleague.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He did not ask for assistance. He manifested no fatigue.

The COURT. I shall overrule the objection.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Yes; I supposed you would.

The COURT. You might have anticipated that, and the fact that you did shows that you did not consider the objection well founded.

Mr. DAVIDGE. But the whole question now is whether the case is to be argued on opening by two counsel at the same time or by one.

The COURT. I have already ruled that counsel for the Government may make a half a dozen speeches in the opening if they want to.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have understood that your ruling was that they could have two.

The COURT. I said as many as they wanted.

Mr. MERRICK. I was not submitting an argument nor making more than one. I was doing that which I have never seen any gentleman object to at the bar—simply reading a paper.

The COURT. It is certainly not customary to object to that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I hope I will not be put in the wrong in this matter. I objected to no interruption to fix the article of time. However, when one counsel is assigned to open the case to the jury, it is expected that such counsel will open the case, and I deny that there is any right existing for two counsel to participate in the opening at the same time. If two may do it, half a dozen may do it.

The COURT. I have stated my opinion, and stated it two or three times before.

Mr. DAVIDGE. In regard to the number of counsel I want your honor to understand that I have no objection to the number. They may all open, if they please, but my objection is to two opening at the same time. I want to hear this gentleman, and then after that I want to hear as many as they think proper to trot out.

The COURT. I object to two talking at the same time, too. But that was not the case in this instance. Mr. Ker stopped, and Mr. Merrick was reading the evidence for him. I said the other day that as the Government had but one counsel to close, it necessarily must be allowed more than one, if they chose, to open the case, and that the Government might have as many counsel as they pleased to open the case, and after that was done, then counsel for defense should follow, and then the Government might close with one counsel.

Mr. DAVIDGE. If your honor will excuse me, I understood you afterwards to say that the case would be opened by two counsel on behalf of the Government. Now, personally, I would be very glad to have them all speak in advance; that is my personal view of the matter; if I could accomplish that rule I certainly would; personally, I do not object to hearing them all. But time is the only article now in which I have any interest. If your honor thinks that the case ought to be opened by more than two, let it be done, but do not let us have two at the same time.

The COURT. There cannot be two at the same time.

Mr. DAVIDGE. This looked very much like it.

Mr. MERRICK. Not at all; that is not so. I was only reading from the evidence.

The COURT. Two cannot speak at the same time any more than two bodies of matter can occupy the same space at the same time.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Whether that law of physics applies or not, I think your honor will agree with me that in the trial of a cause it is frequently found that two intellects can occupy the same space, and not a very large one, either.

Mr. MERRICK. We have had that manifestation on your side this evening.

The COURT. I will suggest that this is a very common indulgence to a counsel to permit his colleague to help him in that manner.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not object in the least to Mr. Merrick helping him, but I do object to his being interjected into the argument of Mr. Ker.

Mr. MERRICK. I was not interjected. I was reading the testimony.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick was only reading from the testimony. I think the court will exercise its discretion.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I know you will, and for that reason I made the appeal to you.

The COURT. When there is some foundation for an appeal I am very glad to entertain it, but I do not think that in this instance it is proper.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I want the appeals made one at a time.

The COURT. The court has ruled upon that point.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Ker.] Go on, Mr. Ker, and read the evidence.

Mr. KER. On page 2233:

Q. When did you return from that visit?—A. I returned about the 5th of May.

Q. State whether or not after you returned, about the middle of May, as you say, I believe—

A. [Interposing.] I said about the 5th of May.

Q. [Continuing.]—about the 5th of May, 1879, you found blank affidavits among the papers connected with the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many did you find?—A. Well, there were several blank affidavits of John W. Dorsey's and several of John M. Peck's. I don't know how many there were.

Q. Were they blank affidavits?—A. Well, sir, they were blank affidavits similar to that one I sent, leaving out the number of men and animals in each case.

Q. Did they purport to have been sworn to?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were those affidavits among the papers when you left here to go West?—A. Some of them were. I think those of Peck's were here, probably four or five, or half a dozen, and I had made out, before I left here, a lot of them and sent them to John W. Dorsey. In the mean time, when I returned here, John W. Dorsey was here; but still there were some of the blanks here; some of them acknowledged up there and some acknowledged here.

Q. Acknowledged up where?—A. At his home.

Q. In Vermont?—A. In Vermont.

Q. With blanks still in them?—A. All blank so far as men and animals were concerned, and the number of the route.

Q. Then there was not much left. What did he want with them? What were they to be used for?

Mr. WILSON. Hold on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He does not know what he wanted with them.

Q. What did S. W. Dorsey want with them?—A. They were to be used whenever a route was to be expedited, and when he wanted to state the number of men and animals that would be required on the route upon which to base the pay.

Q. By whom were those papers signed?—A. They were signed by John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck.

Q. What use was made of those papers afterwards?—A. Whenever it became necessary to use one of them the blank would be filled up, and they would be filed in the department.

Q. Filled up by whom?—A. In some cases by me, and in some cases by Mr. Dorsey.

Q. S. W.?—A. Yes, sir.

No wonder you did not want it read.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have not the slightest objection to the contents, not the slightest; it was only to the manner.

The COURT. Let us drop it now; it is not worth while to continue it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There was a remark made that called that out.

The COURT. Adjourn the court until to-morrow morning.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, APRIL 24, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. KER. I will now take up—

ROUTE No. 41119, TOQUERVILLE TO ADAIRVILLE, UTAH.

This route was one hundred and thirty two miles long, the time was sixty hours; the number of trips a week, one; John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $1,168. The proposal, excepting the signature, was written by Miner. Rerdell filled in the amount. The official papers are:

October 10, 1878, two additional trips ordered.

January 22, 1879, oath of Peck made.

March 8, 1879, Vaile filed a subcontract.

May 5, 1879, Vaile's subcontract withdrawn.

May 8, 1879, Rerdell filed a subcontract.

May 15, 1879, Rerdell's subcontract withdrawn.

June 23, 1879, Rerdell wrote a proposition.

June 25, 1879, petition filed for additional trips.

June 25, 1879, oath of Peck filed.

July 8, 1879, order for increase and expedition.

July 10, 1879, second subcontract with Nephi Johnson.

July 14, 1879, service curtailed to end at Pahreah.

Now I will go back and take the papers that are not official and put them with the official papers. I find that on the 27th of May, 1878, there was a contract sent by mail to Nephi Johnson for one trip, and the amount $1,127. The contractor's pay was $1,168. On the 10th of October, 1878, two additional trips were ordered, and $2,336 additional pay allowed. On the 11th of October, 1878, there was a letter from

Peck to Johnson, informing him of the two extra trips. Miner wrote that letter and signed Peck's name to it. On the 6th of November, 1878, there was a letter from Peck to Johnson. That letter is marked "31 D," and is found on page 1007 :

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 6, 1878.

NEPHI JOHNSON, Esq., Johnson, Utah :

DEAR SIR: Please get up strong petitions to have the schedule time on your route reduced to forty-eight hours. Get letters from the officers of the Territory asking the same. If it is granted I can pay you $5,000 a year for carrying the mail.

Yours, truly,

J. M. PECK.

That letter was written on Senate paper with the heading cut off, and it was written and signed by John R. Miner. On the 22d of January, 1879, the oath of Peck was made for thirty-three hours and seven trips. It is 6 D, and found on page 1007. Miner wrote the body of the oath, and Rerdell filled in the figures by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. On page 2242, at the top of the page, Rerdell says :

I can only give the conversation in substance.

Q. Give it in substance; and where you cannot recollect the language, give it in language that conveys the exact substance as near as you can remember it. And whenever I ask you for a conversation hereafter, give the whole of it.—A. He said to fill out one of Peck's affidavits for daily service or seven times a week, on the Toquerville and Adairville route, and to preserve the proportion of from 150 to 200 per cent. increase. I asked him to make the calculation. "Oh," he says, "you can make it. That is all you want to do—preserve the proportion."

On page 2278 he afterwards corrected that, saying he had made a mistake in the figures, and that the last amount should be 250 per cent. Further down on the same page, 2242 :

A. [After making a calculation.] I took the number of men and animals on the then schedule and added them together as one part. I then took the number of men and animals on the proposed schedule and added them together. Then I said, as the first is to the second so is one hundred to the answer, getting as near to the proportion as I could. It is very rarely that you can get it exactly.

Q. Did you at that time have any information in regard to the number of men and animals used on the existing schedule?—A. I did not, sir.

Q. Did you have any information of the number of men and animals that were necessary on the proposed schedule?—A. I did not. I only carried out the idea of the percentage of increase without any regard to the other. I did not know.

Q. You say that Mr. Dorsey told you to take one of Peck's blank affidavits. How many of these blanks did you have?—A. I had quite a number of them. I do not recollect the number

Stephen W. Dorsey says, on page 3945, in answer to this statement of Rerdell:

Q. Did you give Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West, in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

Q. Did you not direct him to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent.?—A. Oh, I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit?—A. My recollection is that I did not, but I don't know; it is possible that I might have done it.

Q. I have here the affidavit on route 41119, Toquerville to Adairville :

"HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

"SIR: The number of men and animals which are necessary to carry the mail on route 41119, seven times a week on the present schedule, is three (3) men and six (6) animals. The number necessary to carry the mail on said route on a schedule of thirty-three hours, seven times a week, is five (5) men and eighteen (18) animals.

"Respectfully,

"JOHN M. PECK."

"TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,
"County of Colfax, ss :

"Personally appeared before me the above John M. Peck, and being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above statement is true, as he verily believes. Sworn to and subscribed before me, a notary public in and for the county of Colfax, on the 22d day of January, A. D. 1879.

"J. S. TAYLOR,
"Notary Public."

Can you tell when that affidavit was filled up?—A. I cannot, sir.

Q. Have you no recollection upon that subject?—A. None whatever.

Q. Do you recollect when it was filed in the department?—A. I do not.

Q. It bears upon the back of it the indorsement of the department as having been filed June 25, 1879.—A. That is, probably, the correct date.

Q. Does that refresh your recollection?—A. No, sir.

Q. This is one of the routes that passed to you, is it not?—A. Yes, sir; and about which I know nothing at all scarcely.

Q. You know nothing about that route?—A. Hardly a thing.

Q. Where were you on June 25, 1879?—A. I was here.

Q. Did you not direct Rerdell to take the blank affidavits of Peck and fill them up on that route?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Have you any recollection upon the subject?—A. I have no recollection about it, but I am quite sure I did not direct him to do any such thing.

Q. You are quite sure you did not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If you have no recollection, why are you sure you did not?—A. I don't believe I did.

Q. I ask for your reason; why you are sure you did not if you have no recollection of it?—A. Because he had charge of that business entirely and attended to it entirely.

Q. But you gave him instructions from time to time, did you not?—A. I don't know that I did; I suppose I gave him general instructions, perhaps.

Q. On that affidavit there was an increase upon that route running up to $17,390 from $1,168; you got the benefit of that, did you not?—A. I have not seen the benefit yet.

Q. Whatever benefit there was you got, you drew the draft for the end of that quarter, did you not?

The WITNESS. The September quarter, 1879?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I think I did.

Q. Rerdell got no benefit from it, did he?—A. None that I know of.

Q. He was in on a salary, was he not?—A. Yes, but I think he got some benefit since.

Q. He got no contingent interest, did he?—A. I think he claimed one.

Q. On the increase of this route?—A. Yes.

Q. Toquerville to Adairville?—A. Yes.

Q. You did not give him any, did you?—A. The records of the department will show that.

Q. I am asking you what you paid him for his services?—A. I paid him $3,000 a year.

Q. And wherever he did any work on this matter it was done for your benefit, was it not, as your employé?—A. It ought to have been so done.

Q. It was so done entirely, was it not?—A. It ought to have been so.

Miner says, on page 4245 :

Q. The affidavit you said was in your handwriting, except the filling up?—A. Except the words I specified.

Q. Can you tell when Rerdell filled that up?—A. I don't know anything about it; I don't know that he did fill it up.

Q. You said just now that it looked like his handwriting; are you sure it is not yours?—A. I am sure that it is not mine.

Q. Is it not a fact that this is one of the blank affidavits turned over to S. W. Dorsey at the time of the division, and filled up by Rerdell afterwards?—A. It is not a fact that any affidavit, so far as I remember, was turned over to S. W. Dorsey at any time.

Q. Do you know who sent this affidavit to Peck?—A. I do not.

Q. You were managing the details of the business at that time?

The WITNESS. At what time?

Mr. MERRICK. January 22, 1879.

A. I was.

Q. You were managing the whole details of it?—A. I was.

Q. And to get these affidavits was part of your business, was it not?—A. I do not know that I ever sent an affidavit to Mr. Peck.

Q. You do not know that you ever sent one to him?—A. I do not.

Q. What did you do with the affidavit you wrote for Peck?—A. I don't know anything about it.

Q. You do not know anything about it?—A. I do not.

Q. This affidavit was acknowledged in the "Territory of New Mexico, county of Colfax." When you wrote it you intended it for Peck, did you not?—A. It would so appear.

Q. I think so. And although you wrote it, and think you wrote it for Peck, and although it was an affidavit to benefit the route in which you were interested together with three others, and you four alone, you cannot tell who sent it to Peck or whether you ever sent it to him or not?

Mr. HENKLE. Do you want to go into an argument?

A. I don't remember that piece of paper. If it did not happen to appear in my handwriting I should not know that I had ever seen it before. I have no recollection in regard to it.

Q. Was it a blank when you sent it to Peck?—A. I don't know.

Q. If Rerdell filled it up afterwards it must have been a blank, must it not?—A. I don't know anything about it, whether he filled it up afterwards or before, or at any time.

Q. Did you send it to him, after you wrote it, to put in the number of men and horses, and to send it back?—A. I don't think I ever gave it to him afterward or before; I don't remember anything about it.

Q. That is your memory about it?—A. I said I don't remember anything about it.

Q. Nothing at all about it?—A. I do not.

Remember that Miner wrote the body of the oath, and Rerdell filled in the figures. On the 8th of March, 1879, Vaile filed a subcontract, dated the 1st of April, 1878. Miner signed as attorney for Peck, and Rerdell signed as a witness. On the 12th of April, 1879, Rerdell wrote to Johnson to get up petitions, and not to use the exact language of the copy that he sent. On the 15th of April, 1879, there was a letter from Peck to Johnson to address all communications to Rerdell as agent, box 706. Miner wrote and signed the letter. On the 5th of May, 1879, Vaile's subcontract was withdrawn. Both the contractor and subcontractor had to sign the letter asking for the withdrawal. Rerdell wrote the letter of withdrawal, but Miner signed Peck's name to it. On the 5th of May, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to Johnson. The letter is 20 D, and found on page 980:

[M. C. Rerdell, agent, post-office box 706.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1879.

NEPHI JOHNSON, Esq., Johnson, Utah:

DEAR SIR: I beg to inclose you new contracts in duplicate for carrying mails between Toquerville and Adairville, which please sign and return to me here. This new contract becomes necessary on account of the dissolution of the firm, and for the further reason that all contracts made by this man in Colonel Peck's name are made without his knowledge or authority.

We do not propose to cut down your prices at all, but, on the contrary, to protect your interests. I personally guarantee that all obligations under this contract shall be fulfilled; and as to my responsibility I can refer you to Barbour Lewis, J. S. Black, and Hon. S. P. Luckey, of Salt Lake; also to Kountze Bros., bankers, New York City; Citizens' National Bank and Middleton & Co., bankers, Washington, D. C.; to Senators Jones and Sharon, of Nevada; Mr. Cannon, of Utah, &c.

And, in addition to this, you can file your new contract in the Post-Office Department and get your pay direct; and, if you wish, you may send your copy direct to the department, and not release the old contract until the department gives you notice that the United States will pay you the sums agreed upon in the new one.

Hoping to hear from you at once, I am, truly, yours,

S. W. DORSEY,
Assignee.

You can also inquire of M. Salisbury about me.

S. W. D.

On the 8th of May, 1879, Rerdell filed a subcontract, dated April 1, 1878, and being of the same date with the contract that was filed by Vaile. On the 15th of May, 1879, Rerdell withdrew his subcontract.

On the 23d of June, 1879, Rerdell wrote and signed Peck's name to a proposal to carry the mail seven trips a week on a reduced schedule. On the 25th of June, 1879, there was a petition filed asking for seven trips and a reduction of the time to forty-eight hours. That petition is 5 D. I think you have seen it before [handing 5 D to jury]. Rerdell wrote that petition and sent it to Johnson by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. Then there is another petition, 4 D. That petition was circulated in Utah by Mr. Johnson [handing 4 D to jury]. You will remember he testified on the stand that he did not put in the "seven;" that it was "six" when he sent it on here, but afterward, when he saw it here, it had been altered to seven. On the 25th of June, 1879, the oath of Peck was filed. In July, 1879, John W. Dorsey went out to Utah and had a talk with Nephi Johnson. On page 975 will be found what Johnson says about it:

Q. Go on with the conversation.—A. I received letters from John W. Dorsey & Co. I asked him who was John W. Dorsey & Co., and he said that it was John W. Dorsey. I inquired in relation to Stephen W. Dorsey. He said he was his brother, and he was an ex-Senator of the United States and was interested in the mail contracts. I asked him why he had sent the contract to me, and he said he was interested in them. That is the answer he made to it.

By Mr. DAVIDGE:

Q. When was that conversation?—A. It was in 1879: in July.

Mr. CARPENTER. We do not object to it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is the truth.

Mr. BLISS. Of course it is the truth. John W. Dorsey told the truth.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is the truth whether he told it or not.

Q. [Resuming.] What else? You say he sent that contract to you because he was interested in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything more said about the contract?—A. Yes; there was a good deal of conversation, but it is so long ago I cannot remember. He said they were very anxious to have me send in petitions to try and get more service, and he told me that if the petitions were sent he certainly would get the service.

Q. Was anything said about speed?—A. He wrote that clause at the bottom that "if the Post-Office Department shall order a reduction of the speed to four miles an hour and upwards they shall carry it without more pay," or something to that effect, and I would not sign it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It speaks for itself.

Mr. BLISS. He says he wrote that clause, and he would not sign it.

Mr. WILSON. Let us see what he wrote.

Mr. BLISS. It is in evidence, and has been read to the jury.

A. [Continuing.] He said if the Post-Office Department reduced the schedule to four miles and upwards I should carry it without additional pay. That is the way it read after he had written it, and I told him I would not sign it. That is the first time that I had any intimation that there was any prospect of reducing it to short of a forty-eight-hour schedule. I told him I would not sign it, and he said he would put a thousand dollars in there if I would, and I signed it. In case that the speed was reduced as stated here he was to give me a thousand dollars. That was placed in this clause, and then I signed it.

The COURT. How did you read that—"in case the speed was reduced?"

Mr. KER. In case the speed was reduced to four miles an hour.

Mr. MERRICK. It should be "time," not "speed."

The COURT. Manifestly speed is used there for time.

Mr. KER. [Reading:]

He said if the Post-Office Department reduced the schedule to four miles and upwards I should carry it without additional pay.

The COURT. And he would not agree to that.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

That is the way it read after he had written it, and I told him I would not sign it. That is the first time that I had any intimation that there was any prospect of reducing it to short of a forty-eight-hour schedule. I told him I would not sign it, and he said he would put a thousand dollars in there if I would, and I signed it. In case that the speed was reduced as stated—

It evidently means time—he was to give me a thousand dollars.

The COURT. It is manifest that he there uses the word “speed” in place of “time.”

Mr. KER. [Continuing to read:]

Q. [Resuming.] That was in July, 1879?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You said something about petitions. What was that?—A. Well, he told me to get up petitions and send in for more service.

Then on page 977, at the bottom:

Q. You stated that he said if he got petitions he thought they could get an increase?—

A. Yes; that is what he told me—he thought he would be able to get increases.

Q. Did he give any reason why he thought so?

The answer is on the next page, after an objection.

A. He said he thought they had influence enough to get them granted. That is about the talk there was about it—that they thought they could get them granted.

Q. And as you say, in a week or ten days afterwards you got notice of increase of speed and addition of trips?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To what time was that speed of which you got notice increased?—A. It was increased to thirty-three hours.

Q. Did you ever know of any petition being forwarded for an increase to thirty-three hours?—A. No, sir; I did not.

On the 9th of July, 1879, John W. Dorsey wrote a letter to Johnson, which is 19 D, and found on pages 973 and 974:

BEARDSLEY'S UNION DEPOT HOTEL, M. H. BEARDSLEY, PROPRIETOR,
Ogden, Utah, July 9, 1879.

N. JOHNSON, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: You will recollect that when I was writing the contract you said to me that I had better make Pahreah the terminus of the route, and I did so, but intended to reduce the pay in proportion when I came to make the figures, but I forgot all about it till I was within five miles of the railroad, when it all seemed to come to me at once.

I had no fears but that you would correct the mistake, judging from my acquaintance with you and your reputation where you are known. I saw Mr. Cannon Monday, and he indorsed the petitions, and spoke in the highest terms of you, and said he would do all he could to get the increase asked for. I have sent all the petitions on to Washington, but I do not suppose they will present them till they get the new contract, as they will see at once that there is a mistake, and will probably return the contract to you. I consider it a matter of form only, but perhaps they would be better satisfied if you would have your brother's and sons' names on as sureties, and witnessed in regular form. If it was my own contract I would not care anything about it. I put the amount just the same as it was in the contract which you returned, which you said was satisfactory. It brings it nearer prorating than any trade I have made since I left home, and I say nothing about the thousand dollars either, but I am satisfied, and hope you will make a good deal of money out of it. I hope you will execute it and mail it at once, as I want it in Washington by the time I arrive there, and you will oblige,

Yours, very truly,

J. W. DORSEY.

Now, gentlemen, you know that they wanted to force Nephi Johnson to make this subcontract, with a clause in it for expedition; you remember that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to Johnson that whoever it was that made the contract with him in the first place had no authority at all to do it. Then John W. Dorsey had this conversation with Johnson, which is not denied by Dorsey in any manner whatever. He says, in this letter, that he had taken the petitions and had them indorsed by

Mr. Cannon, and forwarded them to Washington, but that the petitions would not be put on file in the Post-Office Department until Johnson had forwarded the contract signed; in other words, that whoever was engineering it here on the part of the combination of these defendants would not allow the expedition to be granted until they made the proper terms with Nephi Johnson. In addition to that, gentlemen, bear in mind this fact, he writes to Johnson, and says, "I have made the terminus at Pahreah as you asked. Now, take your maps and look at them, and you will find that Adairville was the jumping-off place. There was nothing beyond it; no mail at all. By some means they arranged out in Utah that the route was to be cut off, by omitting Adairville and making Pahreah the terminus. I will show you when I get down to the balance of the orders that it came out just exactly as it was planned in Utah. On the 8th of July, 1879, Brady made an order. That order is 2 D, and found on page 949:

First. Increase service four trips per week from August 1, 1879, and allow contractor $4,672 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second. Reduce running time from sixty hours to thirty-three hours, from August 1, 1879, and allow contractor $12,718.22 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Third. Increase pay of subcontractor in like amount.

These four trips that were added made seven. It started with one, then he put it up two, and then put on the four trips, making the number of trips seven. Then he reduced the time from sixty hours to thirty-three hours.

The COURT. I do not see how two and four make seven. The first increase must have been an increase from one to three.

Mr. MERRICK. What was the first increase?

Mr. KER. Two trips.

Mr. MERRICK. And that added to the previous one made three.

The COURT. I think that Mr. Ker did not so state it.

Mr. KER. On October 10, 1878, two trips were added, making three; and afterwards four, making seven.

Brady testified in regard to this matter, on page 3435:

Q. I see the order calls for thirty-three hours; do you know how you arrived at that time?—A. I do not. The order probably states. This seems to be reducing the schedule time from sixty hours to thirty-three. I presume that thirty-three was arrived at by ascertaining that even at thirty-three hours, the running time would be about four miles an hour, night and day.

Q. I see that the petitions here ask for forty-eight hours?—A. Well, it would not have been much of an expedition, you know, from sixty hours down to forty-eight; that is to say, the running time would not have been.

Q. And you therefore disregarded the petitions and the application, did you, and made it thirty-three hours?—A. As I said before, when we expedited, we wanted it fast; four miles an hour was about as slow as would be wanted.

Q. How did you happen to alight upon thirty-three hours and not thirty-five or forty or thirty?—A. Four times thirty-three is about one hundred and thirty-two, isn't it? The route is one hundred and thirty-two miles long. That would be four miles an hour.

Again, on the next page:

Q. Still, you made the order for thirty-three hours?

Mr. WILSON. That is what he said.

A. Certainly, I made the order for thirty-three hours.

Q. And you made it upon this affidavit?—A. It seems so. You say that is the only one there.

Mr. BLISS. I have shown you all the papers and asked you to look for yourself.

The WITNESS. The affidavit is just as good, even if it was made in January, as if it had been made in June.

Mr. MERRICK. A singular coincidence.

The WITNESS. Very.

Then, on page 3555:

Mr. MERRICK. We will see how far each horse had to travel, according to that order.

The WITNESS. About the only figuring we did upon the route from Toquerville to Adairville was to ascertain the result that after the increase and expedition the service cost about $22.61 a mile, which was considerably less than our general rule.

Q. The affidavit upon that route states that to make seven times a week on the present schedule six animals would be needed, the distance being one hundred and thirty-two miles or two hundred and sixty-four miles both ways. You say you did not figure to see how many miles each horse would have to travel, did you?—A. I have no recollection that I did anything of that kind.

The COURT. It is not the miles each way, but the miles one way, according to the rule.

Mr. BLISS. That is as to the pay. I am asking as to how many miles each horse would have to travel.

Mr. WILSON. Colonel Bliss has got this thing down a good deal finer than that.

Mr. MERRICK. We want to show that the affidavit led necessarily to a perfectly absurd conclusion, which must have been apparent to any officer who would look at it.

The WITNESS. It led to $22.61 a mile, and that was comparatively cheap.

Mr. BLISS. It probably was cheap under you.

Mr. MERRICK. According to the rule you stated to Congress.

The WITNESS. It was cheap under anybody; even now.

Q. Did you make a calculation to see if it is not true that if that affidavit correctly stated the fact each animal named must have traveled twenty hours in each day. Did you examine the affidavit far enough to see whether it shows that?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you examine the affidavit far enough to see that if it were correct each man employed upon that route must have traveled forty hours in every twenty-four?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you examine the affidavit far enough to see that before expedition each animal would have to travel forty-four miles in a day?—A. I did not.

Q. And that after expedition each animal would only have to travel fourteen miles in a day?—A. I have no recollection of making any particular examination of that affidavit.

On the 10th of July, 1879, there was a second subcontract made with Nephi Johnson. John W. Dorsey wrote the body of it; Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to it; Rerdell signed as a witness; Stephen W. Dorsey guaranteed the subcontract.

On the 10th of July, 1879, the same day, Rerdell wrote to Johnson notifying him of the increase of trips and expedition.

Then, on the 14th of July, 1879, service was curtailed to end Pahreah and one month's extra pay allowed. Remember, gentlemen, Dorsey had in the contract he made with Johnson agreed that the service was to end at Pahreah; he then agreed it should be done, and here on the 10th of July it is done. And I ask you to remember, in this connection, that if it were necessary to drop Adairville off the route at all, would it not have been better for the United States if this place had been dropped off before Brady allowed his expedition? Because he allowed expedition up to Adairville and gave one month's extra pay. By keeping on Adairville they received on expedition a good deal more than they otherwise would have received.

On the 3d of April, 1880, Rerdell wrote to Johnson (24 D, found at page 982): It seems that Johnson was not satisfied with the expedition, and could not make the time, and he got Mr. Cannon, the Delegate here, to see about it and try to have the time put back. He never asked for thirty-three hours.

[M. C. Rerdell, agent, box 706.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1880.

NEPHI JOHNSON,

Johnson, Kane County, Utah:

DEAR SIR: We have concluded to increase your pay $1,556 per annum, in order to meet the objections you have made in regard to route 41120.

This action is voluntary on our part, and is intended to cover all losses on account of failure of trips or loss of time, and in future you must be expected to bear all fines and deductions. We make this allowance in order to have the service remain as it now exists, as I find that you have been writing letters to your Delegate asking to have the schedule time changed to what it was originally. If the schedule time on this route were changed back to where it formerly was, at your pay, we would lose considerably. As it is we have, of course, a small profit.

If the schedule time were changed, we certainly would endeavor to have it put back to once a week.

Hoping that you will perform the service in the future so as to avoid all fines and deductions, and further, that you will write to your Delegate asking him to withdraw all objections as to the present schedule,

I am, very truly,

M. C. RERDELL.

Then, on the 9th of May, 1880, Rerdell wrote again [25 D, page 988:]

[M. C. Rerdell, agent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1880.

NEPHI JOHNSON, Johnson, Utah:

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 20th ult. to hand. In reply I have to say that your increased pay, which in my letter of April 3 I proposed to give, was, of course, intended to commence from January 1, 1880. As that seems to be satisfactory to you, I suppose there will be no more trouble between you and me in regard to your compensation. I would like you to write at once to Mr. Cannon, asking him to withdraw his objection to the present schedule as proposed in your letter.

So far as a change of the schedule of arrivals and departures is concerned, that is entirely with you and the postmasters at the terminal offices. I inclose a blank for you and the postmasters to agree upon, leaving the running time, of course, as it is now. Please return this to me at the earliest moment, and I will see that the change is altered at the department.

Very truly,

M. C. RERDELL.

Now, gentlemen, I have called your attention to the fact that these petitions all asked for forty-eight hours, and that the order was for thirty-three. If you go back to the oath, which you will find was made on the 22d of January, 1879, you will see that "seven times" is written in, and calling for thirty-three hours. In other words, these petitions were circulated at a time subsequent to that; and the oath, if it were the correct date, was previously sworn to in January. But Rerdell says that he filled in the figures afterwards, at the direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. And as this oath is one of the overt acts, I call your attention to it, in order that you may observe it. If you will turn to the back of that oath you will find that it is marked as filed on the 25th day of June, 1879. Gentlemen, that is the date that is laid in the bill of indictment as the date upon which this oath was put in the department. When our friends upon the opposite side come to comment upon the dates and say, "Why, that is not the date, and that is not the date," then just ask them to show the papers and the jacket upon which the order was made, and see if they do not go together. That paper was found in this jacket, and was the paper upon which the order was based, and it has the post-office mark upon it of June 25, 1879, the very date that is laid in the bill of indictment.

The next is the 8th of July, 1879. There it is, Mr. Foreman, the correct date of the order, and in blue pencil across the order: "Do this.—Brady." There can be no mistake about that. That also is the correct date laid in the bill of indictment.

On this route Vaile received the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey and Bosler drew pay, and on the 4th of February, 1880, Rerdell, as subcontractor, drew the pay.

Let us analyze the oath. The oath was: On the present schedule three men and six animals, which, of course, make nine; the proposed schedule, five men and eighteen animals, which, of course, make twenty-three. Therefore they asked for the difference between nine and twenty-three, which is fourteen. Johnson says: "On the former schedule I carried it with two men and six animals," making eight; "when the trips were increased to seven, I used seven men and fifteen animals." Fifteen and seven are twenty-two. Dorsey's oath called for twenty-three. But Johnson used these men and animals not to carry the mail alone, but to carry mail, freight, and passengers. He never tried to see what number of men and horses it would actually require to carry the mail alone.

The original pay upon this route was $1,168; it was increased to $19,726.22. The pay of Johnson, under his second subcontract, when their pay had been increased to the fullest extent, was $8,444. And, gentlemen, Rerdell wrote that they "would have a small profit." Their "small profit" upon this route was $11,282.22. If it was a "small profit" it was a very nice one.

The next is the productiveness, because increases are to be made "with due regard to productiveness." In 1879, from every office on the route, the total receipts were $1,586.47. Exclude Toquerville, and the entire proceeds were $767.76. In 1880 the entire proceeds were $1,042.57; throw off the large office, and the entire receipts were $386.50. Then in 1881 the entire proceeds were $1,094.07; and throwing off the larger office, the proceeds were $497.46—$497.46 to carry that mail! Brady ordered the pay on this route to be increased from the sum of $1,168 up to $19,726.22, when he knew, or could have known from the contract on file, that it was being carried for $8,444, and, by calculating, that the contractor here in Washington was getting a nice profit of $11,282.22. You know, gentlemen, that in making this calculation of what the receipts were it is not fair to take the offices that are supplied upon other routes, because they derive their revenues from other sources. But still, if we were to take the entire revenue derived from those offices from any and all sources in 1881, at the time he made the large one (of course it was after the time he made his large increase), the total revenue was $1,094.07.

Now, I told you about the decrease in population. Just let me show you the figures in this case, to show that I am right in what I say. We begin in 1879. The receipts upon this route, throwing off the large office, were $767.76. In 1880 the total receipts were $386.50. It ran down from $767.76 to $386.50. Then, again, it went up a little in 1881, and became $497.46. So that you see increase and expedition did not amount to much, as far as revenues were concerned and allowing people facilities for writing and receiving their letters.

NO. 38150, SAGUACHE TO LAKE CITY, COLORADO.

[Maps shown to jury.]

That takes in two routes, gentlemen. This route is ninety-five miles long; three trips, thirty-six hours. John R. Miner was the contractor; pay, $3,426. John W. Dorsey witnessed the contract.

September 18, 1878, a subcontract was made with J. L. Sanderson. This subcontract was not put upon file until the 11th of October, 1881.

On the 19th of September, 1878, there was an oath of Sanderson, as subcontractor, filed in the office, for a schedule of twenty-four hours. In that oath he mentions no trips at all, but says "schedule, twenty-four hours." You remember that Sanderson was apparently not a subcontractor, and had no more to do with the route than you or I had. He was not in this combination; his name was not mentioned in the papers, and yet his oath as subcontractor is accepted and filed.

On the 20th of September, 1878, Brady ordered:

From October 1, 1878, increase service four trips and allow contractor $4,568 per annum additional.

Reduce the time from thirty-six to twenty-four hours and allow contractor $15,437.12 per annum additional.

On the 1st of October, 1878, Brady ordered a curtailment of service to Barnum, decreasing twenty-one miles, and allowed one month's extra pay.

On the 26th of July, 1880, the Postmaster-General ordered a reduction of service to three trips a week, and Brady reduced service to three trips a week, and allowed one month's extra pay.

August 24, 1880, Brady ordered:

From September 1, 1880, increase service to seven trips from Powderhorn to Barnum, and allow contractor $987.57 per annum additional pay.

August 11, 1881, the error in the calculation was corrected.

October 11, 1881, the subcontract of J. L. Sanderson was filed. The increase in this case was made upon one petition and a letter from H. M. Teller. It was run up from the original price, $3,426, for three trips, until it reached the sum of $20,005.12. Now, gentlemen, there was a mistake made in the calculation on this route. The calculation for expedition was $15,437.12; it should have been $11,068.02, making a difference against the Government, and in favor of the contractor and subcontractor of $4,368.12. And this mistake ran along—was never corrected, was never inquired into—nothing was done until it was stirred up in this investigation. On the 11th of August, 1881, the error in the calculation was corrected. They restated the account, made the contractor and subcontractor repay the Government the amount of money that had been taken from it. When we came to go over the figures on these routes we had our own calculations made, and found out this mistake. It was one of Mr. Turner's errors. But I do not want to dwell upon this route. I simply want to call your attention to that mistake. I ask you to reflect upon it and see if you cannot agree with me that the story that Rerdell told was the correct story. It was not a question of how many men and animals were required, but it was a question of how much money was to be allowed for each increase; and then the contractor, or subcontractor, or the agent was to make the calculation and fill in the number of men and animals to suit the amount of money.

Mr. WILSON. Do you make any point of that mistake?

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. KER. Judge Wilson wants to know if I make any point of that mistake. Yes, undoubtedly. The point I make is the theory of the prosecution—that the calculation of the number of men and animals did not amount to a row of pins. Brady and his coconspirators, Dorsey, Vaile, Miner, and the rest of them, agreed upon the sum that was to be allowed; and then, having agreed upon that sum, they told Rerdell, or some person who was to make the calculation, "You calculate it up so that it will be 250 per cent. of an increase." And then the increase was made; and, as Rerdell says, "We could not often make it hit right." They could not often bring it exactly the way they wanted it.

This was Miner's route. Of course I do not know what the arrangement was with Sanderson. We did not go into that; the thing was too small. We had plenty of other material to work upon, and we did not care about following it up any further. The subcontract was given to Sanderson for the entire term, but I presume it was not given to him for nothing, because Mr. Miner furnished Mr. Sanderson with the material to go on to the end of the contract term. Mr. Miner, being the contractor upon the route, furnished Sanderson with the drafts and so on to draw his pay, so that Sanderson would have no trouble.

Take this route in connection with the next one, which is—

NO. 38152, OURAY TO LOS PINOS, COLORADO.

The distance was twenty-five miles. There was one trip a week in twelve hours. John W. Dorsey was the contractor, and the pay was $348.

On the 5th of February, 1878, Postmaster Ruggles, of Lake City, wrote to Brady, asking to have the mail go by the way of Barnum and Los Pinos to Ouray. Gentlemen, you will see down here [pointing on the map] is Lake City; over here is Ouray. There is a very short space between Ouray and Lake City. In that space are high mountains that cannot be crossed, in the winter time especially, and very seldom at all. Therefore, practically, this space was of such a character that the carrier could never get across it. The route that we are looking at runs from Ouray up to Los Pinos. This is the route upon which double service was performed. This combination had the route running down here, and the two routes ran together. There was one mail-bag and one carrier, and yet they got pay for the double service upon the one route. 21 M, page 1782:

LAKE CITY, COLO., February 5, 1878.

THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: Your communication of January 28 came to hand to-day, and I hasten to reply. Route No. 38146, from Garland, via Lake City, to Ouray, going from Lake City to Sherman, Burrows Park, Tellurium, Animas Forks, Mineral Point, to Ouray, is impracticable, for this reason: it is impossible for an animal to go beyond Burrows Park this winter, and this one is very mild so far. Last winter they had to snow-shoe from Sherman. The mail would have to be carried on snow-shoes from Sherman to about five miles beyond Mineral Point on snow-shoes. Only about fifteen miles of the distance could be carried the year around on a stage or pack animal; would have to snow-shoe (the mail that leaves this office for Ouray is a very heavy one) from twenty to thirty miles every winter, and winter is our longest season here. But if the mail was carried from Lake City to Barnum and from Barnum to Los Pinos, Hot Springs, and Ouray, it would be a longer route, but would be the most practicable route for all seasons of the year.

It can be carried on a stage the year around this way.

Respectfully,

HENRY D. RUGGLES, P. M.

On the 7th of February, 1878, Post-Office Inspector Charles Adams wrote a letter to Brady [20 M, page 1781]:

FEBRUARY 7, 1878.

HON. SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,

Contract Division, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to mail route No. 38145, as advertised, to invite proposals for contracts to take effect on July 1, proximo.

That portion of the route between Lake City, Colo., and Ouray, via Burrows Park and Mineral Point, cannot possibly be served during eight months of the year, on account of natural difficulties to be encountered, deep snows and difficult trails over the mountains, unless by snow-shoe service, which would be unreliable, costly, and unsatisfactory to the people.

A good wagon road, open all the year from Lake City, via Barnum, to Ouray, although somewhat longer, is the commonly traveled route on which the mail at present is being carried regularly and satisfactorily, and this route should by all means be designated as the proper mail route for the extreme western portion of Colorado.

Service on the route from Lake City, via Sherman, Burrows Park, Tellurium, Animas Forks, and Eureka, to Howardsville, should be three times a week in winter, and would give ample mail facilities to the people; a branch route from Animas Forks to Ouray, via Mineral Point, should be maintained as it is at present, but the mail route to Ouray should be via Barnum.

The distance from Garland to Ouray is about two hundred and fifty miles, and I would recommend that proposals in accordance with the above recommendations be advertised specially and at once, so that the service be not interrupted.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES ADAMS,
Special Agent, Post-Office Department.

That was February 7, 1878. Gentlemen, the route referred to by this post-office inspector was this [pointing on the map]: Down here is Garland. This was the route that was carried by Sanderson, and this route ran over here, up this way to Lake City. See, there is a mark on the map. Then it crosses over from Lake City to Ouray. The Post-Office inspector wanted them to readvertise this route and make the route run up this way and down that way [indicating]—the only traveled road, the only way they could reach Ouray, and that would give satisfactory service. But instead of doing that they allowed the contract to be signed and go into effect, the contract on both those routes being held by John W. Dorsey.

On the 20th of September, 1878, Brady ordered temporary service by J. L. Sanderson from Barnum to Ouray, ninety miles, three trips a week, from October 1, 1878, to March 31, 1879, at $675 per annum.

September 30, 1878, a letter came from Sanderson to Brady suggesting that Barnum be placed upon that route. Sanderson wrote to Brady, and told him that the only way to do would be to put the route just as it had been stated by the Post-Office inspector.

On the 1st of October, 1878, Brady made an order on route 38146, Garland to Ouray, the one that I have mentioned, running up that way. [Indicating:]

Change service to embrace Barnum between Lake City and Ouray, increasing one hundred and ten miles, and allow $7,699.65 per annum additional pay.

Reduce the time from seventy-two to thirty-six hours from Lake City to Barnum, and allow $15,994.77 additional.

This gave $23,694.42 for one hundred and ten miles, while the former pay was only $19,000. Brady, by his judicious order, and fair, honest management of these routes (when it came to the interest of the sub-contracts and the people who were in combination with him), made an order by which the Government lost over $4,000 for that service; whereas, if he had held on to the old contract, he would have saved the $4,000 to the Government.

On the 25th of January, 1879, there was a letter addressed by John W. Dorsey to the postmaster at Los Pinos, ordering that postmaster to deliver the mail to J. L. Sanderson. Miner wrote the letter and signed the name of John W. Dorsey.

On the 27th of January, 1879, a letter from McDonald, postmaster at Los Pinos, was received, stating that route 38152 was discontinued. That is the route I am speaking of, the one that ran down here [pointing on the map], the double route; he wrote and said, "I have received a letter from John W. Dorsey to deliver the mail; the route is discontinued." He wrote that to the department.

On the 8th of February, 1879, Barlow & Sanderson sent a letter to Postmaster McDonald to make out duplicate certificates. That is 5 M, and is on page 1774:

OFFICE OF BARLOW & SANDERSON, STAGE AND EXPRESS LINE, Pueblo, February 8, 1879.

A. J. McDONALD, Esq.,
Postmaster, Los Pinos :

DEAR SIR: I am just in receipt of your welcome letter of January 27th. Service on route 38152, Los Pinos to Ouray, has never been discontinued, and since daily service has been performed via Los Pinos to Ouray, on route 38146, we have been transporting the mail for both routes. L. Voorhees is contractor on route 38146, and we are subcontractors.

We are also subcontractors on route 38152, and we would like you to make out in duplicate certificates certifying that contractor on route No. 38152 transported mail regularly and according to schedule for quarter ending December 31, 1878, and send duplicate to us here and original to Post-Office Department. By attending to this as soon as possible you will oblige us.

Truly yours,

BARLOW AND SANDERSON.

At that time Barlow & Sanderson were coming up from Garland to Lake City, and from Lake City around by Barnum to Los Pinos and then to Ouray, and they wanted the postmaster to certify that from Los Pinos down to Ouray there were two mails, when in point of fact there was only one.

On the 18th of March, 1879, Postmaster McDonald wrote to Brady (2 M, page 1773):

LOS PINOS, GUNNISON COUNTY, COLORADO,
18th March, 1879.

CONTRACT OFFICE, INSPECTION DIVISION, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report regarding the matter of the transportation of the mails on route No. 38152 :

"The registers of arrivals and departures" sent by me to the department show that the mail was regularly carried on this route up to the 12th day of October, 1878. At this date a daily mail was established (viz, route No. 38146) which stopped at this office twice every day, once on its way from Lake City to Ouray, and once on its way from Ouray to Lake City. Seeing that the route No. 38152 was now quite superfluous I very naturally supposed that it was discontinued. Accordingly I ceased sending in the "registers of arrival and departure" until called upon by the department to render them. I then reported that no mail had been carried on the route, and I understand that the postmaster at Ouray, Colo., made a similar report, showing that he also was of opinion that the route in question had been discontinued.

He then goes on to recite the letters that he received :

I respectfully request instructions as to whether or not my reports of arrival and departures for the months of November and December, 1878, shall be corrected, and whether or not I am required to submit a report for the month of January, 1879.

In this connection I would respectfully state that this being merely a way station, no record of time of arrival and departure on route No. 38146 has been kept by me.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. J. McDONALD,
Postmaster.

Now, gentlemen, you have the secret of it. One route going up from Garland was a daily mail, and when it got to Los Pinos the postmaster was not obliged to send a mail bill, because the mail bills come from the offices of arrival and departure, and therefore, that being daily mail, the postmaster at Los Pinos never made the report of arrivals and departures ; but he did make a report of the weekly mail that was carried there on route 38152, the one that is mentioned in this indictment; and, acting upon that weekly report, they were drawing their pay right straight along until the postmaster got orders to correct the report; then these letters that were sent from Barlow and Sanderson, asking him to make out duplicates, were communicated to the department.

Away back in January, 1879, Brady had it brought home to his attention—beginning in March, 1878, and then in January, 1879, and so on. But he took no action until the 3d of August, 1880, when he made an order:

From August 15, 1880, discontinue the service and allow the contractor one month's extra pay.

Now, gentlemen, the discontinuance of service was a proper order that ought to have been put in force about two years before it was put in force; but our claim is that he had no right to allow these people one month's extra pay when he knew that they had not performed the service. The total pay that was received upon this route was $1,190, for work that they never performed.

Postmaster Dunbar, of Ouray, says there was daily mail; they only sent one pouch to Lake City; that went over route 38146 every day. This was the only mail that was sent over both routes.

There is no use in dwelling any longer upon this route.

No. 44155, THE DALLES TO BAKER CITY, OREGON.

[Maps shown to jury.]

Gentlemen, let me explain this map to you, because this is the key to two other routes we will take up. You see this route starts at The Dalles and goes along to Baker City. Over here you will find Canyon City. Canyon City to Camp McDermitt is another route that will be taken up. Then along further over to your left you find Bridge Creek. Eugene City to Bridge Creek is another route. So that these two routes I name—Canyon City and Bridge Creek—both end upon this route, and therefore this one (The Dalles to Baker City) was the route upon which mail coming up from those others was distributed.

This is one of the routes that Moore operated upon. There were two trips a week; the time was one hundred and twenty hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $8,288. Miner wrote the body of the proposal. The oath was taken in blank. Stephen W. Dorsey reduced the estimate and fixed the price upon the route at the beginning.

I will here recall to your attention the fact that Boone prepared some blanks for subcontracts, and the instructions that Moore received from Stephen W. Dorsey to assure the subcontractors that the service would be increased and expedited, and also the instructions that Miner gave to Moore to get up petitions for increase and change the headings as much as he could and leave a space between the heading and the names in case the headings should want to be changed. The official orders are:

July 1, 1878, Postmistress Wilson sent a letter.

September 18, Peck's oath was signed.

October 1, Vaile filed a subcontract.

October 21, letter of Peck—proposal.

October 28, Peck's oath filed.

October 29, Brady made an order for increase and expedition.

January 17, 1879, order to increase pay of subcontractor.

June 27, 1879, Brady made order for increase.

April 17, 1880, Postmaster-General ordered service reduced.

July 16, 1880, Brady ordered the service increased.

Before going into the details of the orders let me remind you of the testimony that was given in this case, that there never was a through mail from The Dalles to Baker City. The mail was sent over the route up the railroad, as you see, by way of Pendleton.

The first is the letter of July 1, 1878, from Postmistress Wilson, who wrote stating that she had employed temporary service. There was no service on the route at that time.

Then, in July, Moore made a subcontract with a man named Hutchinson, who, it seems, afterwards threw up this subcontract.

On the 8th of July, Clark S. Pierce commenced to carry the mail for Emil Schutz. You will remember that Moore said to Schutz that if he would get "one or two original petitions, they would doctor them up and get as many as they wanted." Schutz testified to that on the stand. Moore was acting under the instructions he had received.

September 18, 1878, there was an oath signed by Peck, for thirty-two hours, and in that oath there are no trips mentioned. It is 14 L. [14 L shown to jury.] Miner wrote all that part but the signature of Peck. On page 4188 he gives his testimony in regard to it:

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. What is the paper 14 L?—A. The affidavit on The Dalles and Baker City route.

Q. In whose handwriting is it?—A. It is all in my handwriting, except the date, which appears to be in the same as the notary public's, and the signatures. The signatures are Peck's and Taylor's.

On page 4189 he says:

Q. Was the paper 14 L all written at the same time?—A. From the appearance of the paper it was not all written at the same time, though there may have been a lapse of only fifteen minutes between the writing of one part of it and another.

Q. Was it filled up before it was sworn to?—A. So far as I remember, it was.

On page 4252, upon cross-examination:

Q. There is a third affidavit which is dated the 18th of September (14 L). Look at that and tell me if you recognize that. That is the third one, and it makes a small batch?—A. That is in my handwriting, except the signatures and the date in the jurat.

The jurat is that portion of it where the notary public states that he was sworn.

Q. All of it in your handwriting?—A. All except the signatures and the date of the jurat.

Q. Here appear to be three affidavits signed by Peck on the 18th of September, 1878, that being the date at the top. Do you recollect sending those three affidavits out to Peck?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you recollect nothing about those three affidavits?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you recollect anything about the consequence of filing those three affidavits?—A. I remember that they were increased.

Q. On those affidavits?—A. I do not know.

Q. You got them up for the purpose of an increase, did you not?—A. I do not remember whether I did or not, but—

Q. [Interposing.] For what purpose did you get them up?

The WITNESS. Let me finish, please.

Mr. MERRICK. Go on and finish.

A. But I did get them up for that purpose, I should say.

Q. And that design?—A. Yes.

Q. How much increase did you get, some $40,000 to $50,000?—A. I don't remember now.

Q. And you do not recollect anything about how you got them up?—A. I do not.

Q. Nor when you got them up?—A. I do not.

Q. Nor where?—A. I should think I got them up here; I was here.

Q. You do not recollect?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not recollect of sending them to Peck?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not recollect of them coming back from Peck?—A. I do not.

Miner says that he wrote this last part of it [indicating]; the other part is the jurat; but this part, above the signature of John M. Peck, he wrote here in Washington; he did not remember where he sent it. In his former answers he had said he sent it, but he could "not remember the time."

Miner was called upon to explain how it was in regard to the dates. At the head it is dated September 18, 1878, and when you come down here to where the notary public puts in his figures, the notary says, "On this 18th day of September." We could not get Mr. Miner to give us an explanation of how it was that an oath written in Washington would go away down to Chico Springs and reach there in time to be sworn to on the same day. I do not know how many days it takes to reach Chico Springs, but I suppose it takes at least five or six. But Miner never could explain that point to us. He says he wrote it, and that is about all he knew about it.

On the 1st of October, 1878, Vaile filed his subcontract, dated July 1, 1878. Miner signed the subcontract as attorney for Peck.

October 21, 1878, there was a letter from Peck offering to carry the mail three trips, seventy-two hours, for $18,648 per annum. Miner wrote and signed the offer. This is on the 21st of October, 1878.

Then, on the 28th of October, 1878, the oath, according to the time marked on there in red ink, was filed.

On the 29th of October, the next day, Brady ordered, 12 L, page 1669:

First. Increase service one trip per week from November 15, 1878, and allow contractor $4,144 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second. Reduce schedule time from one hundred and twenty hours to seventy-two hours from November 15, 1878, and allow contractor $18,648 per annum additional pay, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement.

BRADY.

On the 17th of January, 1879, Brady ordered:

Increase the pay of the subcontractor—

That is, Vaile—

in like amount.

On the 23d of April, 1879, there is a petition for daily service. Now, gentlemen, you will remember that this order for increase was made in October, 1878. You will remember that after Vaile came here and signed his contract with these people, in October, 1878, dating it back in August, immediately they went to work, and on some of these routes there were increases made right away. Here is one of them that was increased in October, 1878. For expedition alone there was allowed to the contractors $18,648 per annum additional. I suppose this allowance was given to help them to put on the service, because they took the drafts up and negotiated them at the German-American National Bank, and got the money upon them away in advance. On the 23d of April, 1879, as I told you, this petition for daily service was sent in. Here it is, gentlemen, 23 L [exhibiting petition to jury]. Miner wrote that petition. The signatures upon that petition are those of officers in the Twenty-third Infantry. Mr. Fisk, who was a carrier on this route, says, "I do not recognize a name; there was not a soldier on the route nearer than Camp Harney." That was down on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route. Postmaster Hall, at Canyon City, says, "I do not recognize a name on that petition." You see how it was gotten up. It was gotten up just as Moore told you he was to get them up. There is a space between the names and the body of the petition. Moore said Miner gave him those instructions. Miner said that what Moore told you was not true. Here is a petition in John R. Miner's own handwriting, fixed up exactly as he told Mr. Moore to fix petitions up. The names are pasted on. Not one of those persons resided on the route. We attempted to show you where the people were who signed that petition, but the offer was ruled out. We brought witnesses upon that route to show that there was no such infantry there at all. Mr. McBean, who lives on the route, says, "I do not know a name on that petition; I cannot recognize one of them." Emil Schutz, who was the carrier on the route, says, "I have lived on the route since 1862, but I do not know a name on that petition." Gentlemen, the route having been started with two trips, on October 29, 1878, Brady added one trip, making three, and expedited the schedule. Afterwards this petition from soldiers was sent in by Miner. Then, on the 27th of June, 1879, Brady ordered, 27 L, page 1677:

Increase service four trips per week from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $41,440 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Brady testifies in regard to this order, beginning at the bottom of page 3422:

Q. Do you remember the route from The Dalles to Baker City?—A. I do.

Q. Do you remember whether you made any orders on that route for increase or expedition?—A. Yes, sir; I undoubtedly did. I made orders on almost all the routes in the country; ten thousand, more or less.

Q. For increase and expedition?—A. Orders of some kind.

Q. By the terms of the contract two trips were required at $4,144 per trip, which would have made for six trips $24,864. If you ordered three trips and expedition at an expense of $31,000, thereby costing the Government $6,000 more than it would have cost for six trips a week, is your answer as to your reason for doing that the same as on the other routes?—A. Certainly. It seems to me ridiculous to think that a slow service six times a week would be better than a three-times-a-week service upon a fast schedule.

Q. I merely want to get at what influenced you.—A. And especially if the people wanted it that way.

Q. You say especially if the people wanted it. How did you judge whether the people wanted it?—A. By the petitions and the representations of their members of Congress.

Q. You assumed that the petitions were the free expression of the wishes of the people, did you?—A. I did.

Q. You assumed that the expressions of Members of Congress and Senators were the expressions of their unbiased judgment, did you?—A. I did. I could not assume anything else.

You see the form of the question that was put to him. If he had made this route six trips a week on the schedule that it was advertised at, he would have had to pay $24,864. Instead of doing that, he made it three trips a week and put on expedition, and when he put on the expedition it amounted to $31,000. If he had given them six trips, the cost would have been $24,864 and by that means he would have saved to the Government $6,000 a year. By the order of June 27, 1879, after he had made the order in October, putting it up to over $31,000 just for the four trips alone, he allowed the contractors $41,440, when he could have had six trips for $24,000. On the 17th of April, 1880, the Postmaster-General ordered the service reduced one trip. There was no reason given why it was to be reduced one trip, but that was about the time, or a little after the time, that they had the quarrel with Congress, or was after Congress had been investigating Brady orders; but promptly on the 16th of July, 1880, Brady made an order, from August 1, 1880, to increase the service to seven trips. After the Postmaster-General took off one trip, Brady promptly restored the trip again. In the jacket containing the order to restore this trip there is a single paper. The jacket is 19 F. It is worth looking at to see whether there is not something on it. Yes ; there is an explanation on it :

Under date of October 29, 1878, the service on this route was increased to seven trips per week in order to enable the department to place in operation temporary service, and to reduce the expenditure within the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. The service on this route was, under date of April 17, 1880, reduced to six trips per week. (See petitions and recommendations on file asking for daily service.)

From August 1, 1880, increase service to seven trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $10,360 per annum, being pro rata.

BRADY.

Gentlemen, the numerous petitions that were inclosed in this jacket amounted to a single slip of paper. That single slip contains these words :

TURNER: Restore this route to a daily.

BRADY.

You know he had his moods, and when he found that the Postmaster-General had interfered with him and cut off one trip a week he was in the imperative mood and he said :

TURNER: Restore this route to a daily.

I told you that there was no through mail on this route at all. It went by way of Pendleton. The mail consisted of two locked pouches, and it did not average over eighty or ninety pounds from Baker City, and twenty pounds the other way. The Canyon City mail went to Baker City. The Bridge Creek mail went up to The Dalles. Between the two there was nothing done. Schutz says, "I circulated petitions. There is no trouble in getting signers when you don't want any money." Mr. McBean says, "I signed that petition, 24 L." That is not the one I showed you. "I do not know that I read it. I would sign one to blow a horn." I am not able to tell you exactly the number of men and horses that were required on this route from the fact that they had to be divided up and cut in two because of different contracts. Joseph P. Masterson says he "carried the mail from The Dalles to Canyon City three trips from November, 1878, to July, 1879." He "used three men and thirty-four horses. In the spring two more horses were added. It took two days to make the trip." The time was one hundred and twenty hours, and it was reduced to seventy-two. The service was increased in July to seven trips. "I then drove from The Dalles to Cross Hollow in fourteen hours, and used two drivers and fourteen horses. I carried freight and passengers." John M. Fisk carried the mail from Canyon City to Baker City from September 5, 1878, to April 15, 1879. It took two days to make the trip. He afterwards carried the mail thirty-five miles further to South Fork. He carried freight and passengers. The service was increased to three trips. He used fourteen horses and two men altogether. He made three trips with the same number of horses that he used to make two.

On this route Vaile drew the pay. He drew it upon orders signed by Peck. There was one of them on the 30th of September, 1881. That, according to the testimony, was after Peck had died, which shows conclusively the truth of the statement made, that they furnished each other with material with which to work when they made this apparent division. The original pay was $8,288. It was increased from that amount to $72,520. Owing to the way in which it was carried, and the subcontracts not being on file, we were unable to show you what they actually paid for carrying the mail, but we do know that it was jumped from $8,288 a year up to $72,520. In order to show why it should have been increased in that way, and whether Mr. Brady obeyed the law as to productiveness, I will give you the total revenues from the route. In 1879 the total revenue of every office on the route was $3,716.91. Taking off The Dalles and Baker City, that were on the railroad and were supplied in other ways, the total revenue on the route was $629.62. In 1880 the total revenue on the route was $5,638.35. Taking off the railroad towns, the total revenue was $685.48. In 1881 the revenue of all the offices was $6,257.65. Taking off the railroad offices the total amount was $601.64. It had come down in 1881 from what it had been in 1880. In 1880 it was $685.48. In 1881 it was $601.64. In 1881, taking all the offices, the total revenue was $6,257.65 for the mail that was carried over the route. The amount received from the offices that were actually benefited by the mail going over it was $601.64. And yet Brady made orders allowing his coconspirators $72,520 for this service.

There are overt acts on this route. The petition that I have shown you, which the testimony shows to have been written by Miner, and contains the names of people not residing on that route, I submit to you, gentlemen, is proved beyond dispute. On the 27th of June, 1879, Brady ordered an increase of four trips. There is the order, Mr. Foreman. [Exhibiting order.] It bears the date mentioned in the indictment. In that jacket was this petition that I have shown you, written by Miner. The next is the order restoring the route from six trips to seven. That is dated the 16th of July, 1880. That is the time Brady had his trouble with the Postmaster-General. This was Peck's route, but on this route you have Miner writing a proposal, Miner writing the affidavit, Miner writing a false petition, Stephen W. Dorsey reducing the estimate, and Vaile drawing the pay for the entire term, while Brady made the orders.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

ROUTE 44140, EUGENE CITY TO BRIDGE CREEK, OREGON.

Mr. KER. This was one of the routes that Dorsey took. It was two hundred and seven miles long, and there was one trip a week in one hundred and twenty-one hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $2,468. Miner wrote the body of the proposal. John W. Dorsey wrote in two places "District of Columbia." Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name in two places. The official orders are:

January 22, 1879, date of the oath of Peck.

April 21, 1879, order to curtail the service.

May 5, 1879, letter of Peck to change address.

May 10, 1879, letters addressed to Dorsey.

May 10, 1879, petitions signed by people in Eugene City.

May 23, 1879, letter from Stephen W. Dorsey to Brady.

May 24, 1879, Peck's oath filed.

May 24, 1879, letter from Peck transmitting oath.

June 26, 1879, order for increase and expedition.

October 23, 1879, letter of Peck to Brady.

October 24, 1879, notice of change of pay to subcontractor.

November 5, 1880, warrant to Bosler.

November 15, 1880, letter of Peck to Brady.

November 15, 1880, another letter of Peck to Brady.

November 20, 1880, order to change schedule.

January 15, 1881, warrant to Bosler for pay.

March 19, 1881, another warrant to Bosler.

March 29, 1881, another change of schedule.

Now, let us go back to the facts of the case. Peck was the contractor, Miner wrote the body of the proposal, John W. Dorsey filled in the words "District of Columbia," and Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name. Upon being interrogated upon that subject Dorsey's answer was, "I could not say, but I think not." That was all the answer he could give. It is found on page 3834. There was a subcontract with P. J. Wycoff. It was made by A. W. Moore. This route is what is known as the Gum-Boot route. The 22d of January, 1879, is the date of the oath of Peck, 8 I. On the 21st of April, 1879, Brady made an order, 28 I, on page 1342:

Curtail service to end at Mitchell, decreasing distance eighteen miles, and allow one month's extra pay.

Gentlemen, you will see by the map that Mitchell is just below Bridge Creek. It is the next station on the map. I would like to have you look at it. There is no mail route passing out of Mitchell to go anywhere. Bridge Creek was on the line of The Dalles and Baker City route. Brady cut off Bridge Creek and made this route terminate at Mitchell. There is no explanation why he did that. There does not seem to be any reason for its being done, and I have been totally unable to ascertain why such an order was made, because when the mail reached Mitchell it must have been carried from there in some other way. It must have been necessary to make another route from Mitchell up to Bridge Creek. The only theory that I can offer to you for this change that was made without any explanation on the jacket is that they had a postmaster at Bridge Creek who would not stand any nonsense, and insisted upon making correct returns, or else the postmaster at Bridge Creek was making returns they did not like, and in order to get rid of that they arranged the route so that he would have no returns to make at all, and so that it could not be seen how the mail was carried on the other route from The Dalles to Baker City. At any rate they chopped this post-office off, and left this end of the route without any communication with the outside world.

On the 5th of May, 1879, a letter from Peck to change the address to care of Rerdell was sent. Rerdell wrote the letter and signed Peck's name. On the 10th of May, 1879, there were some letters addressed to Stephen W. Dorsey. One was signed by W. R. Walker, another by B. F. Finn, and another, from Eugene City, signed by Joshua J. Walton.

On the 10th of May, 1879, there was a petition signed by people of Eugene City. It is 19 I. It was written by Rerdell. There it is, gentlemen. [Exhibiting petition.]

On the 23d of May, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote a letter to Brady. It is 9 I, page 1333:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1879.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith letters addressed to me in relation to an increase of mail service on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, Oreg., which please place on file in your department, and to request your early consideration of the same.

Very respectfully,

S. W. DORSEY.

There was Rerdell getting up a petition and having it signed in Eugene City, and then came a letter from Dorsey himself to Brady on the 23d of May, 1879. I want to read you what was inclosed in that letter:

SPRINGFIELD, OREG, May 10, 1879.

W. S. DORSEY, United States Senate,
Washington City, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: An effort is being made to secure an increase of service on the mail route leading from Eugene City, via McKinzie and Ocheco, to Bridge Creek, Wasco County. The country through which this route passes, both east and west of the Cascade Range of mountains, is rapidly filling up with settlers, and the mail facilities under the present contract is, in my opinion, entirely inadequate to the population. I would therefore most respectfully ask your assistance in securing such increase of service as prayed for in the petition.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. R. WALKER.

SPRINGFIELD, May 10, 1879.

HON. S. W. DORSEY, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: Having learned of your willingness to assist in procuring mail facilities, I take the liberty of addressing you and asking you to assist us in procuring an increased mail service on the route from Eugene to Bridge Creek, which is now only once a week, over a route that should have a daily mail service, and I hope you will favor us with your influence for that purpose.

Very respectfully,

B. F. FINN.

EUGENE CITY, May 3, 1878.

HON. S. W. DORSEY, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: You will confer a great favor on the citizens of this State by aiding to increase the mail service on the McKinzie route, from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, from a weekly to a daily mail.

Respectfully,

JOSHUA J. WALTON,
Judge of said County.

These were the letters that were addressed to Dorsey in the United States Senate, evidently instigated by some person, because one of them was addressed to him as W. S. Dorsey. He sent those letters inclosed in his letter to Brady. Remember, that at that very time Stephen W. Dorsey had an interest in this route. It was one he took in the division.

On the 24th of May, 1879, Peck's oath was filed for three trips at fifty hours. The time before was one hundred and twenty-one hours. Here is the oath, S I [exhibiting oath to jury], marked on the back, filed May 24, 1879. That is an overt act alleged in the indictment, and that is the date that is alleged in the indictment. I ask you to look at it and see that it is the correct date. It was evidently used when the order was made. It is stamped on the back May 24, 1879. Let me explain that oath to you. Miner wrote the body of it. On page 2340 is the testimony of Rerdell:

Q. I hand you the paper marked "8 I," and ask you in whose handwriting that is?—
A. The body of this is in the handwriting of John R. Miner. The figures "44140," "three" times a week, the words "four," "nine," "fifty," "ten," and "thirty" were written by myself.

Q. Were they written before or after the signature of Miner?—A. No, sir; this is not the signature of Miner; the body of it is written by Miner and signed by John M. Peck.

Q. Before or after the signature of Peck?—A. After the signature of Peck.

Q. Where were they written?—A. I wrote them here in Washington.

Q. Under what circumstances?—A. Under the direction of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. Were they written in before or after the 22d of January, 1879, the date the jurat purports to be dated?—A. They were written several months after that.

Miner gives his explanation about that. It is found on page 4246, beginning at the bottom of the page:

Q. Look at the paper now handed you (8 I) on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, and tell me whether you ever saw that before or not?—A. A portion appears to be in my handwriting; I don't remember that I ever saw it before.

Q. You do not remember anything about it?—A. Aside from the fact that it appears in my handwriting.

Q. Is it all in your handwriting?—A. It is not.

Q. What part is not?—A. "Three times a week," "four," "nine," "fifty," "three," "ten," and "thirty." A portion of the jurat is not in my handwriting.

Q. I suppose a portion to the other one (6 D) is not in your handwriting, too? Look at it. Is it not so?—A. That all appears to be the notary's; it is not mine, at least. The portion from "Sworn to" is not mine.

Q. "Sworn to and subscribed before me, a notary public in and for the county of Colfax, on the 22d day of January, A. D. 1879. J. S. Taylor." That is not in your handwriting?—A. That is not mine.

Q. And in the other one (8 I), "Sworn to and subscribed before me, a notary public, this 22d day of January, 1879. J. S. Taylor." That is not in yours?—A. I think not.

There were two affidavits shown to him on the same date.

Q. All the other words are in your handwriting?—A. Yes.

Q. Who filled in these words that have been filled in?—A. It appears to be Rerdell's.

Q. Is it Rerdell's?—A. I do not say positively that it is.

Q. It appears to be his?—A. It appears to be his.

Q. This affidavit bears date the 22d of January, 1879, the same date with the other affidavits. Then it seems that two affidavits were sent out to Peck?—A. It would so appear; yes, sir.

Q. You do not recollect of sending a batch of them to Peck?—A. I do not recollect anything of the sort.

Q. The paper last shown you (8 I) is as follows:

"THOMAS J. BRADY,

"Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

"SIR: The number of men and animals which are necessary to carry the mail on route 44140, three times a week, on the present schedule, is four men and nine animals; the number necessary to carry said mail on a schedule of fifty hours three times a week is ten men and thirty animals.

"Respectfully,

"JOHN M. PECK.

"TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,

"County of Colfax, ss:

"John M. Peck, being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above statement is true, as he verily believes.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, a notary public, this 22d day of January, 1879.

"[SEAL.]

"J. S. TAYLOR,

"Notary Public."

As I understand you, it is all in your own handwriting except the number of men and animals?—A. I think the words "three times a week" and the number of men and animals and the number of hours are not mine.

Q. This appears to have been filed on the 24th of May, 1879, and both affidavits, as I have said, bear date the same day. You do not recollect of sending these two affidavits to Peck?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not recollect when you wrote the last affidavit, 8 I?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you recollect writing it at all?—A. I do not.

Q. You have no memory about it?—A. No.

Q. You do not recollect to whom you gave it after you wrote it?—A. I do not.

On the same day, the 24th of May, 1879, there was a letter of Peck transmitting the oath. It is 7 I, on page 1332:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 24, 1879.

HON. THOMAS BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith my proposition for carrying the mail on route 44140 for three times a week and on a reduced schedule.

This route crosses two high ranges of mountains, and on a schedule of sixty hours the time will be equal to at least six miles an hour on an ordinary road.

Hoping this will receive your favorable consideration, I am,

Very respectfully,

JOHN M. PECK.

This letter was written and signed by Rerdell. It says:

On a schedule of sixty hours the time will be equal to at least six miles an hour on an ordinary road.

Gentlemen, the oath that was transmitted in this proposition calls for fifty hours. If the time were reduced to sixty hours it would be over six miles; then if the time were reduced to fifty hours, of course it would be close on to seven miles an hour. On the 26th of June, 1879, Brady made an order, 5 I, found on page 1332:

1st. Increase service two trips per week from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $4,649.86 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Reduce running time from one hundred and twenty-one (121) to fifty (50) hours, from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $14,486.10 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

3d. Allow subcontractor $6,971.02 per annum, for three-times-a-week service on a schedule of fifty (50) hours, from July 14, 1879.

His order made upon this jacket, where he had to state the subcontractor's pay, allowed the contractor for expedition alone $14,486.10. That would make altogether over $19,000. The difference between the amount that he allowed the contractor and the amount he allowed the subcontractor, Wycoff, whose subcontract was on file, was just $14,060.89. When he was making the order, he had right before him the evidence of the fact that the contractor was getting the mail carried for a sum that put into his pocket a clear profit of $14,060.89. Brady testified in regard to this, on page 3460:

Q. You think it was just and proper to the contractor to make an order, where there was $14,486.10 paid out of the Treasury for certain service, to allow him more than half of that amount for doing nothing, with less than half of it allowed to the man who did the service? Did you think that was proper to the Government?—A. I did. The subcontractor who was performing the service might at any time, in mid-winter, during a snow-storm, or anything like that, have thrown up the contract, and then the contractor would be held to put the service on again. We held him responsible, not the subcontractor. It was none of our business how much the contractor could get the service done for. And it was none of our business how much money he made out of it, provided we got a good service, and that service was not excessively paid for.

Q. But was it not some of your business to get the service performed at the lowest rate at which you could get it performed?—A. The papers show, and that was the law.

Q. And did not the subcontract show that a man had bound himself, and was willing to bind himself, to perform the service for the entire term, subject to all the conditions of the original contract, for the rates stated?—A. But he was not bound to us to perform it.

Q. I am aware of that.—A. We could not deal with him. We had nothing to do with him. That Eugene City and Bridge Creek service cost only $28.66 per mile, and it was an exceedingly difficult service to perform. We had nothing to do with the subcontractor except to see that he got his pay.

Q. And upon that route you paid $21,603 for the service, and of that amount the subcontractor, who performed the service, got only $6,976. And you say that that was a proper contract for you as a Government officer to make?—A. I do. I say the service was cheap then.

Q. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, it appears that by orders 5 and 6 I, dated June 26, 1879, you reduced the running time from one hundred and twenty-one hours to fifty hours, and you allowed the contractor therefor $14,486.10, and at the same time you allowed the subcontractor $6,971.02. I hand you the order and the papers with it and ask you to state in what way you arrived at the time, fifty hours.—A. I see on the face of the jacket that to reduce it to fifty hours would make it within the four-mile rule. It was one hundred and ninety-five miles long, and fifty hours would be about four miles an hour. Mr. Mitchell's letter calls for a reduction from one hundred and thirty hours to one hundred hours.

Q. Is not that the only paper in the lot that mentions any time to which reduction is desired?—A. I have not looked through all the papers.

Q. I will ask you to look through them for the purpose of refreshing your memory?—A. As I have explained in several other of the cases, according to my way of thinking there would have been very little expedition in simply coming down from one hundred and twenty-one hours to one hundred hours. It would have been somewhat faster, of course. Here is a petition (19 I) asking that the schedule be changed so as to make the speed much faster than at present. Here is a letter from Maxwell, approved and recommended by Whiteaker, wanting much faster time, or fast time (16 I).

Mr. BLISS. It says "fast time."

A. [Continuing.] Here is a petition from citizens and the postmaster at Springfield, wanting a daily service, and that the speed be greatly increased (14 I). Here is another petition of citizens of Eugene and Lane County wanting daily service and the speed greatly increased (13 I). A great many of these documents and petitions simply call for daily mail.

Q. But you find none there which name any time, except that Senator Mitchell names one hundred hours?—A. I do not.

Q. That order was made, I think, on the 26th of June, 1879?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the papers were filed on the 22d, 23d, 24th, and 26th of May?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, that being so, can you explain how it happened that, on the 22d of January, 1879, some five months previously, in New Mexico, Mr. John M. Peck knew that you wanted an affidavit showing how many men and horses would be required on a schedule of fifty hours?—A. I cannot.

You see, the affidavit was made in January, 1879, the petitions were filed in May, and he made this order in June. He could not tell us how it was that he and Peck came so close together in the matter of the time.

On the 23d of October, 1878, there was a letter from Peck to Brady to have subcontractor Wycoff's pay increased to $7,400 per annum. They first allowed the subcontractor $6,971.02, and it seems that they then increased his pay, and wrote to Brady informing him of the fact. Brady received the letter stating that the subcontractor's pay was to be brought up to $7,400, about $500 being added to it. Rerdell wrote and signed the letter. Then the Auditor was notified of the change in the pay of the subcontractor. On the 20th of February, 1880, there was a letter from Rerdell to Powers, informing him of the failure of Congress to make an appropriation. We again get up to the time that they were before Congress. As I explained to you when I told you about another letter of the same kind, Congress had not made the appropriation. They were investigating Brady's action. They were investigating the orders upon these routes. It was not known whether Congress would make the appropriation of $2,000,000 that Brady asked for or not. Immediately the contractors got out printed letters and sent them to every subcontractor upon every star route in the country, asking them to write to their members of Congress urging their members of Congress to vote for this appropriation, or, in other words, according to the letters, to see that the mail facilities were maintained. They were doing everything that lay in their power, both the contractors and those who were acting for this combination and these co-conspirators. Miner and Rerdell sent out the letters, and at the same time Thomas J. Brady was doing his level best to coerce Congress into passing the appropriation. One of the things that Brady did in order to influence Congress, in order to bribe the members of Congress, was, that upon every star route in the South and upon every star route in the Middle States he immediately doubled the trips. He doubled the trips upon every one of those routes in the South and in the Middle States, and did that during this Congressional investigation, as I say, in order to bribe the members of Congress. I do not doubt that these circulars were sent all through the South in order to make the Southern members stand up for the appropriation. You know, gentlemen, the old cry from the South :

The old flag and a big appropriation.

The Southern members found that their constituents wanted this great increase maintained, and Brady knew from what had preceded that the moment there was any talk of money going into the South the Southern members would stand up for the appropriation. His honor told me not to indulge in any flights of imagination, and I always like to obey the orders of the court. You will find Thomas J. Brady's testimony upon that subject on page 3393 of the record. He was a newspaper man ; he had his newspapers. Vaile was a newspaper man, and I suppose he had his newspapers. They were all taking a big hand in stiffening up the backs of members of Congress. But the Congressional back could not be stiffened. Congress allowed Brady $1,100,000, which was $900,000 less than he asked for, and they gave him a certificate of good character to bring here in order that we might prosecute him, and told him to make no more expedition over 50 per cent. of the original contract price.

On the 5th of November, 1880, there was a warrant to Bosler for $725, a remission of part of the fines for the quarter ending March 31, 1880. You see they were fined, and Bosler received the remission. On the 15th of November, 1880, ten days after that order for remission was made, there was a letter from Peck to Brady asking for a remission of the fines for the quarter ending the 30th of September, 1880. They were fined each quarter. Rerdell wrote and signed the letter. On the 15th of November, 1880, there was still another letter from Peck, calling attention to the affidavits that were filed. It is 24 I, on page 1338 :

[M. C. Rerdell, agent, box 706.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 15, 1880.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to certain affidavits filed showing it to be almost impossible to perform mail service on route 44140 during the winter season within the schedule time of fifty hours.

This route crosses two ranges of mountains, and by reference to those affidavits it will be seen that the snow attains the extraordinary depth of fifty feet.

I have therefore to ask that a winter and summer schedule be allowed over this route, say, of sixty hours from the 15th of November to the 15th of April, and forty hours for the remainder of the year, being pro rata from November 1 to April 30 and from April 30 to November 1, each, but to commence from December 1, 1880.

Very respectfully,

J. M. PECK.

This letter was written by Rerdell and was to Brady a direct and positive notice, accompanied by affidavits, that it was impossible to perform the service upon the schedule of fifty hours, and that the snow reached the extraordinary depth of fifty feet. In answer to that, on the 20th of November, 1880, there was an order of Brady, which is 23 I, on page 1337. You would suppose that when an honest Second Assistant Postmaster-General received a notice of that kind, that it was impossible to perform the service, and when he had remitted fines on account of that impossibility, that he would have said: "You want the schedule changed from winter to summer. Do not people want their mail in the winter time with the same regularity and expedition that they want it in the summer? If you cannot get along with a regular schedule for all the year around, I will put the time at a figure in which the mail can be carried. I will make an order cutting off the expedition and putting the route upon a basis upon which the mail can be carried." But Brady did not work in that way. On this date, November 20, 1880, the order was:

From December 1, 1880, reduce running time from fifty hours to forty hours from April 1 to October 31, and increase it from fifty hours to sixty hours from November 1 to March 31st of each year, without change of pay, the decrease and increase of running time being pro rata.

In the summer time they were to get their mail in forty hours, and in the winter time they were to wait sixty hours. Anything at all but changing the schedule. Brady had received his 20 per cent., and of course he could not afford to go back upon the contractors and put the time up and the amount back to the old contract price. He felt compelled to keep the price where it was.

Brady testifies in regard to this, on page 3584, beginning at the bottom of the page:

Mr. BLISS. Those affidavits relate to the condition of the road. I see they have the same date of the letter. They were filed on the 19th of November. They are marked 24 I, 25 I, and 26 I. Here are all the papers on the route if you wish to see them. [Submitting papers.]

The WITNESS. This letter sending these affidavits simply explains that the route crosses two ranges of mountains. By reference to these affidavits it will be seen that the snow attains to the extraordinary depth of fifty feet. Then it goes on:

"I have therefore to ask that a winter and summer schedule be allowed over this route, say, 60 hours from the 15th of November to the 15th of April, and 40 hours for the remainder of the year."

That is the only explanation I know of. It seems to have been impossible to have done it in the winter on fifty hours and they were given sixty, and a corresponding reduction was made for the summer.

Q. You considered that that answered the public convenience as well to have forty hours in summer and sixty in winter, as fifty all the year round?—A. I do, or I should not have made that order.

On the 15th of January, 1881, there was another warrant drawn in favor of Bosler for $889.75, for a remission of part of the deduction for the quarter ending September 30, 1880. On March 19, 1881, there was still another warrant to Bosler for $275.61 for a remission of part of deduction for quarter ending December 31, 1880. Bosler was drawing it in. On the 29th of March, 1881, Brady made another order. It was found that the first order that he made was one under which they could not get along, and so he again changed the schedule. This order is marked 27 I, and found on page 1342:

Amend order bearing date November 20, 1880 (number 12790), so as to reduce running time from fifty to forty hours from May 1 to October 31 in each year, instead of from April 1 to October 21 of each year, and from November 1 to April 30, increase running time from fifty to sixty hours, instead of from November 1 to March 31, without change of pay.

All this was done without change of pay. He changed the schedule and altered the day of the month upon which it was to begin.

Gentlemen, there was some testimony upon this route. Powers testified: "In the winter we carried the mail a portion of the way on snow-shoes; it would average from one to a dozen letters." Just think of it! From one to a dozen letters! "It could be carried by running a railroad across the mountains and snow-shedding the road." That was his idea of how he could get through in fifty hours—run a railroad over the mountains and build a snow-shed over the road. Mrs. Powers, who was the postmistress, testified: "The mail was wrapped in a gum-boot leg, and put in the carrier's pocket. After the increase was made there was no increase in the mail." Mrs. Powers's testimony will be found on page 2086. The testimony of Mr. Powers will be found on pages 1343-4 and 1458.

The pay in this case is drawn by Vaile, then by Stephen W. Dorsey, and then by Bosler. In two of the quarters, one ending on the 30th of September, 1881, and the other on the 31st of December, 1881, the pay was drawn upon orders signed by John M. Peck, who at that time, according to the testimony, was dead and buried.

Let us see about Peck's oath. For three trips it took four men and nine animals. For expedition it took ten men and thirty animals, making forty. Powers says when he ran it in one hundred and twenty-one hours it took five men and nine animals. When he ran it in eighty-four hours—because it seems he did run it in that time—it took seven men and twelve animals. When he brought it down to fifty hours it took seven men and thirteen animals, a total of twenty; just one-half of what Peck's oath stated it would take. Peck's oath specified forty, and Powers says the number of men and animals put together was twenty. He was asked "Could you use any more?" And he answered, "No, sir; no more animals. It was the snow; the snow prevented us." He said if he could have taken a troop of horses and kept them running over the road all the time, he might have kept it open in that way. Powers also testified that these men now owe him $1,000. You see they were scraping the money in, Bosler getting the warrants. Powers was the man who was doing the work, and Powers says they now owe him $1,000. They did not pay him any of it; they did not pay him a part as they did some of the rest.

The pay upon this route originally, was $2,468. It was increased to $21,460.89. Wycoff's pay was $7,400. That left the contractors a profit of $14,060.89. They subsequently made a contract with Powers, and gave him an increased price, his contract pay being $12,000. By paying him that, the contractors here, Dorsey, Miner, Vaile, and whoever was in the combination along with them, had a clear and substantial profit of $9,460.89. There is not a gentleman on the jury who would not have liked to have had that mail route just to live on from year to year. Nine thousand four hundred and sixty dollars and eighty-nine cents without doing anything, and scooping in the fines belonging to the subcontractors beside! There were some mail bills put in upon this route. I will read you a few of them from pages 2106-7-8. You know the letters state that the country was settling up rapidly:

Post-office at Mitchell, March 28, 1880. Mail, consisting of one letter, was dispatched this day at 7 a. m.

April 2, 1880. Mail, consisting of five letters and no paper mail, was dispatched this day at 7 a. m.

April 7, 1880. Mail, consisting of four letters, was dispatched this day.

April 9, 1880. Mail, consisting of one letter, was dispatched this day.

April 11, 1880. Mail, consisting of three letters, was dispatched this day.

There is the mail as shown by the mail bills, and I suppose they are correct. There was from one up to three letters. Besides that, Mrs. Powers testified that the mail was very small and that it did not increase.

Mr. C. S. Moore, who is the active and gentlemanly assistant of the district attorney, upstairs, handed me in the ante-room a piece of paper, and I will incorporate what is upon it as part of my speech. When Mr. Moore was informed about this route, it struck him as comical, and here is what he wrote:

The mail was small,
Scarce any at all—
A letter or two and a paper,
Went over this (route) root
In the leg of a boot,
The horse on a five-mile caper.

Brady testified, on page 3584 when asked what he had to say about this, that the service was cheap, and that was his only answer. I have read to you all that went before that answer. His answer was that the service was cheap. He allowed $21,460.89 for carrying from one to three letters in the leg of a boot, giving the contractors a profit of $9,460.89, besides remissions of fines.

Gentlemen, there are some overt acts on this route. Let me call your attention to them. I do not want my friends who come behind me, to say that these acts are not proved. I have read to you the letter of May 23, 1879, written by Dorsey, inclosing the letters that were sent to him, upon the strength of which Thomas J. Brady made his order. I have shown you Peck's oath filed on the 21st day of May, 1879, and marked on the back with the same date. That is the date that is stated in the indictment. I will show you the order of June 26, 1879. [Exhibiting it.] That is the date mentioned in the indictment. Inside of it was a jacket on which was written "Do this.—Brady;" but here is Brady's signature on the other side. Gentlemen, I submit to you that every date alleged as to this route is absolutely correct.

Another route of the same series is—

ROUTE NO. 44160, CANYON CITY TO CAMP McDERMITT, OREGON. ■

You will see it on the map—a long line but nothing on it. It was two hundred and forty-three miles in length, and there was one trip a week in one hundred and thirty hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $2,888. Miner wrote the body of the proposal. Rerdell filled in the amount Stephen W. Dorsey wrote in the proposal the word "Bidder" and signed Peck's name in three places. This was one of the routes that was taken by Vaile, as he says, in the division. The official papers are—

July 4, 1878, Postmaster Hall wrote to Brady.

July 15, 1878, Army officers at Camp Harney wrote.

July 29, 1878, postmaster at Camp McDermitt wrote.

September 18, 1878, oath of Peck made.

September 21, 1878, subcontract with McBean.

September 30, 1878, report from postmaster at Canyon City.

November 3, 1878, Postmaster Hall reported.

November 12, 1878, deduction ordered for failure.

November 16, 1878, Senator Mitchell wrote Brady.

December 16, 1878, postmaster at Camp McDermitt telegraphed.
 December 19, 1878, Senator Mitchell again wrote.
 December 23, 1878, oath of Peck filed.
 December 23, 1878, offer of Peck filed.
 December 23, 1878, Brady made an order for increase and expedition.
 December 28, 1878, Vaile filed a subcontract.
 May 17, 1879, petition filed for daily service.
 July 16, 1880, letter of Brown with petitions.
 July 16, 1880, Brady ordered increase of trips.
 August 2, 1880, subcontract made with Carrey.

Now let us go back again. John M. Peck was the contractor, Miner wrote the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to it. When he was asked about having signed Peck's name, and written in words upon that proposal, his answer was, "I could not say, but I think not." That was as far as he was willing to go. On the 4th of July, 1878, Postmaster Hall, at Canyon City, wrote to Brady, stating that the contractors had failed to appear by person or agent. On the 15th of July, 1878, the Army officers at Camp Harney wrote to Senator Mitchell, complaining about the mail. That letter is marked 11 H, and found on page 1245. The letter plays a very important part in the subsequent proceedings in this case. The Army officers down there at Camp Harney were not receiving any mail at all, and they wrote this letter to Senator Mitchell.

CAMP HARNEY, OREG., July 15, 1878.

To Hon. J. H. MITCHELL,
U. S. Senate, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: We respectfully request your polite attention to the following fact, viz: This post-office and this military post and the surrounding country has received no mail, excepting two or three letters and a newspaper or two, from the East, the South, or the West, for thirty-six days, and the mail due here weekly is a very large one. Mail matter on military or governmental, as well as private business from New York, Washington, and San Francisco, from Army headquarters, and military division headquarters, fails entirely to reach us. It is left some place on the route, believed to be left either at Kelton or Winnemucca or McDermitt as well as we can ascertain. The routes and roads are open; passengers and mail are, as we are informed and believe, carried to the East, South, and West, and passengers from those points to here, but not the mail. For more than five weeks this state of things has continued. It is true that this post-office is on a route for which no contract at present exists, so we are told, but reliable men are ready to contract to carry over the route heretofore used from Winnemucca and McDermitt through here to Canyon. What is immediately available for the present purpose is the military express that we have between here and Canyon City, Grant County, Oregon. Between Canyon and Boise, and thence to Kelton and to Winnemucca on the railroad, there are established routes, but our mail does not reach even Canyon City by the Boise or any other route.

We respectfully and earnestly request that you will please present these facts to the proper authorities and ascertain if our large and important mails cannot be made to reach us, or at least reach Canyon City, Oreg., whence we can get them.

We remain, very respectfully, yours,

J. STEWART,
Major Fourth Artillery, Commanding Post.
 M. A. COGHEN,
Captain Second Infantry.
 JOHN H. BARTHOLF,
Captain, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. Army.
 WILLIAM F. STEWART,
First Lieutenant Fourth Artillery.
 J. G. GALBRAITH,
Second Lieutenant First Cavalry.

You see they state in this letter, gentlemen, that coaches came along carrying passengers, but they could get no mail from any source whatever. The only mail they got was by what is known as military couriers.

They always run couriers from military camps. They always have dispatches that are not put in the mail, and that was the only way they got any letters at all. But, of course, these couriers could not get the regular mail. Bearing this letter in mind, you will see what became of it afterwards.

On the 29th of July, 1878, the postmaster at Camp McDermitt wrote to Brady (3 H, page 1243):

No contractor has reported either in person or by agent.

That was away down at the tail end of the route. No contractor had reported.

On the 18th of September, 1878, the oath of Peck was made, for ninety-six hours. Not a letter had been carried over the route; reports from the postmasters that there was no mail carried, yet, on the 18th of September, 1878, Peck's oath was made for ninety-six hours. At that time the time was one hundred and thirty hours. Miner wrote the body of that oath, and he testifies, on page 4188:

By the COURT:

Q. Allow me to ask you a question upon 8 H. You say that that affidavit is all in your handwriting?—A. The body of it; yes, sir.

Q. Was it all written at the same time?—A. It was not all written at the same time, from the appearance of it.

The COURT. It is manifest that it has been filled up.

[8 H was handed to the jury.]

Again, on page 4251, he says, upon cross-examination:

Q. Now, we will come to another one. That was 9 G, and that seems to have been the 18th of September. Here is another one dated on the 18th of September, the same day, on another route. Tell me what you know about that? [Submitting 8 H.]—A. I simply know that it is in my handwriting.

Q. Is it all in your handwriting?—A. All except the signatures and the date of the jurat.

Q. Was it all written at one time, or partly at one time and partly at another?—A. The appearance of the paper would indicate that it was written at different times. I don't know whether it was written fifteen minutes before or six weeks before the other part. I have no recollection of it now.

Q. You do not know whether it was sworn to in blank, do you?—A. I do not think it was.

Q. What do you know?—A. I do not know whether it was or not.

Q. If it was written here by you on the 18th, and sworn to on the 18th in Chico, it could not very well have all been written very near the same time?—A. I do not know that it was written here on the 18th.

Q. Where were you on the 18th?—A. I was here.

Q. If it was not written on the 18th why did you put that date at the head of it?—A. I don't know.

Q. Why did you say it was written at Chico Springs, when it was written here?—A. I don't know.

Q. What words in it seem to be put in at a time different from that when the body was written?—A. There is a space after the "eight," a space after the "ninety-six," a space after the "twelve," and there is a space before and after the "two."

The COURT. Whose affidavit does that purport to be?

Mr. MERRICK. Peck's.

Q. Why did you leave so much space for the words "six" and "eight" when you wrote it?—A. I don't know.

Q. Did you not leave a space there for the purpose of filling up afterwards?

The WITNESS. Do you want me to tell you what I think about it?

Mr. MERRICK. Well, I do not know.

The WITNESS. I have told you that I don't know and don't remember.

Q. You remember nothing about?—A. I do not; if you want me to suppose about it I can do it.

Q. It is written on September 18, and it is sworn to on September 18.—A. I don't know that it is written September 18.

Q. It purports to be. Do you know anything at all about it?—A. I do not.

On the 21st of September, 1878, Moore made a subcontract with Frank McBean. You remember that this is one of the routes that Moore was sent out to attend to, and you remember that he told McBean all that Stephen W. Dorsey had told him—that it would be expedited; that it would be increased; he was assured of that. Moore had a great deal of trouble in getting McBean to come up and make the contract, but, acting upon what Moore had told him, McBean came forward and made a subcontract on the route.

On the 30th of September, 1878, Postmaster Hall, at Canyon City, reported no service:

I know of no reason why the mails should not have been carried this month, had any one offered to take them.

That was in 48 H, at page 3308.

Then, on the 3d of November, 1878, Postmaster Hall reported:

The first mail left here on the 3d day of November, 1878.

On the 12th of November, 1878, there was a deduction ordered for failure of service for the entire quarter ending September 30, 1878. They deducted from the pay of the contractors up to the 30th of September. My object in noticing that, gentlemen, is to show you that at that time, the 30th of September, 1878, after the oath had been made and everything apparently was ready for expedition, there was no service performed at all.

On the 16th of November, 1878, Senator Mitchell wrote Brady, inclosing the letter sent to him by the officers at Camp Harney. You know that letter was dated the 15th of July, 1878, and transmitted to Senator Mitchell. On the 16th of November he forwarded that letter to the department. I told you it would play a prominent part in this case, and you will find that it does.

On the 16th of December the assistant postmaster at Camp McDermitt (Charles Bowling) telegraphed to Brady:

No contractor reported yet. There is no reason why service could not commence.

That is 6 H, page 1243. That was received at the department on the 16th of December. There was no contractor down at the lower end of the route.

On the 19th of December, 1878, Senator Mitchell again wrote to Brady, inclosing petition from Canyon City, marked 14 H. [14 H submitted to the jury.] Here it is, gentlemen. If you look inside of it you will find that it has been scratched, and that the words "ninety-six" were written into it. John R. Miner was the man who wrote those words into it. Miner testifies in regard to that, on page 4189:

Q. I pass you 14 H. What is that paper?—A. It is a petition on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route.

Q. I call your attention to the words ninety-six written and in figures in the body of that petition, and ask you in whose handwriting they are?—A. I do not know.

Q. Are they your handwriting?—A. They are not.

By the COURT:

Q. Are they filled in?—A. It is claimed that they were erased.

Mr. HENKLE. It has been altered, your honor.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. I want to ask you what you know about that petition?—A. I do not know that I ever saw it before this trial commenced, and do not believe I did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let the court see it.

[Paper submitted to the court.]

Q. You say you do not know that you ever saw that petition?—A. I say I do not think I ever saw the petition before the trial began.

Q. Are you sure that you never had anything to do with it?—A. I am very sure. It bears the indorsement of these members of Congress from Oregon.

That was his examination-in-chief. Then on page 4272, at the bottom :

Q. [Submitting 14 H.] Is that petition in your handwriting?—A. It is not.

Q. Do you recollect anything about that petition?—A. I don't know that I ever saw it before this trial began. With regard to all these papers I would like to say that I cannot remember individual papers. I filed some of them, and some of them I did not file; I cannot undertake to say at this time which I did and which I did not.

Q. Will you look at the word "ninety-six" and say whether that is not in your handwriting?—A. I have looked at it, and it is not in my handwriting.

Q. It is not in your handwriting?—A. No.

Mr. WILSON. What paper is that?

The WITNESS. 14 H.

Boone says, on page 2695 :

Q. I hand you petition marked 14 H; in whose handwriting are the words "ninety-six"?—A. There is 96 in figures, in brackets, and ninety-six in writing. The figure 9 and the word six, in my judgment, are in the handwriting of John R. Miner; it resembles his handwriting very closely.

There are two men who say that was written by John R. Miner. It was a route that Vaile and Miner had charge of, that they say they took in the division.

On the 23d of December, 1878, this altered and erased oath was filed. On the same day there was an offer made by Peck to carry the mail, including two additional trips, schedule ninety-six hours, for $18,612 per annum. You know the petition (14 H) was put in on the 19th, and here on the 23d of December comes the oath and a proposal to carry the mail in ninety-six hours. There is no explanation as to where they got information that it was to be ninety-six hours. It was then one hundred and thirty hours. Miner sent this offer in, and he signed Peck's name to it.

On the 23d of December, the very same day, Brady made an order (7 H, page 1243):

From January 16, 1879, increase service two trips per week, and reduce running time from one hundred and thirty hours to ninety-six hours, and allow contractor $18,612 per annum additional pay, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement.

That order was made upon this petition that I have shown you and upon the letter from Camp Harney. Inside the jacket upon which the order was made was another:

Petitions numerously signed by citizens living on and receiving their mail from this route are presented and recommended by Hon. John H. Mitchell, United States Senate, asking for six additional weekly trips, and expedition of schedule from one hundred and thirty hours to ninety-six hours.

Military officers stationed at Camp Harney petition for improved mail facilities. There are two intermediate offices on this route. Revenue as follows, viz:

Camp Harney, $210 per annum.

Alvord, $3 per annum.

This route connects two important military posts, viz, Camp Harney and Camp McDermitt, Nev., and is the most direct line of communication between Winnemucca, a point on the Central Pacific Railroad, and Canyon City.

Six additional trips would cost, at pro rata, $17,228 per annum.

No report of commencement of service from postmaster at Camp McDermitt, Nev.

Contractor submits sworn statement in regard to increased number of men and horses required to reduce running time from one hundred and thirty-two to ninety-six hours. Also proposition. Two additional weekly trips, $5,776 per annum. Proposed expedition and additional $18,612 per annum. Pro rata, $19,771.69 per annum.

Gentlemen, it mentions the letter I told you of, from Camp Harney, saying that there was no mail at all. It is here stated that the officers at Camp Harney want "improved mail facilities." Then, again, it says it is on the direct line from Winnemucca, on the Central Pacific Railroad. There must be some mistake about that. Then, again, on this jacket it says in plain words :

There has been no mail carried from Camp McDermitt.

And with that in front of Thomas J. Brady, the revenue of one office being $210, and the revenue of the other office only $3, with no mail being carried over the route, he actually makes an order for six trips, reduces the time and allows them $18,612 per annum additional pay.

I started off by telling you what the law was, and that the law was enacted for the benefit of the people employed by the Post-Office Department, to guide them, to guide the contractors and subcontractors, and to guide everybody who had business with the Post-Office Department, including Thomas J. Brady. I told you that the law stated that every order making an increase should specify the sum that was to be allowed for increase of trips. Here, in this order, Thomas J. Brady disregards that law, and lumps the whole business together, making it for expedition and trips. But I am satisfied that when his honor comes to charge you, he will say that it was Brady's duty to have obeyed the law and to have put the amount allowed for trips upon this order. But this was one of the ways that Brady took to conceal what he was doing. Let me read the law to you again. It is section 3960 :

Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service; and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department.

There is the plain language of the law—to enter this sum upon the order and upon the books of the department. Brady says in answer to this, on page 3465 :

Q. What Congressional investigation did you refer to as investigating Dorsey, Miner, and Peck?—A. The Waddell-Money investigation of the spring of 1878.

Q. When was that over?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Was it not over long before July?—A. It was over before July, of course, but how long before I do not know.

Q. Do you know when it commenced?—A. I do not.

Q. It was an investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives?—A. Yes; the Waddell Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The investigation was conducted, however, by Mr. Money, although it was called the Waddell investigation. My impression is that it was a general investigation, and that these matters were simply part of it.

Q. Do you not know that the investigation closed as early as May 14, 1878?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you not know that that investigation, so far as it related to Miner, Peck, and the others, closed as early as the 10th of April?—A. I do not.

Q. That is the investigation you refer to, is it, as furnishing an excuse why you did not insist upon the commencement of the service upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt and other routes where it was not commenced promptly?—A. That is one of the reasons.

Q. You mentioned an investigation in your direct examination?—A. That is the investigation I referred to.

Then at the bottom of page 3466 :

A. The 1st of July would have to arrive, as a matter of course, before we would know whether the service was in operation, unless the contractor voluntarily chose to state to us that he could not put it on by that time. It might then be a good thing for us to give that special contractor more time to put the service on.

Q. I ask you what the reasons were?—A. I am giving them to you.

Q. You said "might be." In these cases in this indictment what reasons other than the Congressional investigation were there why you did not insist that all that service should be commenced promptly?—A. Very well, I will give you the reasons. We would not know whether the service commenced until the 1st of July. Then it would be better to give the contractor a month or even two months' time, if there were no special reasons for not doing so, rather than declare him a failing contractor, and go up the list. That would be a very good reason.

Q. Why would it be better to give him a month or two months' time?—A. For a number of reasons. First, it would be an injury to the contractor to declare him a failing contractor; it placed him on the black list; secondly, because it would cost more. If you had to go up the list you probably would not get the service on any quicker than by giving him time.

Then on page 3471 :

Q. You have no recollection about how it was?—A. No.

Q. I think you are right as to the expedition, and I show you Exhibit 9 H, and ask you to state how much of the $18,612 was allowed for expedition.

The WITNESS. Was this jacket acted upon?

Mr. BLISS. It is the memorandum that is inside the other jacket.

A. This jacket states that two additional weekly trips would cost $5,776, and that contractor submits sworn statement in regard to increased number of men and horses required to reduce running time from one hundred and thirty-two hours to ninety-six hours, and also proposition. Now, there is somewhere among those papers Captain Turner's exhibit of the cost of expedition. I do not see the separate calculation there.

Q. Allow me to call your attention to the figures at the bottom. Two additional trips, $5,776; proposed expedition and additional trips, $18,612. Pro rata would have been $19,771.69?—A. That is probably for both increase and expedition. There is somewhere, or ought to be, among these papers something that would indicate which is which.

Q. But those papers afford no light on the question whether the saving below pro rata was on the expedition, or on the trips?—A. These papers do not. They simply show that the pro rata would have been $19,711.69, while the contractor proposed to do the whole thing for $18,600.

One thousand one hundred and eleven dollars and sixty-nine cents less than pro rata would have been.

On the 28th of December, 1878, Vaile filed his subcontract, dated April 1, 1878.

January 16, 1879, the first mail was carried from Fort McDermitt to Doc Anderson's. That is in the testimony of Mr. Brown, the carrier, on page 1302. All the way up to the 16th of January, 1879, there had not been a mail-bag taken out of Camp McDermitt to be brought up the route.

On the 7th of May, 1879, there was a petition filed for daily service and reduction to sixty hours, indorsed by Slater, Grover, and Whiteaker. That is 20 H. [20 H submitted to the jury.] Gentlemen, that is a well-worn and time-honored petition. You have seen it before. It has been inspected very carefully, and I suppose by no one more carefully than by the man who wrote it. John R. Miner wrote that petition, 20 H. You see how carefully he himself carried out the instructions that he had given to Mr. Moore—to preserve a space between the names and the petition. This is Miner's own handwriting; no dispute about it, and the very gentleman that he brought here to say that it was not, on the stand said that it was. The names on that petition are the names of people residing in Utah. Nephi Johnson testified:

I see the name of my nephew there, and he lives down upon my route in Utah.

The other Mr. Johnson testified to the same state of facts.

This petition was written and doctored and fixed up by Miner. How does it come that the names of people living down in Utah are affixed to an application to have the mail service changed on one of these routes away up in Oregon? What interest have they in it? Of course, we did not bring them here to say that they had not signed it. But both Mr. Johnson and his brother testified who the people were whose names were pasted to the portion of that petition that John R. Miner had written. And this petition was put in on the 7th of May, 1879. Miner says, on page 4192, in his examination-in-chief:

Q. I pass you 20 H. What is that, Mr. Miner?—A. Petition on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route.

Mr. HENKLE. That is the petition we have been calling the Utah petition, your honor.

The COURT. Yes.

Q. In whose handwriting is the body of that petition?—A. Mine.

Q. Who circulated that petition?—A. I do not know.

Q. Who filed it?—A. I know that I did not; I do not know who did.

Q. Do you know how those Utah names got attached to that petition?—A. I do not; I know that I did not attach them.

Q. Did you procure anybody to do it?—A. I did not.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to how it was done, and when?—A. No.

He had no knowledge. On page 4273:

Q. I will ask your attention to 20 H, and ask you whether that is in your handwriting?—A. That is in my handwriting.

Q. That petition?—A. It is.

Q. To whom did you send it?—A. I do not now know. I probably sent it to somebody on the route. I do not remember now.

Mr. HENKLE. What route is that?

The WITNESS. Canyon City to Camp McDermitt.

Q. Was it sent back to you?—A. I do not know.

Q. Did you send it to the department?—A. I do not know. I have already stated that some of these papers I filed and some of them I did not file. I do not remember, after three or four years, the particular papers that I filed.

On the 20th of May, 1879, James F. Brown, the subcontractor, sent a lot of petitions to box 714. That was Miner's box. The petitions were 31 H, 27 H, 28 H, and 29 H. He testified to that, or, rather, there is a letter of his, 26 H, on page 1252.

On the 20th February, 1880, there was another notice sent out to Brown about the failure of Congress, and he was cautioned to get people to write to the members of Congress to see that the appropriation was made.

On the 16th of July, 1880, there is a letter of Brown, dated May 20, 1879, directed to box 714, with petitions, and this letter was filed. I will read you the letter (26 H, page 1252):

CAMP McDERMITT, NEV., May 20, 1879.

Mr. ———,

Lock-box 714, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find the petitions for a daily service on route No. 44160. My end of the route being thinly settled, it was impossible to obtain more signers.

I sent one to Canyon City, but as you had sent one beforehand it was returned. I also sent one to Winnemucca, where all the business and influential men signed it.

Hoping this will secure the result desired, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

JAMES F. BROWN,
Per J. S. C. BROWN.

You see he mentions about not being able to get signers on account of the country being thinly settled.

Now, gentlemen, we will take these petitions that were sent. Here is 21 H. [Handed to the jury.] John R. Miner wrote it. Here is another one. [27 H handed to the jury.] I do not know who wrote that, but Postmaster Hall, testified on page 1750:

That is my signature, undoubtedly. I have no recollection of ever signing for daily mail service on that route.

It was his name, but he has no recollection of ever having signed for daily mail service on that route. Here is another. [28 H handed to the jury.] I do not know anything at all about that, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent. Here is another. [29 H handed to the jury.] I call your attention to it. It is on a single sheet of paper, just as Miner told Moore. Miner wrote that petition. Gentlemen, there are six names upon that petition, in Miner's handwriting, that are not the genuine signatures of the people whose names purport to be signed. Six names on that petition were signed by Miner, and he admitted it. Postmaster Hall says, on page 1748 :

I do not think any of the six names (five including my own) are the signatures of the signers.

He not only wrote the name of James F. Cleaver there—I think that is the name—but he forged Postmaster Hall's own name to it, and Hall says :

That is not my signature.

Now, let us see what Miner says in explanation of this sort of work. On page 4190 :

Q. I pass you 29 H. What is that paper?—A. It is a petition on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route.

Mr. HENKLE. That is the petition where you claim he wrote the first six names.

Mr. MERRICK. Didn't he?

The WITNESS. I will tell you directly.

Q. In whose handwriting is the body of that petition?—A. The body is in my handwriting.

Q. You are charged with having written the first six names to that petition. Are you guilty or not guilty?—A. Well, sir, I am in doubt as to whether those are in my handwriting or not. They very much resemble my handwriting.

Further down on the page :

Q. Were you ever out on that route?—A. I never was.

Q. Do you know those parties whose names are there?—A. I do not, and I had no means of knowing that any such persons were ever in existence.

Q. If that is in your handwriting, what is your explanation about it?

Mr. MERRICK. Wait a moment. If it is.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that proper, your honor? If he has any explanation to make, having written these names, all right.

The COURT. That is a hypothetical question, which I will allow him to answer.

Q. What is your explanation of it?—A. If those six names are in my handwriting, a petition came to me exactly like that, and I copied it with the names, for I had no means of knowing those men or knowing their names other than as I have explained. They are proven to be genuine men, living there, and the balance of the petition contains genuine names. Two of them were witnesses in this case, and they have testified that it is their handwriting. I have no recollection that I did copy the petition, but I could not have done it in any other way.

This was his examination-in-chief. Then on page 4207 :

Q. Did you ever forge the name of any person to a petition filed in the Post-Office Department?—A. I never did.

Q. Did you ever sign the name of any person to a petition filed in the Post-Office Department without the authority of that person?—A. It is possible that I copied the petition known as the Hall petition and those six names. Other than that I never signed the name of anybody to a petition.

Q. Did you ever alter a petition in a material point after it was signed?—A. I never did.

This was also in his examination-in-chief. On page 4273 :

Q. Look at the petition marked 21 H, and state whether that is in your handwriting?—A. That is in my handwriting.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the jury.] By holding 14 H up to the light you can see the writing over the erasure.

That is another one of these petitions.

Q. Did you write that (21 H)?—A. I did.

Q. To whom did you send it?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know whether it was sent back to you or not?—A. I do not.

Q. I show you 29 H. Is that in your handwriting?—A. It is.

Q. I believe you have testified about that?—A. I have.

Q. You stated something about your having written the four or five or six names that first appear on that petition?—A. I stated that I was in doubt as to whether I had so written or not. That resembles my handwriting.

Q. You don't recollect of having done it?—A. I do not recollect it.

Q. They are all on one piece of paper, and another piece is apparently pasted on to that?—A. That is the appearance.

Q. You said that if you wrote those names, you copied them from some other petition.—A. I said so because they are genuine names, and I had not any possible means of knowing those men's names other than to have copied them from a petition. Those same names appear on other petitions asking for the same thing.

Q. I am not asking you what they appear on. They do not all appear on other petitions asking for the same thing. That is not so.

Mr. HENKLE. Some of them do.

A. I think there are five out of the six.

Q. No, sir; there are not. You say these are all genuine names. Is the name D. M. Clifford a genuine name?—A. He has been sworn to at this trial as a man living in that region of country.

Q. D. M. Clifford?—A. I so understand it.

Q. If you wrote those names, which you are not prepared to deny, why did you write them in a different and feigned hand, and not in your own?—A. There is very little feigning about it.

Q. Why very little?—A. They look much like the same hand, the whole six.

Q. Is that your opinion?—A. They look much like the same.

Q. Can you give any reason why you feigned the hand? I suppose you cannot, as you say they look like the same hand.—A. I cannot give any reason.

On page 4281:

Q. You said, at page 4207, that possibly you copied the six signatures to the Hall petition. Were you in the habit of copying petitions and signatures?—A. I never copied any other petition and signatures, so far as I know, and I am not certain that I did that.

Q. If you were not in the habit of copying petitions and writing signatures, and this was the only one, would you not recollect it and be able to say whether you wrote those names or not?—A. I do not recollect whether I did or not.

Q. Don't you think if this was the only case and you did act in that way that you would recollect it?—A. I do not recollect it.

Q. You are not willing to say that you did not write those names?—A. I have not yet said that I did not write them.

Q. You are not willing to say that you did not?—A. I do not propose to say so.

Q. You do not propose to say so?—A. I am in doubt as to whether I did or did not.

Q. Although it was the only case in which you ever did it, if you did it in that case?—A. I never did it in any other case. That is certain.

Q. You are willing to swear that you never did it in any other case?—A. I am willing to swear that I never saw a petition on which I did it, and have not seen a petition on which I did it.

Based upon these petitions that I have shown you here came an order from Brady, dated July 16, 1880 (19 H, page 1250):

From August 1, 1880, increase service four trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $28,666.66 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

I have already explained to you, and when that matter comes to be argued before the court we will get a definite charge upon it; but I call your attention to it as we go along, and I say that the order was illegal, because he made an order increasing the trips and increasing the expedition at the same time. He multiplied by the former figures when he put these four trips on and made seven; he took in the order that was made for expedition before.

On the 2d of August, 1880, there was a subcontract made with John Carey, and the service was from Camp McDermitt to Doc Anderson's. Doc Anderson's is a ranch or stopping-place up above Camp Harney.

On the 15th of April, 1881, Miner wrote Carey to give some money to the postmaster at Alvord to stop him writing to the department at Washington. This letter is 32 H, and found at page 1314. It has a very interesting little history—very interesting:

[The Northern Overland Mail Company, H. M. Vaile, president; L. P. Williamson, superintendent, Independence, Mo.; John R. Miner, secretary, Washington, D. C.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1881.

JOHN CAREY, Esq.,
Fort McDermitt, Nev.:

DEAR SIR: One S. H. Abbott, who was postmaster at Alvord, I find, by accident, is writing to the department that you do not pay your bills, and that there is no need of anything more than a weekly mail.

I wish you would see this man at once and satisfy him; pay him whatever is reasonable and report to R. C. Williamson, at The Dalles. I suppose that is what he is after. He knows nothing of the through mail, and probably a weekly is all he needs; but more likely he wants some money. He complained once before to the department that he had to make a special trip to Camp McDermitt to make his returns, and I sent him $30 and it was all right. Now, I suppose, he wants a little more money.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN R. MINER.

Alvord you will find on your map, and is the place that had $3 worth of mail. This postmaster, by accident, as Miner puts it, had written to the department that a weekly mail was sufficient, and Miner says in this letter that he knows nothing of the through mail—that is, that he did not know a thing about the seven trips and expedition. Miner knew that, and Miner suggests that probably he wanted more money. It was inconvenient to have this postmaster writing up to the department.

Now, Mr. Miner gave us a specimen of his ability as an oath taker. You know he told Moore, "We are all good affidavit men." I am going to give you a specimen of his own good affidavits, told to you on the stand. Of course it did not attract your attention at the time, but I will put it in such shape that possibly it will attract your attention now.

On page 4206, he says:

Q. Go on and explain.—A. The Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route was not started entirely through until about the 1st of January, 1879. The north end was started. This man Abbott, who was then postmaster at Alvord, sent a bill to the department for $30.

Then there was some dispute among counsel.

A. [Continuing.] He sent a bill to the department for $30 for the expense in going to Camp McDermitt to mail his quarterly report for the quarter ending the 30th of September, 1878. Mr. Turner handed that bill to me and I sent him the money, $30, at the time I wrote this letter.

I call your attention to what he says here:

I sent him $30 at the time I wrote this letter.

April 15, 1881.

Mr. HENKLE. That was corrected afterwards, your honor.

The COURT. Yes, I know.

Mr. MERRICK. Corrected in part only.

Mr. HENKLE. It was entirely corrected.

The COURT. I think it bears that interpretation.

Mr. KER. Then, on page 4282, at the bottom:

Q. Was that money sent to him in satisfaction of the demand that he seems to have made on Williamson, referred to in this letter?—A. There was no demand made on Williamson at all. He sent a bill to the department, and I sent him a draft for the amount.

Q. Was that all that was ever paid to him?—A. That was all that was ever paid to him.

Q. What, then, in this letter do you mean by saying:

"I wish you would see this man at once and satisfy him."

A. I meant precisely what I said.

Q. How was he dissatisfied?

The WITNESS. How was he dissatisfied?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I have nothing further to say than what is in the letter itself.

Q. I ask you to tell me how he was dissatisfied. How did you intend he should be satisfied?—A. The language is very clear.

Q. It is not to me. I want you to explain it to the jury.—A. I have no explanation to make.

Q. You have no explanation to make?—A. None whatever.

Q. You have no explanation to make?—A. I said that I have not.

Q. Do you mean that you decline to make any, or that you cannot make any?—A. I mean to say that the letter explains itself. It is perfectly clear, and if I were to talk about it an hour I could not make it any clearer.

Q. There are different ways of satisfying men. How did you intend he should be satisfied?—A. Further on I directed him to pay him what he wants, or what is reasonable. You will find it in the letter plain enough.

Q. Pay him for what? For his expenses in going around?—A. [After a pause.] The letter is perfectly clear that this man was making a row and trouble there; that he had been postmaster, and that he was not now postmaster; and Mr. Carey was directed to see him and pay him whatever was reasonable, and keep him quiet.

Q. It was not to pay him for his journey?—A. Certainly not. That had already been paid for a year and a half before.

Q. He was to pay this man to keep him quiet?—A. The letter is perfectly clear. It does not require any explanation at all. He was not an official.

Q. Then all the explanation that you gave to your counsel when he examined you in reference to this letter related to some other payment?—A. It related to a portion of the letter that refers to the other payment.

Q. You said in your explanation this, in explaining the payment to him—A. [Interrupting.] No payment ever grew out of this letter.

Q. It did not?—A. No. I was explaining the previous payment of a year and a half before.

Q. You say:

"He sent a bill to the department for $30 for the expense in going to Camp McDermitt to mail his quarterly report for the quarter ending the 30th of September, 1878. Mr. Turner handed that bill to me and I sent him the money, $30, at the time I wrote this letter."

A. That is a mistake.

Q. That is what you said.—A. Let me see the record, please. I think it is badly punctuated.

Q. You can punctuate it as you choose.—A. That was not the idea that I intended to convey.

Q. You say:

"I sent him the money at the time I wrote this letter."

A. I did not intend to convey any such idea as that.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, before Mr. Ker proceeds I wish to call attention to a point he made at page 4627 of his remarks yesterday. I do it now because it involves a question of fact about which it is very evident that there is a dispute or some misunderstanding between counsel as to the testimony. I would like to make the point now, so that if it becomes necessary we can address the proper application to the court to supply what apparently, from his remarks, is an omission in the testimony. It is in regard to the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek.

First, there was a route from The Dalles to Baker City; then we will say there was a route running off in this direction [indicating] and then there was a route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek running off and connecting with that route. Then there was another route running around by way of Pendleton. Mr. Ker said this:

Gentlemen, you will see by the map that Mitchell is just below Bridge Creek. It is the next station on the map. I would like to have you look at it. There is no mail route passing out of Mitchell to go anywhere. Bridge Creek was on the line of The Dalles and Baker City route. Brady cut off Bridge Creek and made this route terminate at Mitchell. There is no explanation why he did that. There does not seem to be any reason for its being done, and I have been totally unable to ascertain why such an order was made, because when the mail reached Mitchell it must have been carried from there in some other way. It must have been necessary to make another route from Mitchell up to Bridge Creek. The only theory that I can offer to you for this change that was made without any explanation on the jacket is that they had a postmaster at Bridge Creek who would not stand any nonsense, and insisted upon making correct returns, or else the postmaster at Bridge Creek was making returns they did not like, and in order to get rid of that they arranged the route so that he would have no returns to make at all, and so that it could not be seen how the mail was carried on the other route from The Dalles to Baker City. At any rate they chopped this post-office off, and left this end of the route without any communication with the outside world.

I have no doubt that Mr. Ker understands the testimony to have been left in exactly that condition. It is impossible to run through this vast amount of testimony and settle just now how that is, but I wish to state to the court—and I have interrupted my brother Ker for this reason—that I understand the fact to be, and if it is not improper, I will say the fact is, that Mitchell was on the route from The Dalles to Baker City. My recollection is that one of the witnesses, I am not sure whether it was McBean or some one else, stated that Mitchell was incorrectly laid down on the map. Mitchell was on the route from The Dalles to Baker City, and this route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek happened to run over about twenty miles of that very route, and, therefore, the distance between Bridge Creek and Mitchell was cut off, saving the carriage of twenty miles.

The COURT. Because that distance was on another route.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; there was not any route there.

Mr. WILSON. It belonged to another route.

Mr. MERRICK. Not from Bridge Creek to Mitchell.

Mr. WILSON. I want the court to understand what my point is, and I want the counsel to understand it, and then we will see whether we can sustain it by the evidence.

The COURT. You say that Mitchell was on the route from The Dalles to Baker City.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor will allow me to pass you a little rough diagram I have here, you will see the point that I make. [Submitting diagram to the court.] In short, as the routes were originally let they covered the distance between Bridge Creek and Mitchell twice. When that was ascertained, then the distance between Bridge Creek and Mitchell was cut off from the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route.

The COURT. I understand that.

Mr. WILSON. And when it was cut off then the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route terminated at Mitchell, but terminated on The Dalles and Baker City route. That is the whole of it; but lest there might be some confusion as to the testimony, I thought it not improper to call the attention of the court to it at this point. Instead of leaving it up in the air, so to speak, without any connection with the outside world, it was simply making a connection between these two routes without twice traversing the same territory.

Mr. MERRICK. What part of The Dalles and Baker City route do you say Mitchell was on?

Mr. WILSON. Mitchell is laid down improperly on your map.

Mr. MERRICK. Mitchell is fifteen or twenty miles from that route.

Mr. WILSON. No; it is right on the route.

Mr. MERRICK. It is fifteen or twenty miles from The Dalles and Baker City route, as I understand it.

Mr. WILSON. It is right on the route; that is the very point.

The COURT. It is not so laid down on the map.

Mr. MERRICK. I understand the proof to be as I state. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. WILSON. Send over and get one of the post-office maps, and if that does not show it as I state I will give up the point. My recollection is that one of the witnesses, when his attention was called to the fact, said that Mitchell was not laid down properly on this map. I would like very much to send to the Post-Office Department and get a map.

The COURT. We will give you that opportunity.

Mr. MERRICK. I will send for a map showing the Canyon City route and the Bridge Creek route.

Mr. WILSON. Just get a postal map of Oregon.

Mr. MERRICK. We will get a postal map of Oregon and see how it is.

Mr. WILSON. Let us get it right.

Mr. MERRICK. All we want is to get it right. I know brother Wilson wants that also. We appreciate that that is what he wants.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is the reason I called attention to it.

Mr. MERRICK. I have always understood that Mitchell was some distance off that route.

Mr. WILSON. No; it is right the other way.

Mr. MERRICK. We will see when the map comes. The route from The Dalles to Baker City, in the advertisement, is as follows:

From The Dalles by Des Chutes, Bake Oven, Antelope, Bridge Creek, Monument, Camp Watson, Dayville, Canyon City, Prairie City, Penola, Sumter, and Auburn, to Baker City.

Mitchell is not on the route as advertised at all.

Mr. HENKLE. Monument was intended for Mitchell. Mr. Williamson says so.

Mr. MERRICK. We do not care what Mr. Williamson says. You did not swear him and put him on the stand. We do not care about the talk of a man who is interested and was not put on the stand.

The COURT. Proceed now, Mr. Ker.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I was explaining to you Mr. Miner's statement as to why it was that he wrote a letter to Carey to go to the postmaster at Alvord and keep him quiet. Mr. Henkle, counsel for Miner, seems to think that Miner made some very satisfactory explanations about that. I have read to you most of his testimony on that subject. There is a little more on page 4284:

A. I either did not state that, or did not intend to connect the last five or six words with the other, because the transaction that I was describing was of the 30th of September, 1878, and this letter was written in 1880.

Mr. HENKLE. 1881.

A. [Continuing.] I never intended to convey that idea.

Q. You made a number of corrections to the record this morning?—A. I did; four.

Q. After careful examination. Why did you not correct that?—A. Because I did not correct anything in that pamphlet, and I have not yet seen it.

Q. Was not your answer made after what had been said by counsel, "I want to show the circumstances under which the letter was written?"—A. The explanation that I made was about the circumstances connected with the writing of the letter. Those circumstances were that two years and a half before this man had sent a bill to the department, and we had paid it. From that circumstance I concluded that he was making a row and wanted some more money, and I directed M. A. Carey to pay him what was reasonable in order to keep him quiet. That is all there is of it.

He simply wanted to have some money paid to keep the man from writing letters to the department. On this route Vaile drew the pay. Vaile testifies, on page 4060:

Q. Mr. Vaile, was not the route from Fort McDermitt to Canyon City expedited before service was commenced upon it?—A. I can't say.

Q. What?—A. I can't say; I don't know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The record will show.

Mr. BLISS. Not necessarily.

Q. Was service commenced over the whole of that route before the 1st of January, 1879?—A. I think not. Of course all of this, or very much of my knowledge, comes through others. But I have to say that I think on one end, from Camp Harney to McDermitt, it did not commence until about the 1st of January.

Q. Then if expedition was ordered upon that route on the 23d of December, 1879, was it not so ordered before any knowledge existed here of the commencement of the service over the whole route?—A. I can't say what knowledge others had.

Then, on page 4071:

Q. The Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route paid you a handsome profit after expedition, did it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About $20,000?—A. I do not recollect the amount now, but it paid us a good profit.

Q. Was it not about $20,000?—A. I think that is it.

Q. During the continuance of those contracts did you come here as often as once in three months, generally?—A. That was my intention; about collection time.

Q. About the time your money was coming due?—A. Yes, sir; that was my purpose.

Q. You took in the money in that way?—A. I did.

Q. When you came here did you make any inquiries or get any knowledge of the condition of the service?—A. Well, I cannot say whether I did or not. I of course sought to keep the run of the service on the line.

Q. You knew what amount each route was producing?—A. Well, I don't know as I did. We used to get accounts-current from the department every quarter after the settlement was made that would show just what it was.

Q. You knew when you were coming here about how much you expected to get, did you not?—A. I could not say that. I expected to get all we were entitled to.

Q. Undoubtedly. But you knew about what your contracts, with the expedition and increase obtained by orders added to them, would amount to for each quarter, did you not?—A. I probably did, about that.

Q. You knew during each quarter whether there were increases or decreases, did you not?—A. Certainly.

Q. Were you in the habit of making any comparisons between the two?—A. I think not. I have no recollection of doing it.

You know, gentlemen, they had no books. They produced no books, and would not let us know what the condition of their business was; but Vaile makes the admission here that on this route he knew he had a profit of about $20,000. He drew a part of the pay and Miner drew a part of the pay. All the orders in this case were witnessed by Rerdell. You know it was one of Peck's routes.

The oath of Peck, which has been read to you, states that on the present schedule, three trips, it would require five men and eight animals, making thirteen, and expedited it would require twelve men and twenty-two animals, making thirty-four. Mr. McBean carried the mail on one-half of this route; he carried it from Canyon City to Doc Anderson's. On his half of the route McBean used four men and eight animals, making twelve. Brown, who carried on the other half of the route, used three men and nine animals, making twelve. Those added together make twenty-four. Twenty-four was the full number of men and animals that were used upon the route in carrying the mail when the service was increased and expedited. The oath of Peck, that was put in, called for thirty-four, which was ten more than were actually used. That ten made all the difference in the world in making the calculation, for it brought the price that the Government was paying up to a very high figure. The testimony was that the largest mail weighed one hundred and fifty pounds, and that consisted of dry goods, shoes, and such things as those. From one to five letters went from the lower end of the route up as far as Alvord. Camp Harney, which was of course the main point on this route, was discontinued in the fall of 1880. You will remember that on the 16th of July, 1880, Brady made an order increasing this service four trips and allowing the contractor $28,666.66, and a month or two after that the entire camp was discontinued, and there was nothing at all left upon the route but the miserable little office at Alvord. The mail from Harney to Canyon City was very light. You will remember that I showed you the revenues there stated on the jacket, which showed that the entire revenue coming from that military camp was $210, while the balance of the revenue on the route was $3, coming from Alvord, making $213 the entire amount that was received upon this route. The original pay was $2,888. It was increased to $50,166.66.

The route, as I told you, was divided in two. There were two carriers. McBean received $10,000 and Brown received $10,000, making a total of $20,000. Gentlemen, the profit on this route coming to the contractors over and above the amount they paid to the subcontractors and everything else was the sum of $30,166.66. Just think of that! A clear profit of $30,166.66; and there were only two offices on the route, one paying $210 and the other only $3. I want to give you the entire revenue upon the whole route, taking the terminal offices as well as the intermediate offices. As I stated before, the terminal offices ought not to be counted, because they received their supply elsewhere. The entire amount in 1879 from every office was $681.14, including Bridge Creek and Mitchell. In 1880 the revenues were $1,370.24. In 1881 the entire revenue from every office was only $935.42.

Next, gentlemen, I will call your attention to the acts of the different individuals on this route. Peck was the contractor; Miner wrote the body of the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and S. W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to the proposal. Miner wrote the body of Peck's oath. The petition 14 H was erased, and the words "ninety-six" written into it by Miner. The petition 20 H was written by Miner. It is what is called the "Utah" petition, from the fact that the names upon it are those of people residing in Utah. Upon the petition 29 H the names of Hall and five other people were forged by Miner. You will also remember that Miner wrote to Brown, and got him to circulate the petitions which were afterwards sent in. I think, as far as the overt acts show upon this route, you will have no difficulty in agreeing with me that we have substantially proved the allegations contained in the bill of indictment—that there were false petitions, that there was a fraudulent oath put into the department, an altered, changed, false, and fraudulent oath, that the orders made by Brady, based upon that oath, were fraudulent, were made without any necessity existing, and that the expedition and the increase that were ordered were not needed and were not necessary. And taking that in connection with the statement made by Walsh, that Brady said he "received 20 per cent. of every increase," we have the reason why Brady made these increases.

40104, MINERAL PARK TO PIOCHE, ARIZONA.

This route was two hundred and thirty-two miles long. There was one trip a week, and the time was eighty-four hours. John W. Dorsey was the contractor, and the pay was $2,982. Miner wrote the body of the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and John W. Dorsey took the oath in blank before Boone. This is one of the routes that was taken by Dorsey in the division. The official orders are:

June 18, 1878, change of address.

August 6, 1878, letter from postmaster at Pioche.

August 12, 1878, letter from Postmaster Meyers.

August 28, 1878, letter from postmaster at Mineral Park.

September 3, 1878, letter from postmaster at Pioche.

October 21, 1878, letter from Delegate Stevens.

November 26, 1878, date of the oath of Peck.

November 26, 1878, proposition to carry the mail.

November 27, 1878, letter of Peck to sublet.

November 29, 1878, order from Brady.

December 20, 1878, oath of Dorsey filed.

December 20, 1878, proposition filed.

December 20, 1878, petition for increase filed.

December 24, 1878, order for increase and expedition.

December 31, 1878, Vaile's subcontract filed.

May 5, 1879, letter of John W. Dorsey.

May 5, 1879, subcontract with Vaile withdrawn.

May 8, 1879, Rerdell filed a subcontract.

May 15, 1879, Rerdell's subcontract withdrawn.

July 1, 1879, subcontract with Isaac Jennings.

July 21, 1879, letter from Sidney Dillon.

July 23, 1879, another order for increase.

August 15, 1879, letter from postmaster at Pioche.

August 25, 1879, letter from Horace D. Beene.

January 22, 1880, order to reduce the service.

January 28, 1880, order to rescind that order.

June 29, 1880, subcontract made with McKibbin.

June 29, 1880, Rerdell withdrew subcontract.

August 12, 1880, subcontract with McKibbin withdrawn.

August 20, 1880, subcontract with Salisbury made.

March 17, 1881, Jennings's subcontract filed.

To return to the papers as they have been placed in evidence :

On the 18th of June, 1878, there was an order from Brady to change the address to box 714. That was Miner's box.

August 6, 1878, the postmaster at Pioche wrote that the service had not commenced.

August 12 the postmaster at Pioche again wrote that there was no service on the route.

August 28, postmaster at Mineral Park wrote : "Service began this day."

September 3, 1878, the postmaster at Pioche wrote that the service began on the 31st of August, 1878.

October 21, 1878, Delegate Stevens wrote for service twice a week.

November 26, 1878, there was an oath of John W. Dorsey's made for three trips in sixty hours. Miner wrote the body of that oath; he wrote all but the signature. John W. Dorsey and all the witnesses testified that was not John W. Dorsey's signature, but they did not know who did write it. At that time John W. Dorsey was in Montana or Dakota. The jurat is signed by W. F. Kellogg at Washington. Kellogg was Dorsey's private secretary. Miner testifies, on page 4187 :

Q. I pass you 12 K. What is that paper?—A. It is an affidavit on the Mineral Park and Pioche route.

Q. In whose handwriting is it?—A. The body of it is in my handwriting.

Q. By whom does it purport to be signed?—A. J. W. Dorsey.

Q. Mr. Dorsey has testified that that is not his genuine signature.—A. He has testified correctly.

Q. I want to know if you wrote that signature?—A. I certainly did not.

Q. You did not write it?—A. I did not.

Q. Do you know who did?—A. I do not absolutely know who did.

Q. Are you acquainted with the handwriting of Rerdell?—A. Well, I can give you the history of that paper if you want it.

The COURT. That is not an answer to the question.

A. [Continuing.] I am somewhat acquainted with it. I would not be certain as to his handwriting in all cases.

Q. What do you say as to that particular case?—A. I do not see any particular resemblance to Rerdell's handwriting in it. It is not John Dorsey's, though.

Q. Do you know whose it is?—A. As I said before, I do not absolutely know whose it is.

Accompanying that oath was a proposal of John W. Dorsey to carry the mail three trips in sixty hours for $19,318 per annum additional. Miner wrote that proposal. John W. Dorsey did not sign his name to that proposal; they do not know who signed it. They say that it is not John Dorsey's signature. They all admit that, but nobody really knows who did sign it.

Then, on the 27th of November, 1878, there was a letter from Peck asking permission to sublet the route. Gentlemen, Peck had nothing to do with this route; it was John W. Dorsey's route; and Peck was not here and had nothing at all to do with it. Miner wrote this letter asking permission to sublet the route, and signed Peck's name to it.

Then, on the 29th of November, 1878, Brady made an order permitting Peck to sublet the route. Brady says, on page 3552, "I signed it as a matter of course; it was pro forma."

On the 20th of December, 1878, the oath of Dorsey was filed; that is, if you take the writing upon the back of it. On the same day the proposal of Dorsey was filed.

On the 20th of December, 1878, there was a petition for increase to three trips in sixty hours. That is 17 K. Gentlemen, the familiar term known among contractors for this route was the "Lookingglass route." Now I hand you 17 K, and if you will hold it up to the light I think that you will see something like a looking-glass there; it is all scratched and erased. Accompanying that was another petition, 18 K, and that is also fixed in looking-glass shape. One of these petitions is upon one route, and the other is upon another. With reference to 17 K, Rerdell says:

At Miner's request I erased and wrote in the words: "3 trips on a schedule of 60 hours" instead of "84 hours."

You will find those words on that petition. In the other petition, 18 K, Miner erased it and wrote "Ehrenberg," "forty," "eighty," and "sixty." From Mineral Park there was another route that ran to Ehrenberg. You see these petitions were not signed at Mineral Park, they were signed below, and evidently the petitions were intended for the route from Ehrenberg to Mineral Park, so they erased the words in one and put it in as a petition on this Mineral Park and Pioche route. One is still retained for the Ehrenberg and Mineral Park route. But they were both erased and fixed up so as to do duty upon different routes.

You know that these petitions were examined, and the witnesses were interrogated about them. Mr. Wright says, in his testimony, that some are the names of people residing at Signal, one hundred miles south, and he does not think the signatures are genuine. You know the names are all the same on both petitions. If you look at them you will see that they were written by one person, with a few exceptions. Mr. Wright said that he recognized some of the names; some two or three he thought were genuine names. The others he said he did not think were genuine. Signal is a little place away down on the other route.

Miner says, on page 4191, in speaking of his action in this matter:

Q. Is that in your handwriting?—A. The word "Ehrenberg" is in my handwriting. Mr. MERRICK. All right. I have no objection to that.

By the COURT:

Q. The rest is not in your handwriting?—A. Ehrenberg must have been inserted there.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. How did you come to put that word in there?—A. I do not know. It seems to be written in over where Ehrenberg had been before. The people on it are proved to have lived on that route.

If you will hold it up to the light, the one on the Mineral Park and Pioche route, you can make out the "berg" in one of the lines, showing that Ehrenberg had been erased and the other word inserted in its place.

In the 24th of December, 1878, Brady made an order (10 K, page 1633):

From January 16, 1879, increase service two trips per week and reduce running time from eighty-four to sixty hours, and allow contractor $19,318 per annum additional pay, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement.
BRADY.

In the first place, gentlemen, the order is unlawful, because I read to you the law yesterday, and I have stated to you repeatedly that he must designate in every order the amount he allowed for trips. But he lumped this order and put for trips and expedition all in one order. The pro rata price would have been $22,737.75. Their offer was $19,318—a vast difference. Brady testified, in regard to his acts in connection with this matter, on page 3398, in his examination-in-chief:

Q. Testimony has been given here in regard to the route between Mineral Park and Pioche. If you have any recollection in regard to that route, please state what it is.—A. I only have a general recollection that we were very anxious to get up a continuous daily mail service from the southernmost point of the Utah Southern Railroad, I believe it was called, on through to the Southern Pacific Railroad. If the service had been properly performed it would have made a very much shorter connection for the mails from San Francisco and from the east; also, down into the Mineral Park and Prescott regions of Arizona. It was a good thing to have done, if we could have gotten it properly performed. The service was not properly performed, and was reduced.

Q. You cut it down to how much?—A. I believe in the first place I cut it down to once a week.

Q. State just what happened afterwards. Let the jury know all about it.—A. It was represented to me that I had done a great injustice to the contractors; that although the service might not have been properly performed, that still they ought to have a chance, after being told by the department that it was not properly performed—that they ought to have a chance to perform the kind of service we wanted. Under the influence of this argument we were induced to put it back to three times a week.

Q. Instead of seven?—A. Instead of seven, and they were given an opportunity to make the route what it ought to have been.

Q. I will ask you to state in that connection whether there was an application afterwards made to you to increase it again and to restore the seven trips a week, and whether you did it.—A. Constant and persistent efforts were made to restore it to seven times a week again. Shall I state what influence was used?

Mr. WILSON. Inasmuch as papers are already in the case coming from the Executive Mansion, I do not think you ought to have any delicacy in stating the facts about it.

I think you had better state all you know about it, so that the jury may understand exactly how it was.

The WITNESS. I would prefer not to state who the parties were who brought the matter to my attention. I do not think it concerns this case at all.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I will leave it there.

Now, gentlemen, let me ask you to remember that Brady here says, or at least Mr. Wilson says, interrogating Brady, that there were papers from the Executive Mansion, and Brady says, "I do not want to make a statement;" or, to use his words:

I do not think it concerns this case at all.

When the time comes I will show you the papers that he thus alludes to in order to make the jury believe that there was some powerful influence brought to bear upon him from the Executive Mansion. On page 3544:

Q. Do you remember whether any Senator or Member interested himself in the route from Mineral Park to Pioche?—A. I think so.

Q. Do you remember who?—A. Their names appear upon those petitions.

Q. Well, do you remember independently of the petitions?—A. I do.

Q. Who?—A. I prefer not to say.

Q. I would like to know what member of Congress interested himself on the route from Mineral Park to Pioche?—A. Well, I do not decline to say as to who interested themselves in the first action of the department, the first increase and expedition.

Mr. BLISS. I am going into that; that is what I say, the increase and expedition?

A. I have no objection to stating the first orders that were made; I have no objection to stating what I know about that. My impression was that your question referred to those subsequent orders.

Gentlemen, he draws a broad distinction between the first order and the subsequent order. On page 3545:

Mr. BLISS. No, sir. My question is what Member of Congress or Senator interested himself in the orders which were made for increase and expedition upon the route from Mineral Park to Pioche?

A. My impression is that some of the Members and Senators from Nevada did so, and also the Delegate from Utah.

Q. That is your impression?—A. That is my impression.

Q. Do you not know that the names of the Nevada Senators and Members do not appear in any paper on file as recommending anything on that route?—A. I do not. I have not examined the papers for a great while. My impression is that there were some papers from those gentlemen among the records. My impression is there ought to be a letter from Senator Jones among those papers.

Q. Senator Jones?—A. I think so.

Q. Do you not know that the Delegate from Utah did not interest himself in procuring the original orders of increase and expedition?—A. No; I have been laboring under the impression that he did.

Q. Do you not know that it was not until a subsequent application, which you did not grant, that the Delegate from Utah intervened?—A. That has not been my impression.

He made the order on the 24th of December, 1878, and made it upon these petitions that I have handed to you; and you can see whether they are indorsed by anybody, or whether anybody interested himself or not. You can also see whether they are genuine petitions, such as a person ought to regard, or whether they are of that fraudulent character that is spoken of in this indictment, and about which we complain.

On the 24th of December, 1878, he allowed them $19,318. That was one day before Christmas, and I submit to you, gentlemen of the jury, that it was a very nice Christmas gift for Brady to make out of the public Treasury. He was a Kris Kingle to Vaile and Miner and Dorsey, and all the people that were engaged in this conspiracy. And you will find that this was not the only time in which he turned himself into a sort of Kris Kingle, because I have read to you numbers of orders, made at the same time, or about the same date—23d of December and 24th of December.

On the 31st of December, 1878, Vaile filed his subcontract, and Miner signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey. Vaile was early on hand to reap the benefit of this increase, and he put in his subcontract so that he could draw the pay.

On the 5th of May there was a letter from Dorsey to change the address to care of Rerdell. Rerdell wrote and signed the letter.

On the same day Vaile wrote to withdraw his subcontract. Rerdell wrote the body of the letter, and Miner signed John W. Dorsey's name to it. Now, gentlemen, I make this reference to Miner signing John W. Dorsey's name and Rerdell writing the body of the letter, in order to connect that with the oath that preceded it, to show that Miner was engaged in the business of signing John W. Dorsey's name. He could not say positively who it was that signed the name of John W. Dorsey to the oath, but I think, from his subsequent action, the inference is irresistible that he was the man himself who wrote John W. Dorsey's name to the oath.

On the 8th of May, 1879, Rerdell filed his subcontract, and on the 15th of May he withdrew it.

On the 1st of July, 1879, there was a subcontract made with Isaac Jennings. John W. Dorsey's name was signed to it by Rerdell. Rerdell wrote the body of the subcontract, and in it is a provision for the different number of trips and expedition, the same as has been explained to you before. For three trips it was to be $12,600; for six trips, $25,000; and for seven trips it was to be $28,000. It provided for three, six, and seven trips.

On the 21st of July there was a letter from Sidney Dillon, asking for an increase from Pioche to Prescott. That is 23 K, on page 1641:

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

I will read you only one paragraph from it :

I therefore respectfully ask that the service between Pioche and Prescott be increased to a daily, thus giving us a continuous daily service from the Union Pacific Railroad to the Southern Pacific Railroad at Maricopa Wells.

[Referring to map.] Gentlemen, here is Pioche, away up here in Nevada; here is Mineral Park, in Arizona. The railroad is up here, and there is another one down here in this direction. Prescott is away below Mineral Park. It has nothing at all to do with Mineral Park, good, bad, or indifferent. It is a little branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad, away below Mineral Park. This letter of Sidney Dillon's was a general letter, speaking of the entire country, and he thought it would be a good thing to have daily mail from Pioche down to Prescott—not to Mineral Park, but all the way down to Prescott, to connect the two railroads together. Acting upon the strength of this letter of Sidney Dillon's Brady made his order. I have shown you that it started with one trip.

The COURT. The distance from Mineral Park to Prescott was about ninety miles, was it not?

Mr. KER. It was about ninety miles. I think they said ninety miles. Below the actual line of the railroad was Prescott, and then from that to Mineral Park made it somewhere in the neighborhood of ninety miles. That is my recollection of the testimony.

This started with one trip. On the 23d of December he increased it two more, making it three trips. Then came the letter of Sidney Dillon, and, acting upon the strength of that letter, on the 23d of July, 1879, Brady ordered (21 K, page 1640):

1st. From August 1, 1879, increase service four trips per week, and allow contractor $29,733.33 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Increase pay of subcontractor in like amount.

On the 15th of August, 1879, the postmaster at Pioche, wrote, stating that the special service of seven trips had not commenced. This is one of the letters that Brady says gave the reason why he reduced the service, "because the carrier did not perform his duty."

On the 25th of August, 1879, was a letter from a gentleman named Horace D. Beene. It is 27 K, and is found on page 1646:

WARD, NEV., August 25, 1879.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I readily understand the position in which a citizen places himself when he approaches a department of Government for the purpose of complaining of an abuse merely because it is such. I know the odds he encounters and the care with which he should make assertions. I appreciate the fact that his communication does not always accomplish its purpose, and that its design is subject to a misinterpretation.

In view of these things I have not undertaken this letter hastily, nor is it my intention to forsake the subject of it until every avenue of redress is exhausted.

The subject to which I refer is postal route No. 40104, from Mineral Park, Ariz., to Pioche, Nev.; distance, about two hundred and thirty miles, daily.

I call your attention to these facts: that an average of less than six letters a day goes over this route either way; that the population of Saint Joseph is less than twenty; that of Saint Thomas less than thirty; and that of Mineral Park very small. I do not know the exact number.

Another thing worthy of note is, that the business of Mineral Park and its surrounding country goes to San Francisco more directly in another direction.

I do not know the causes that led to the establishment of this route. It was not done by petition from the Pioche end of the route. I am sure it would not have been done by the advice of any official who knew the facts and advised without personal interest.

There is, in fact, no real reason why that route should have been established as a daily, and none whatever for its continuance as such.

Its effect is that the Government pays largely for a service that is useless, and that accomplishes no purpose except that of enriching parties directly interested.

As a citizen, I request that this thing be investigated and remedied.

And to that end, if this letter fails of its purpose, I shall use a copy of it as a preface to other communications to be sent through surer channels to the highest authority.

Yours, truly,

HORACE D. BEENE.

Indorsed on the back:

Letter from Horace D. Beene, esq., recommending the discontinuance of route No. 40104, and threatening to appeal to the highest authority. Received September 3, 1879.

September 3. 40104. Arizona.

Brady said he had no objection to telling you about the first increase, but he did not want to mention the second—four trips a week. The single letter of Sidney Dillon caused him to put on those four trips. And then he received a letter from Horace D. Beene, a prominent lawyer out in Nevada, who has since died, I believe, or I have heard so in some way. But he received that letter from Mr. Beene, giving him the exact state of the route.

On the 22d of January, 1880, acting upon that letter and the threat contained in it, Brady made an order (24 K, page 1643):

Reduce service from seven trips per week to one trip per week, and increase running time from sixty hours to eighty-four hours, decreasing contractor's pay $49,051.33 per annum * * * without one month's extra pay.

You see what good effect a letter from an honest man had upon Brady. On the 28th of January Brady made another order. He says that there was some influence brought to bear upon him from the White House; he wants you to understand that.

The COURT. He did not say the White House.

Mr. KER. The Executive Mansion.

Mr. MERRICK. No; he wanted to intimate that, but I do not think he said it.

Mr. CARPENTER. He said he received some communication.

Mr. MERRICK. Did he say from the White House?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, let us get it right now.

The COURT. That is not my recollection.

Mr. MERRICK. It is not mine, either.

Mr. WILSON. Let us get it right; that is all I want.

The COURT. Mr. Ker has the evidence there, I suppose.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Ker.] Read it.

Mr. KER. [Reading from page 3399:]

Mr. WILSON. Inasmuch as papers are already in the case coming from the Executive Mansion, I do not think you ought to have any delicacy in stating the facts about it. I think you had better state all you know about it, so that the jury may understand exactly how it was.

The WITNESS. I would prefer not to state who the parties were who brought the matter to my attention. I do not think it concerns this case at all.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I will leave it there.

The papers are here, with the stamp of the Executive Mansion upon them.

The COURT. Are they in evidence?

Mr. KER. Yes, sir; I will not speak about anything excepting that which I can show.

The COURT. I remember only his testimony in which he declined to say who the parties were.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all I recollected.

Mr. WILSON. I did bring his attention to it, because the papers are in evidence, and he did say that he preferred to say nothing about it. That is all there was about it, so far as his testimony is concerned. Now, in order that there may be no sort of misapprehension about what are the exact facts as disclosed in the testimony, may I be permitted to state that after the reduction——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Oh, no.

The COURT. You cannot state any facts that are not in evidence.

Mr. WILSON. I am not going to state anything that is not in evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. I know that, but pardon me. I say he may correct Mr. Ker if he makes a mistake, but he cannot superadd to what Mr. Ker says is evidence.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor will bear me out in saying that I did not interrupt him at all.

Mr. MERRICK. No, no; that is true.

Mr. WILSON. The court called his attention to an inaccuracy.

The COURT. Then your interruption——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] No; I thought perhaps it would not be improper, because I think it will conduce now to a proper understanding of this, to bring the exact facts out as testified to.

The COURT. Mr. Ker's attention is called to that; let him state what the facts are.

Mr. KER. I did not make any inaccurate statement. I have read the paragraph to the jury in which the Executive Mansion was mentioned.

The COURT. The words "Executive Mansion" there, as I understood it, were contained in the question that was put to the witness.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

The COURT. And the witness did not reply upon that subject at all.

Mr. MERRICK. He made no reply.

The COURT. He said he preferred to say nothing about it. There are papers, as you say, in evidence, with the stamp of the Executive Mansion upon them. I do not know what they are.

Mr. WILSON. They come directly from the Executive Mansion, and they so show on the face of them.

Mr. KER. I will show all that, and show it very clearly.

The COURT. Now, you are on the track.

Mr. MERRICK. You are on the right track now.

Mr. KER. On the 22d of January, 1880, Brady reduced it down to one trip, what it had been. Six days after that, on the 28th of January, he made another order (26 K, page 1645):

1st. Rescind order bearing date January 22, 1880 (No. 633).

2d. From February 1, 1880, reduce service four trips per week, and deduct from contractor's and subcontractor's pay $29,733.33 per annum, being pro rata, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

The other order said to deduct $49,051.33, and this says to deduct $29,733.33, leaving a difference of nearly $20,000 standing, and leaving it three trips with expedition. Mr. Brady is entitled to his explanation. It is found on page 3545:

Q. On the 22d of January, 1880, you made an order on the jacket marked 24 K which reads:

"The mail bills received by the inspection division showing little mail matter passing over this route, as per files of said division, and that the service is most irregularly and inefficiently performed: Ordered, That service on said route be reduced from the 1st day of February next to what it was at original letting, both as to trips and speed, without one month's extra pay.

"From February 1, 1880, reduce service from seven trips per week to one trip per week, and increase running time from sixty hours to eighty-four hours, decreasing contractor's pay $49,051.33 per annum, being amount allowed by orders bearing date December 31, 1878 (No. 11446), and July 23, 1879 (No. 6834), for increase of trips and expedition of running time, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

was that order made on the application of any person?—A. I believe the facts connected with that order are stated on the jackets, with the exception, possibly, of some personal influences, or arguments rather, to show that injustice had been done to the contractors.

Q. This is the order taking off the increase. Did any Member or Senator interest himself, so far as you know, in procuring that order?

The WITNESS. That is, the order reducing the service?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

A. No, sir; I believe not. The facts are simply as stated on the jacket.

Q. That order was made on the 22d of January, 1880. On the 28th of January, 1880, you made, by 26 K, another order:

"An order was issued bearing date January 22, 1880, to reduce the service from seven to once a week. In view of the fact that this route forms a part of the direct line of communication between the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads, it is deemed advisable to maintain three times a week's service.

"1st. Rescind order bearing date January 22, 1880 (No. 633)..

"2d. From February 1, 1880, reduce service four trips per week, and deduct from contractor's and subcontractor's pay $29,733.33 per annum, being pro rata, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

"BRADY."

That order was made six days after the original order. What, if any, additional papers had you received in the mean time, during those six days?—A. As I was stating a while ago, that order was based upon the representations made to the department that a great injustice had been done the contractors in the original order reducing it; and thereupon we undertook to give them an opportunity, by putting it back to three times a week, to make the route what we expected it to be, what it ought to have been, and what, if they had made it, it would not have been reduced.

Q. But the mail bills, to which you refer in your first order, show that in nineteen days there passed over that route only thirty-five letters?—A. Yes; I understand; that was—

Q. [Interposing.] Had you, in the mean time—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Let him finish his answer.

Mr. BLISS. Wait until I put my question.

Q. And had you in the mean time, between January 22, 1880, and January 28, 1880, any evidence that the mails had in fact increased upon that route?

The WITNESS. That is, between the dates of those two orders?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

A. No, sir; as I stated a moment ago, the order was changed and the service put back to three times a week upon the representation that we had been doing a great injustice to the contractors, and that if they were given an opportunity they would not permit this delay at the Colorado River of twelve hours, which made the expedition practically useless before and prevented the mails going over that line; therefore it was determined to give them an opportunity.

Then, on page 3546:

Q. The only paper or application referred to upon the jacket being the letter of Sidney Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, what right had you, six days after you had made an order reciting that there was little or no mail carried on the route, to restore it, paying an additional sum of twenty thousand and odd dollars to prevent injustice to the contractor, as you say?

The answer is on page 3547:

A. We have the right, or rather the power, under the law and regulations of the department, to do those things.

Q. Who made the representations to you that injustice had been done to the contractors?—A. The contractors themselves, I believe, represented their wrongs. That phase of the question was presented with some stress by Senator Plumb, of Kansas, who represented that he was friendly to the contractor; that they had made known their case to him, and he believed I was doing an injustice to them; and because of his friendship for them he wanted to urge this question of doing justice, or rather not doing injustice, by making so sweeping an order. The fault, you see, had been entirely on the subcontractors in making the delay at Colorado River from evening until morning, I believe. Practically that did away with the good that was intended to be done by expedition. I made that order of reduction, under the circumstances, because I was angry at the manner in which the service had been performed. I think we recouped for what had been paid, at least a certain proportion of it, how much I cannot remember. Then they came to me, as I say, and represented that great injustice had been done to these contractors, and that they ought to have at least a chance to redeem themselves by putting it back to three times a week, and I gave them that chance.

Q. If you made that second order for the purpose of remedying an injustice done to the contractors, why did you not give that reason upon the jacket?—A. I cannot say now.

Q. The jacket recites that you made the order in view of the fact that this route forms a part of the direct line of communication between the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads, and therefore it was deemed advisable to maintain three trips a week service.—A. Those were among the reasons.

Q. But you knew at the time you made the original order reducing the service that it formed part of the route, did you not?—A. The reason, as I have stated frankly here, that probably moved me more than anything else was to give to the contractors another chance to make that service what it ought to be.

On the next page:

Q. What contractor or what agent of a contractor ever approached you between the 22d and 28th of January, 1880, to urge that the original order was unjust and to ask you to change it?—A. I do not remember now.

Q. Did anybody ever approach you on behalf of the contractors except, as you say, Senator Plumb and Mr. Rerdell?—A. I do not know that Mr. Rerdell ever did. I remember very distinctly a discussion I had with Senator Plumb, and I also talked with numbers of others about it; who all they were or what was said I cannot now remember.

Q. What had Senator Plumb, representing Kansas, to do with a route in Arizona?—

A. He probably could answer that question more correctly than I could. His statement to me was that the contractors were friends of his, and he believed I was doing them an injustice.

Q. He believed you were doing them an injustice; you then went on and restored the three-times-a-week service at an expense to the Government of $29,000, though you had before you evidence that in nineteen days but thirty-five letters went over that route, had you?—A. I have explained the reason why probably so little mail went over that route.

Q. I am asking the fact: Having that evidence that so little mail was going over that route, you went on and made that order?—A. It appears by the order itself that I did.

Q. And the mail bills to which you referred, showing that at that time but thirty-five letters went over the route in nineteen days, you still deemed yourself justified in making this order to prevent injustice to the contractors, did you?—A. With the knowledge that if the service was made what it ought to be it would be a very important mail.

Q. I see that in neither of these orders did you allow a month's extra pay; why was that?—A. As punishment to the contractor, I suppose; it was putting it down practically for cause.

Then, on the 24th of June, 1880, a subcontract was made with McKibbin. Rerdell signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey.

Then, on the 28th of June, 1880, Rerdell withdrew his subcontract. This is the second time he withdrew that subcontract. The first time it did not seem to work very well, and he had to go back and do it again.

On the 12th of August, 1880, the subcontract of McKibbin was withdrawn, and Rerdell signed the letter of J. W. Dorsey.

Then, on the 20th of August, 1880, a subcontract was made with Monroe Salisbury. Rerdell signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey.

On the 20th of August, 1880, there was a letter from Jay Gould, asking for daily service. It is 321 K, defense, page 3296. Stephen W. Dorsey testified in his examination, on page 3919:

I generally wrote to Sidney Dillon and Jay Gould for passes.

You know he got free passes and gave them to the people he sent out to establish the mail routes. He says he generally wrote to Jay Gould and Sidney Dillon when he wanted passes, and now Jay Gould writes to Brady to have this route made daily.

On the 20th of August, 1880, there was a letter from Rerdell to the Auditor about Vaile (102 K, page 1661):

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 21, 1880.

To the SIXTH AUDITOR:

SIR: H. M. Vaile was subcontractor on route 40104 during the first quarter of 1879.

In the first settlement for that quarter Vaile was paid for certain expedited service—it was subsequently discovered that the expedition thus paid for was never performed—the department, therefore, and very properly, too, charged back to the route the amount thus paid for expedition never performed, viz, some $2,800.

Meanwhile Vaile, who alone was in fault, had ceased to have any connection with the route; the charging back, therefore, fell on the wrong man, the man who was in no way responsible for the non-performance of the expedition, except so far as he stood between the department and the subcontractor.

It is true that this payment was made by the regular contractor to the subcontractor, but it is equally true that it was, in a measure, a compulsory payment. By the rules of the Post-Office Department it is made obligatory on the regular contractor to pay the subcontractor before the department will settle with him; it is not, therefore, a payment as between two individuals. The receipt is on the form prescribed by the Post-Office Department, and is witnessed by (the then) Postmaster Edmunds, as the rules prescribe. It is on file in the Post-Office Department, and I maintain that our covenants were fulfilled when we put the receipt on file. If Vaile had performed the service as he agreed he would do, and for to do which he received this money, we should have been reimbursed by a certificate of service from the contract office. Now, will you permit Vaile to take advantage of his own wrong, and thus enable him to defraud another man out of his money.

I refrain from discussing the question as to what would be the duty of the department if Vaile, who had received the money wrongfully, had ceased to have any connection with the department, because it is not pertinent to this issue; if it were, I could cite you to many authorities and precedents to the effect that even then it would be your duty to refund the money to me. But this is not necessary, because Vaile is still doing business with the department.

He is subcontractor on route 44156 for the full contract pay, which is $22,000 per annum, hence the department will have no difficulty in reimbursing itself for what was, in simple truth, an overpayment.

I think you will agree with me when I ask that this money be refunded to the subcontractor on route 40104 and charged to route 44156, because it is simply correcting an error. You have the same authority to charge it to one as you have to charge it to the other, and you have already charged it to me.

The law-merchant would experience no difficulty in adjusting a difficulty of this sort. The merchant who would refuse to correct an error of this character would be justly called a lame duck, and would be scouted from "Change." Vaile was erroneously paid for the performance of a service which he never did perform. Therefore I ask that he be compelled to render unto Cæsar the things that he ceasers.

Respectfully,

M. C. RERDELL.

Acting for himself and for the regular contractor on route 40104.

Vaile made a reply to that, which is found on page 4060:

Q. Do you remember writing a letter to Mr. McGrew on the 9th of July, 1880, with reference to what is called the Jennings case?—A. I recollect writing the letter, but—

Q. [Interposing.] You do not remember the date?—A. No.

Q. Do you remember its being in evidence on the other trial?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember declaring in that letter that upon route 40104 you were trustee for J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, and others?—A. Yes, sir.

Then, on 4064:

A. I think that is the letter I wrote.

Mr. BLISS. Then I will read it:

“WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1880.

“Hon. J. M. MCGREW:

“SIR: In reply to yours of July 8th, relating to the Jennings case, I would state that I did not receive the money in manner and form as stated by one M. C. Rerdell, nor was the draft of J. W. Dorsey, on said route 40104, for the quarter named, to get an advance of money for myself or for my own use.

“At the time I receipted for my pay as subcontractor on said route I did not, in fact, receive any money, but did so receipt that J. W. Dorsey might negotiate his draft on said route, and for no other purpose.

“Although I was subcontractor of record on said route at the time named, I was not a subcontractor in my own behalf, but as trustee for J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, Isaac Jennings, and others, to collect said money and pay it over as said parties should direct. I further state that all money that ever came into my hands from said route I did pay over to the parties named as trustee, as by them directed.

“Acting as trustee of said Jennings, and believing that he had performed the mail service on said route as by him agreed, and in accordance with the laws and regulations of the Post-Office Department, I did pay said Jennings, on the 1st day of April, 1879, the sum of $1,257.73, the sum of money he was entitled to provided he had carried the mail three times per week on the schedule required, which I fully believed at that time he had done, and for a long time after.

I further state that I am informed that said Jennings is not responsible; that it would be utterly impossible for me to receive back the $2,800, or any part thereof; that in fact this sum of money sought to be collected of me, if collected for said Jennings's benefit, or go into his hands in addition to the sum he now has unlawfully, doubly remunerating him for his neglect of duty.

I further state that all the money collected on said route not paid to said Jennings was paid to liquidate the debts of J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, and others previously contracted, and not one dollar ever remained in my hands.

I further state I believe both J. W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible, and it would be impossible for me to collect any part of said money from them. As above stated, said money came into my hand only as their agent or trustee, and at once paid out as they directed; that my subcontract was put on file simply to enable J. W. Dorsey to negotiate his draft on said route, when in fact said Jennings was the real subcontractor. Said Jennings agreed to perform the service on said route strictly in accordance with the laws and regulations of the department, for the annual sum of $12,600.00, the duplicate of which contract was delivered over to S. W. Dorsey by myself, and which I believe is now in the hands of M. C. Rerdell, and which, or a copy thereof, I demand shall be filed with you in this case, that you may see what said Jennings agreed to do.

This is certainly a strange claim. Jennings agreed to perform mail service on said route. I believed he had done it, and paid him accordingly. It turns out long after he did not properly perform the service, but was attempting a swindle, and a deduction is ordered for not performing the service properly. Then this man, the guilty party, having got money from me, as trustee, wrongfully, as well as from the Government, and asks that the Auditor compel me to pay him the sum of $2,800.00, when, as I am informed, he is seeking to get this same deduction remitted.

Surely if he succeeded in all this he will make a good thing out of his rascality and I a good victim without remedy. I state again I did not hypothecate said draft for myself, did not receive one cent as subcontractor, but became the payee of said draft that said J. W. Dorsey might negotiate it, and I to dispose of the proceeds as he should direct, all of which I did. Therefore I request you not to compel me to pay the sum of money asked, but if I am liable at all let the parties seek their redress at law, where all the facts can be obtained and justice rendered me. And it is also well known that I am a man of means, and any judgment rendered against me could and would be collected, dollar for dollar.

I am, very respectfully,

H. M. VAILE.

This letter was not written by Vaile; he only wrote the last part of it:

And it is also well known that I am a man of means, and any judgment rendered against me could and would be collected, dollar for dollar.

H. M. VAILE.

It gives you an idea, however, of how Vaile and Stephen W. Dorsey were acting. Vaile says:

I held it as trustee.

And this was during 1878, when Dorsey was still in the Senate, and on up to 1879. Now, on page 4067:

Q. Now I show you a paper already in evidence, marked 102 K, and printed on page 1661 of the record of the present trial, and ask you if that is not the statement of Mr. Rerdell referred to in this letter?—A. I see it mentions my name.

Q. Look it through; do not be in too much of a hurry. [After a pause.] Can you say?—A. Well, I should think I would write such a letter in answer to that.

Q. Does not reading that recall it to you?—A. I think that is it.

The reason for asking him about that was that there is a little difference in the date of the letters. Vaile's letter is dated July 9, 1880, whereas Rerdell's letter was written in August. But inasmuch as Vaile did not write the heading in his own letter and somebody else did it for him, I presume there was a mistake made in the date. I think the letter was testified to be in the handwriting of Miner, but I am not sure about that. If it was I do not think we need wonder at all about the difference in date, for a date made no difference to John R. Miner.

On the 18th of November, 1880, there was a letter from the Executive Mansion. It is 319 K, defense, on page 3296:

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Murray, Eli. H., governor; Hunter, John A., chf. jus.; Cannon, Geo. Q., Delegate. Salt Lake City, Utah. Recom'd an increase of mail service on route from Pioche, Nevada, to Mineral Park, Arizona.

Respectfully referred to the Postmaster-General.

By direction of the President:

Nov. 18, 1880.

W. K. ROGERS,
Secretary.

Inclosed in that letter was one from George Q. Cannon, which is marked 320 K, defense, and found on the same page:

SALT LAKE CITY, Oct. 15, '80.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,
2d Asst. P. M. Gen., Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I recommend an increase of mail service to a daily on U. S. mail route No. —, between Pioche, Nevada, and Mineral Park, Arizona; this will give a daily mail between Palisade on the Central Pacific, and Maricopa on the Southern Pacific roads. This route passes through a country rapidly increasing in wealth and population, and developing mining interests of great value, and the nature of the business and the needs of those engaged in it are such as to require daily mail communication.

Very respectfully,

GEO. Q. CANNON.

The other paper inclosed is marked 322 K, defense, and is also on the same page:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Oct. 15, 1880.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,
2d Asst. P. M. Gen. :

D'R SIR: We recommend an increase of mail service on U. S. mail route No. —, between Pioche, Nevada, and Mineral Park, Arizona, so that a daily mail may be carried between those points. There is a daily mail from Palisade to Pioche, and from Mineral Park, by way of Prescott, to Maricopa, on the Southern Pacific R. R., and this increase of service would complete a daily mail from the Central to the Southern roads, and greatly increase the benefits of the daily mail on the routes where it is now established. This general route passes through a country rapidly increasing in wealth and population, and rapidly developing mining industries of great value, and the nature of the business and the needs of those engaged in it are such as to require daily mail communication over the entire route.

Very respectfully,

ELI H. MURRAY,
Gov. U. T.
JOHN A. HUNTER,
Chief Justice, &c.

Gentlemen, those are the two letters that came with the paper I handed to you (319 K, defense), and both of those are communications addressed to Thomas J. Brady. You remember that the lawyer, Horace D. Beene, of Ward, Nevada, had written a letter telling, Brady that he would go to a higher source if the wrong was not righted. Then Brady made the order first putting it down to one trip a week and then rescinding that and making it three trips a week; and in order to head Beene off, I have no doubt but Dorsey and the people engaged in this scheme got these two petitions and sent them up to the Executive Mansion, although directed to "Hon. Thomas J. Brady," and from the Executive Mansion they were very properly referred back to the man that they ought to have gone to. The whole thing was done to give color to the claim that this increase was asked for from the Executive Mansion. The petitions sent to the Executive Mansion were addressed to Thomas J. Brady, and those petitions came from men who had no more to do with that route from Mineral Park to Pioche than you or I had, for they lived in a different place altogether, were not dependent upon it for mail, and had nothing to do with it at all. They were in a different Territory.

Mr. WILSON. Will my Brother Ker allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I know he does not want to get anything wrong. The statement I was about to make awhile ago I would like to be permitted to make now.

Mr. MERRICK. Has Mr. Ker said anything that is not correct?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. What has he said that is not correct?

Mr. WILSON. These petitions, as I understand it, have not the slightest relation to any order that had previously been made

Mr. MERRICK. That is a matter for discussion.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to make my statement, and you will all understand the matter then. After the service had been reduced to one trip it was then increased to three trips, and then the parties undertook to get it back to six trips, as it was before. The petitions to restore it to six trips were sent through the Executive Mansion to the Post-Office Department, and Brady refused to grant that request. That is the whole of it.

The COURT. Mr. Ker has not said anything inconsistent with that.

Mr. MERRICK. He has not said anything inconsistent with that, but I am glad brother Wilson has brought up the subject, because——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] He said this was done for the purpose of heading off Beene.

Mr. MERRICK. So it was, manifestly.

The COURT. That is a subject of comment.

Mr. MERRICK. What business had anybody to be sending to the President petitions that were addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. WILSON. You might just as well ask what business Mr. Beene, who lived a hundred miles from this route, had to be writing letters to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MERRICK. We do not know where Beene lived.

Mr. WILSON. The letter states.

Mr. MERRICK. What business had anybody to send to the President letters that were addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. MERRICK. All the President had to do with them was to coldly say, "Refer them to the proper authority, and don't bother me about the trash," as he did.

Mr. WILSON. I have not said anything about that. I am only telling what the evidence shows.

The COURT. Go on, Mr. Ker. This is not a contradiction of you. If a man lives within a hundred miles of a route out in that country he is pretty near to it for the purposes of petition.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose he was the attorney of a contractor on some other route.

Mr. MERRICK. I think that is fully justified by the fact developed in this case that every fellow was grabbing.

The COURT. Beene was some crabbed old lawyer, probably.

Mr. MERRICK. I guess he was interested in the matter, and wanted to steal from somebody.

Mr. WILSON. He was working for some other contractor, I presume.

Mr. KER. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, we did not introduce these papers. They were introduced on the part of the defense. They were brought here and offered as a part of their case, in order to convince you that Thomas J. Brady had acted in a proper, honest, and legal manner when he made these orders. It is a part of their case, and not a part of ours. They were brought here to influence you, and to induce you to believe that the President of the United States had joined in the request to have this route made a daily. That was the object.

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. KER. Why did you introduce them? Do not shake your head and say "no." We did not bring them. We left them out.

Mr. WILSON. You asked me the question, and I will answer it. We introduced them for the purpose of showing that although they had asked General Brady to increase this route to six trips, and although, as you say, he was engaged in a conspiracy to put money in his own pocket, he refused to do it. That is what they were introduced for, as stated at the time.

Mr. MERRICK. Brady was trying to cover his tracks, as a matter of course, as far as he could.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your time will come by and by.

Mr. MERRICK. Keep Wilson quiet, and keep quiet yourself.

Mr. CARPENTER. And let you talk all the while.

Mr. KER. That was the reason why Judge Wilson asked Brady the questions he did on his examination-in-chief. He wanted to lay the ground-work for argument hereafter. Let me read you one of the questions:

Mr. WILSON. Inasmuch as papers are already in the case coming from the Executive Mansion, I do not think you ought to have any delicacy in stating the facts about it. I think you had better state all you know about it, so that the jury may understand exactly how it was.

He did not want Brady to have any delicacy about it; but Brady knew a little more on the subject than his counsel, Judge Wilson, and he had a considerable amount of delicacy; because when you come to look at it, and when the orders are brought before you, you will see just how it was, and you will agree with Brady in what he said when he made answer to Judge Wilson's question:

The WITNESS. I would prefer not to state who the parties were who brought the matter to my attention. I do not think it concerns this case at all.

We can all agree with him very fully in that respect. That it came from the Executive Mansion did not concern this case at all. It was a dodge resorted to by his coconspirators in order to head off Mr. Beene, and in order to make it appear that the President had interfered in the matter, and in order that Brady might stand up to the order he had made. You know the allowance had gone up to a very liberal sum, and he had received 20 per cent. of it, and it went against the grain to return a dollar of it, as he would have had to do when he cut the expedition off. That is the full explanation of all the matter that my friend brought in so gingerly in order to base a terrific argument upon it.

Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay, Bosler drew the pay, and Rerdell and Salisbury had a hand in taking the warrants and drawing the pay. There was some testimony about the route. Krider, the postmaster at Mineral Park, said, "The first mail came in on the 25th of December," one day after Brady made the order. That was Christmas day. He said, "I took possession and opened the bag." I asked him if he had been commissioned, and he said, "Oh, no; I just took the key and opened the bag." He received his commission as postmaster long afterward; but that was the first mail that came in. Then he said, "Scarcely any mail came over the route from Pioche to Mineral Park. The bulk of the mail from Mineral Park was sent by way of Prescott on the railroad." They did not think of sending it up across this country into Nevada, but put it on the railroad and sent it where the railroad went, and where the railroad could take it in one-tenth of the time. He said, "There were no letters from Signal passing through Mineral Park." That is the fact he stated in referring to the petition from Signal that I showed you, that was altered and erased. Then, again, we had Mr. Wright upon the stand. Caldwell Wright said, "The mail was sometimes nothing," and he went off into this remarkable assertion: "We often bet two to one that there would be nothing in the bag." I incidentally tried to find out from him who won, but his honor did not seem to think it was relevant to the case. However, I have satisfied myself by looking over the mail bills, and I will show you how it was in a short time.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1.03 p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I explained to you before recess that Mr. Wright testified that bets were made whether there would be any letters in the mail or not. There were mail bills on this route. I will read some of them. On page 2938:

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park. Date, Nov. 26, 1879. Mail, consisting of this bill only, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Nov. 30th, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of 1 letter and 1 parcel from St. Thomas, Nev., was received this day at — o'clock — m.

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park, A. T. Date, Nov. 27, 1879. Mail, consisting of 3 letters, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, December 1st, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of 1 letter, was received this day at 6.30 o'clock p. m.

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park, A. T. Date, Nov. 28th, 1879. Mail, consisting of one letter, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Dec. 2, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of three letters, was received this day at 6 o'clock p. m.

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park. Date, Nov. 29th, 1879. Mail, consisting of this bill, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Dec. 3, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of six letters from St. Joseph and St. Thomas, Nev., was received this day at 6.45 o'clock p. m.

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park. Date, Nov. 30, 1879. Mail, consisting of this bill, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Dec. 4th, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of one letter and three postal cards, from St. Thomas, Nev., was received this day at 7 o'clock p. m.

On the next page:

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park. Date, Dec. 3rd, 1879. Mail, consisting of this bill, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Dec. 7th, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of this bill only, was received this day at 6.15 o'clock p. m.

This route costs the P. O. Department over twenty-five thousand dollars per year.

Route No. 40104, from Mineral Park, A. T., to Pioche Nev. Post-office at Mineral Park, A. T. Date, Dec. 5, 1879. Mail, consisting of this bill, was dispatched this day at 6 o'clock a. m.

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada. Date, Dec. 6th, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of two letters, was received this day at 6 o'clock p. m.

This is a sample of the statement of the mail bills all the way through.

On this route the original pay was $2,982. There was an offer to carry it for $19,318, and that brought it up for three trips to $22,300. When it was paid for at that rate Jennings was carrying it for $12,600.

The profit that was derived from the route at that time was $9,700. Stephen W. Dorsey says, on page 3942:

Q. How large a profit?—A. There were two routes that I thought there was a profit on; one of them turned out not very profitable, and it was sold for a small sum; Mineral Park to Pioche; there was an apparent profit, it seems to me, of $10,000 a year, or something like that on that route.

Then it was increased to seven trips and there was an additional allowance of $29,733.33. That was upon the letter of Sidney Dillon. The total pay on this route was $52,033.33. Jennings's pay for seven trips was $28,000, leaving a clean and clear profit of $24,033.33; and this was on a route where the mail bills showed that sometimes there was only the mail bill, without a letter at all, sometimes one letter, and, as I read, the highest was six letters carried over the entire route.

We have some overt acts in this case. I exhibited to you the petitions that were altered by Rerdell and that were altered by Miner. I showed you, when I began the route, that Miner wrote the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and John W. Dorsey took the oath in blank. I have also shown you that Stephen W. Dorsey helped to draw the pay, as did Vaile, Bosler, Rerdell, and Salisbury. The order upon which the allowance was made is stated in the indictment as of the 23d of July, 1879. Now, Mr. Foreman, just look at it [exhibiting order] and see if that is not the correct date, as stated in the indictment. Across the jacket is written in blue pencil, "Do this.—Brady."

40113, TRES ALAMOS TO CLIFTON, ARIZONA.

[Maps distributed.] This route begins at Tres Alamos and runs up to Fort Grant. There is a blue line that runs on to Goodwin. It was shown that the route did not run that way. That was the old way. Goodwin was an old fort that is now abandoned.

After going up to Fort Grant, the carrier retraced his steps down around the mountain [indicating] and came to Safford, and from Safford the mail was carried on a buckboard over to Camp Thomas, the rest of the mail being sent the other way to Clifton. Subsequently the route was altered by starting it at Wilcox. The railroad came around there, and so they made it begin at Wilcox, which lessened the distance to Fort Grant. There was also another mail route that went over the same road. The other route ran off in this direction.

This was one of the routes taken by Dorsey in the division. It was one hundred and ninety-seven miles long, was one trip a week, and the time was eighty-four hours. John W. Dorsey was the contractor, and the pay was $1,568. Miner wrote the body of the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and John W. Dorsey took the oath in blank.

The official orders are:

June 18, 1878, John W. Dorsey wrote to change the address.

March 10, 1879, letter from postmaster Dunbar.

April 21, 1879, oath of John W. Dorsey made.

May 7, 1879, letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting the oath.

May 10, 1879, letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting petitions.

May 23, 1879, letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting more petitions.

June 3, 1879, order for increase and expedition.

November 11, 1879, S. W. Dorsey filed subcontract.

December 6, 1880, letter withdrawing Dorsey's subcontract.

January 4, 1881, order to change service to begin at Wilcox.

February 11, 1881, increase of four trips ordered.

Now, to go back and take these papers with the others. On the 18th of June, 1878, the address was changed to box 714, which was Miner's box. On the 10th of March, 1879, there was a letter from Postmaster Dunbar. It is 15 O, at page 1800. In that letter it states that there was some doubt as to whether John W. Dorsey would be able to carry that mail at all, and asking for instructions. On the 21st of April, 1879, the oath of John W. Dorsey was made. It is 4 O, on page 1797. Here it is [exhibiting it]. You have had the same date before. If you look at that oath you will find that it has been erased and written over. Rerdell wrote the body in May, after it was sworn to. He says, on page 2345 :

Q. I hand you paper marked 4 O, purporting to be the oath on route 40113, from Tres Alamos to Clifton, and ask you in whose handwriting that is?—A. The body of it is in my handwriting, the signature by John W. Dorsey. The officer taking the jurat, and 21 April, I do not know by whom.

Q. Who is the signature by?—A. The signature is by John W. Dorsey.

Q. It is his signature?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were the amounts in there when that signature was affixed?—A. They were not.

Q. Do you know when they were put in?—A. They were affixed afterwards, some time in the month of May.

Q. Was the jurat there before they were inserted?—A. It was.

John W. Dorsey was not interrogated about this oath by either side, and therefore we have no testimony from him as to how or why he made it. I call your attention back to the statement that he made in the other case, where there were two oaths of the same date. He said he received one early in the morning, and swore to it, and then got a letter that there was a mistake in it, and in that letter there was another oath which he swore to and sent off in the mail. There were four oaths dated on that same day, and this is one of the four. You know, according to the testimony, that Rerdell went out West on the 17th day of April, 1879. On the 21st of April he was in Nebraska.

The COURT. Colorado.

Mr. KER. On the 26th of April he was at Denver, Colorado. On the 7th of May, 1879, there was a letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting the oath. Rerdell wrote the letter and signed Dorsey's name to it. Rerdell says that he returned to Washington about the 5th of May, and on the 7th of May he sent the letter. Rerdell also tells you that he found, when he returned, a number of blank affidavits which he used to fill up. On the 10th of May, 1879, there is another letter from John W. Dorsey to Brady. It is 7 O, on page 1798 :

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1879.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith two additional petitions, numerously signed, asking for increased mail facilities on route 40113, from Tres Alamos to Clifton, Ariz., and to request that they be placed on file with the other papers in this case.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. DORSEY.

That letter was written and was signed by Rerdell.

Then, on the 23d of May, 1879, there was a letter of John W. Dorsey to Brady transmitting more petitions for increase. That is 5 O, found on page 1797 :

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1879.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a petition, very numerously signed, asking for an increase of mail service on route No. 40113, Tres Alamos to Clifton, Ariz., and to request that it be placed on file with other papers of a similar nature.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. DORSEY.

That was John W. Dorsey's letter transmitting more petitions. In that letter was a petition, 9 O. It is found on page 1798. Here it is, gentlemen. [Exhibiting it.] Rerdell says, in speaking of this petition, on page 2345, at the bottom :

Q. I hand you a petition on this route, marked 9 O, and ask if you know in whose handwriting the body of that petition is?—A. The handwriting of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. In saying it is in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, do you speak from your knowledge of the handwriting solely, or from any other knowledge; and, if so, what?—

A. I saw S. W. Dorsey write this petition.

Q. When?—A. It was in April, 1879.

S. W. Dorsey did not say that that was not so. He gave no testimony all in regard to the petition, and therefore it should stand as an undisputed fact. Petition 11 O was written by John A. Sibbald, who was a gentleman in the employ of Mr. Dorsey as a clerk. 12 O was written by James W. Donnelly, who was also in the employ of Stephen W. Dorsey. Donnelly was examined as a witness upon the stand. Rerdell says, on page 2346, in speaking of these petitions :

Q. I hand you petition marked 11 O, and ask in whose handwriting that is?—A. It is in the handwriting of John A. Sibbald.

Q. I hand you petition marked 12 O, and ask in whose handwriting that is?—A. That is in the handwriting of a gentleman named James W. Donnelly.

Q. Who is he?—A. He is now an employé in the United States Land Office.

Q. In this city?—A. In this city.

Q. Do you know how he came to write that?—A. I cannot remember his writing that particular petition. He was doing some work there at one time. He was assisting in writing petitions.

Q. Where?—A. At Mr. Dorsey's.

Q. Which Mr. Dorsey's?—A. S. W. Dorsey's; at his office.

On the strength of these petitions Brady, on the 3d of June, 1879, made an order. It is 3 O, on page 1797 :

1st. Increase service two trips per week from June 16, 1879, and allow contractor $3,136 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Reduce running time from eighty-four to forty hours from June 16, 1879, and allow contractor $9,408 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

I will read you what Brady said, on page 3420, in speaking of this order. You know we ought to give him the benefit of what he testified to :

Q. Do you remember the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton?—A. Yes, sir; I know there was such a route.

Q. Do you remember whether you made any orders of increase or expedition upon that route?—A. I think I did.

Q. Do you remember upon whose application you made them?—A. I do not. I will tell you if you show me the papers.

Q. You have no recollection independently of the papers?—A. I have not.

Q. The contract price for one trip a week upon that route was $1,568, which, at pro rata, would have given six trips for $9,408. You ordered expedition from eighty-four hours to forty hours, and added two trips at a cost of $14,112, costing the Government, therefore, $4,704 more than six trips a week. Is your answer as to the reason why you did that the same as you made to the same question as to the other routes?—A. It is.

Q. Did you upon that route consider the question of productiveness?—A. I presume not. I can tell you better after I look at the papers.

Q. You say you presume not. It was one of the routes on which you did not care about the productiveness, was it not?—A. I judge it was. Productiveness was not an element to consider in the increase of the routes throughout that country.

Q. You did not consider it at all?—A. It might have had some weight, but very little.

Q. When you made that expedition and increase did you know the number of offices on the route?—A. I cannot say now that I did. If you let me look at the papers I can tell you.

Q. You have no recollection independently of the papers?—A. I have no recollection.

Q. Had you any knowledge at that time, or did you seek to obtain any knowledge as to the amount of mail matter passing over the route?—A. Well, I presume there were some representations about that in the petitions and letters, or representations made by the parties who may have called upon me about it.

Q. Had you any knowledge except that derived from the parties who were urging the increase?—A. I presume not.

Q. Was it your practice to derive your information upon those subjects solely from the parties who were interested in procuring the increase?—A. Yes, sir; almost solely. The parties interested in the increase were the representatives of the people in Congress urging these things. Their words went a great way about those matters with us.

Q. You did not consider it your duty to see whether their representations were correct?—A. I did not. I assumed, as a matter of course, that the representatives of the people in Congress would tell the truth.

Q. But they might have been intending to tell the truth and yet be in error. Did you endeavor to verify their statements at all?—A. Not at the outset. Subsequently by mail bills here—

Q. [Interposing.] Did you before making your orders?—A. No, sir; subsequently by mail bills—

Q. [Interposing.] You did not, then, before making your orders, seek to ascertain whether the statements contained in the petitions and letters before you were correct, if on those petitions and letters were the indorsements of Members of Congress or Senators. Is that the fact?—A. Very nearly so. If Mr. Teller, for instance, had come to me and represented a certain thing to be absolutely needed out in his country, I would take his word for it.

Q. You would take his word and his statement?—A. And his statement.

Q. Suppose an application was made to you with regard to which no Member of Congress or Senator appeared, and there were statements made in the papers. Did you seek to verify them?—A. Not always. For instance, out in Colorado there—

Q. [Interposing.] Did you generally—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Let him answer.

Mr. BLISS. Go on.

A. [Continuing.] For instance, out in Colorado, if Mr. John L. Routt, who was my predecessor in the Second Assistant's office, would send up a letter saying he thought a certain thing ought to be done, I would do it. He was an old Assistant Postmaster-General, on the ground, and I would take his word for it.

Q. Suppose the application was from a person who had not been in any such position at all, and the papers did not bear the indorsement of any Member of Congress or Senator, or any person who had been in such a position as that, did you seek to verify the statement?—A. Suppose they were—

Q. [Interposing.] Just answer the question.—A. I do not know that I ever sought to verify statements contained in any petitions at all. I have no recollection now.

Q. And letters?—A. And letters. I have no recollection now of ever having sought to verify before making an order statements made in any petitions that came to me properly, or letters that came to me from responsible sources.

Q. You assumed that the statements in them were true, and made the orders, did you?—A. I assumed that gentlemen in position or petitioners of that kind would usually speak the truth.

On the 11th of November, 1879, S. W. Dorsey filed his subcontract, dated April 1, 1879. On the 6th of December, 1880, there was a letter sent withdrawing the subcontract of S. W. Dorsey. Rerdell wrote the letter and signed the name of John W. Dorsey to it. On the 4th of January, 1881, Brady made another order, which is 35 O, defense, on page 3294:

From January 20, 1881, change service so as to embrace and begin at Wilcox, omitting Tres Alamos, decreasing the distance 30 miles, and deduct from contractor's pay $2,149.03 per annum, being pro rata.

In his testimony-in-chief, on page 3398, Brady said:

Q. Do you remember anything in regard to the route known as the Tres Alamos and Clifton route, and the curtailment of the service at Wilcox and the carrying of the mail by the railroad company for the contractors prior to the time of its being carried as railroad service, and if you know anything on the subject, state what do you remember in regard to it?—A. Well, we had some difficulty in getting the railroad company upon its first construction to carry the mail. They claimed that they were only running construction trains, and did not wish to carry the mail until they put on their regular passenger trains. The terminus of the route was subsequently changed to Wilcox under a general regulation, or law, enabling us to change the terminus of a route upon a railroad from one point to another to better the service. It was changed from Tres Alamos to Wilcox.

Q. Did you personally do anything with reference to getting railway service between Tres Alamos and Wilcox before it was finally expedited; and, if so, state what you did?—A. Yes, sir; we had some correspondence with Mr. Huntington about it, and I believe once, when in New York, I spoke to Mr. Huntington personally about it.

Q. Who was Mr. Huntington?—A. He was the principal man, the president or manager, I do not know which, of the Southern Pacific Railroad. They did not wish to carry the mail, as I said, until they were running their regular trains. We finally made a peremptory order and by that means forced them to carry it.

Gentlemen, I think the railroad company could have made a better bargain with the contractors under Brady than to have taken the service at the regular railroad mail-service price.

On the 11th of February, 1881, Brady made another order, which is marked 36 O, defense, and found on page 3295:

From February 20, 1881, increase service four (4) trips per week, and allow contractor $15,950.62 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

The order in this case, I submit to your honor, under our construction of the law, having first been an order to increase the trips and then granting expedition, and finally increasing the trips again, based upon the old increase, and allowing this large sum, was an illegal order, because it carried with it the amount given for expedition. The increase was made on five petitions, filed in June, 1879, and a letter from Ray P. Eaton, assistant superintendent of the railway mail service, which is marked 33 O, defense, and found on page 3293:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Camp Grant, Arizona, Dec. 28, 1880.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Asst. P. M. General:

SIR: The mail route 40113, from Tres Alamos to Clifton, should be curtailed to embrace and begin at Wilcox, omitting Tres Alamos, decreasing distance 28 miles.

There is great need of a daily mail on this route from Wilcox as far as Camp Thomas, a distance of sixty-seven miles.

I ask you to bear in mind the position of Wilcox and Camp Thomas.

The route supplies a very fine stock country, in which are a great many ranches, besides the military posts, whose mail is large and important, and should by all means be extended to Globe, by San Carlos Indian Agency, daily.

On former occasions I have urged the establishment of service from Camp Thomas by San Carlos to Globe, a distance of 70 miles, and I now respectfully renew the recommendation.

The business of Globe and San Carlos is principally with the East, and the mail for those points should leave the railroad at Wilcox, saving in distance at least 100 miles, and over one of the best natural roads in the country, instead of being packed over the mountains from Florence.

Norton & Stewart run a tri-weekly line of four-horse coaches from Wilcox to Camp Thomas via Camp Grant, and a buckboard from Thomas to Globe, but will put on coaches the entire distance if service be ordered.

Globe is an old mining camp and contains nearly 3,000 persons; has fifteen large stores, one bank, and two weekly newspapers, but until recently has not kept apace with the times, partly because of lack of proper mail facilities and of the great and rapid development of the Tombstone district.

Recently, however, Eastern capitalists have turned their attention to Globe, the result of which is largely increased business and the consequent demand for increased mail facilities.

This should and will be the important route into the Globe district, and whatever may be the merits of the Tucson or Florence routes there can be no question but this, in point of business importance and in economy of service, is vastly superior.

It would be more advantageous to the department if the whole line could be operated as one route with a schedule of 28 hours' running time; but if not that, a schedule of 14 hours from Thomas to Globe should be required.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RAY P. EATON,
Asst. Supt. R. M. S.

Gentlemen, the order in this case was introduced by the defense, and this letter was introduced by the defense, because the letter was in the jacket upon which Brady made his order. Now, let me explain it to you, so that you will understand it. He speaks in the letter of a mail from Wilcox up to Camp Thomas. Camp Thomas was a post having four or five companies stationed at it, and a company in the United States service generally amounts to about forty or fifty men. He says that there ought to be a mail to Globe. Look on your map and you will not find Globe there. He was speaking of the other route I told you about, that ran over the same ground from Tres Alamos to Camp Grant, and then cut off to the left again and went to the mining camp called Globe. Over here to the right, where Clifton is, is a range of mountains. Down that range of mountains Indians come, periodically, and go right straight through into Mexico, as they are doing at this very day. Mr. Steele, who was brought here and examined, never saw a man who had come from Clifton. There never was a man who had come from Clifton that was down on his end of the route, because it was as much as a man's life was worth to go up beyond Safford. That is the statement that was made upon the stand. This railway mail officer was telling Brady how to arrange the other route, that was practicable and was safe; but that had nothing to do with this route. The letter was put into the jacket on which this order was made, and it was made by Brady the basis of his increase in ordering the four additional trips. He ought to have known, and he could have known, because there are no better maps in the country than the maps of the Post-Office Department, that Eaton was not talking about this route from Tres Alamos to Clifton. Clifton was a Mexican mining camp, away over to the right, as I have described. There were a number of petitions inserted in that jacket from people residing in Clifton. I think it is stated that one petition was signed with one hundred names in one instance, and probably the same number in other instances; but at all events, as Mr. Steele testified, and as the records will show, between Wilcox and Grant there was only one family, and after leaving Grant there was not a soul until Safford was reached, and after reaching Safford they went on to Camp Thomas with a buck-board. The best way to find out the value of the route is to ascertain what amount of mail matter is carried over it. What did the Government receive? If Clifton was a rising mining district, into which people were pouring by thousands, certainly those people would want to write some letters to their friends, and would want to receive letters; and as Clifton was on the other side of the mountain, it is a question whether they did not get their mail by another route. [Exhibiting map.] Here is a red line drawn across from Clifton, which shows that there was one trip a week from that point somewhere. I turn to the statement of the revenues on page 2759, and I find that the Government received from Clifton $76.05. That was the gross amount of revenue. The net revenue from Clifton was $50.82. I judge Clifton by the amount of the revenue that was received. If the amount was only $76.05 gross, and after taking off the expenses the net amount was only $50.82, I would not think it was a very great place. We could not get anybody who had been there, and I do not know that it would be safe for anybody to try to go there.

On that route Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay, and finally Bosler took all the warrants. The original pay was $1,568, and it was increased up to $27,913.59. We have no means of showing you how much they paid the subcontractors, for there was no subcontract on file. We see by the papers that there must have been a subcontractor, but we do not know the amount that the subcontractor received. We do know that this route was jumped from $1,568 to $27,913.59. Mr. Brady has told you in his testimony: "I did not regard the revenues. The Tres Alamos and Clifton route was rather a small affair." I will give you the total and entire revenue on this route. The entire revenue, in 1879, of every office on the route was $403.42. I have not taken off the intermediate places, because that is not worth while. In 1880 the entire revenue was $513.41. In 1881 the entire revenue was $789.12, including Wilcox, Camp Grant, Camp Thomas, Safford, Clifton, and every office upon the route. And yet, for receiving that amount of money into the Treasury of the United States Brady brought the allowance up to $27,913.59.

I call your attention to the overt acts that are alleged in the indictment. Here is the oath. [Exhibiting it.] It is marked on the back May 8, 1879. It was used in the jacket on which Brady made his order on the 3d of June. There it is [exhibiting it], accompanying the affidavit. In that jacket were the petitions that I have shown to you. One was written by Stephen W. Dorsey. Rerdell saw him write it. One was written by Mr. Sibbald, and the other was written by James W. Donnelly. These were the papers upon which Brady based that order reducing the time and increasing the trips; and subsequently upon the letter that I have read to you, coming from Mr. Eaton, a railway-mail inspector, calling his attention to the fact that there ought to be mail service out the other way to Globe, he made the other increase of January 4, 1881. There it is, Mr. Foreman, and the correct date is mentioned in the indictment. [Exhibiting order.] I only want to satisfy you that there is no mistake about the dates, although, as I told you, the date does not make any difference, providing the act was done after the 20th of May, 1879.

38140, TRINIDAD TO MADISON, COLORADO.

[Maps distributed.] This route originally ran straight across from Barela to Trinidad. Afterwards it was altered, and went around so as to embrace Raton.

This was another route taken by Dorsey in the division. It was 45 miles long, there was one trip a week, and the time was thirteen hours. John R. Miner was the contractor, and the pay was $338. The official orders are:

June 6, 1878, order to embrace Raton.

September 18, 1878, letter from Postmaster De Busk.

November 13, 1878, order by French.

April 21, 1879, letter of Chaffee.

April 22, 1879, order for increase of service.

April 26, 1879, oath of John W. Dorsey.

April 28, 1879, letter of J. W. Dorsey.

May 5, 1879, letter to change address.

May 9, 1879, order for expedition.

May 10, 1879, letter with additional petitions.

November 11, 1879, subcontract of S. W. Dorsey filed.

December 6, 1880, S. W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract.

Now, to go back again and take the papers. On the 6th of June, 1878, Brady ordered Raton embraced on the route without increase of distance or pay. That is 3 E, found on page 1028. On the 18th of September, 1878, Postmaster DeBusk wrote a letter to Brady about having a supply from the railroad. It is on 2 E, on page 1027:

RATON, LAS ANIMAS COUNTY, COLORADO.

September 18, 1878.

To the POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

DEAR SIR: A post-office was established at this place in March last and I was appointed postmaster. This office was established to accommodate the lowermost section of a rich valley thirty-five miles in length, extending eastward from the town of Trinidad, but no mail service has yet been ordered.

The community to be accommodated has for two years past received their mail from Trinidad, twenty-two miles distant, in a private sack at great inconvenience.

The people here (cattle men mostly) have business transactions to the extent of certainly not less than $50,000 annually. They have one school and church building, costing $2,000; one high school, fifty-one pupils enrolled; one resident clergyman; well improved farms, with Government title, etc.

The newly finished branch of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad passes within ten miles of Raton post-office. Pulaski post-office is twelve miles distant from Raton, was directly on this line of railroad.

The object of this communication is to petition for mail service twice a week, if not from any central point to Raton, at least from Pulaski post-office, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, to Raton, a distance of twelve miles.

Very respectfully,

S. W. DEBUSK.

Postmaster.

CENTRAL CITY, COLO, September 23, 1878.

Respectfully requested that prayer of this petition be granted and the service increased as asked for.

H. M. TELLER.

You see the petition asked to have Raton connected with Pulaski on the railroad. Brady made an order to embrace Raton on this route without increase of distance and without increase of pay. On the 13th of November, 1878, French made an order. It is 10 E, found on page 1031:

Modify order of June 6, 1878, number 4215 so as to increase distance twenty-three miles, and contractor's pay $172.75 per annum, being pro rata.

This was French's order allowing them pay, after Raton had been put on the route without pay. The next in order is a letter on the 21st of April, 1879, from J. B. Chaffee. It is 8 E, on page 1031. Gentlemen, it seems to me we will never get done with letters from Mr. Chaffee. I showed you one he sent from New York that was marked at the head "April 23," and was filed in the Post Office Department April 22, a day before it was written. I have shown you other letters from J. B. Chaffee. Here comes still another one on this route. This letter was written by John A. Sibbald, the man whose name I mentioned in connection with the other routes, who was writing petitions.

The COURT. The letter is in the handwriting of Sibbald.

Mr. KER. Sibbald. We do not say Mr. Chaffee did not sign it, because we do not know; but we do know that it was written by Sibbald, and that is the third or fourth letter from Chaffee that has appeared in the case. They are all about the same date, the 21st, 22d, and 23d of April. On April 22, 1879, Brady ordered:

Increase service two trips from May 1, 1879, and allow contractor $1,021.50 per annum additional.

You see Mr. Chaffee's letter was of some use. It brought two additional trips. That made the total number of trips three. On the 26th of April, 1879, the oath of John W. Dorsey was made. It is 6 E, found on page 1029. [Exhibiting it.] Miner was the contractor, and John W. Dorsey signed the oath as subcontractor. I want to recall to your attention the fact that Rerdell at that time was out in Denver, Colorado. I think there can be no mistake about that, because I have shown you that he wrote letters that Governor Pitkin signed on the 28th of April. Kellogg wrote the body of that oath. Rerdell wrote in the word "twelve" after it was filed in the Post-Office Department. I will read you what he says on page 2336:

Q. I hand you 6 E, and ask you in whose handwriting that is. That is an oath?—
A. Yes, sir. The body of this was written by W. F. Kellogg. The signature of it is that of John W. Dorsey. The figures "38140," the word "three," the words "one," "four," "three," "three," "eleven," and the word "subcontractor," were written by S. W. Dorsey. The word "twelve" was written by myself.

Q. Were those things written in by Dorsey written before or after the signature of John W. Dorsey, do you know?—A. No, sir; I can't testify to that. The word "twelve" that I wrote in was written afterwards, and after it was filed in the Post-Office Department.

Q. After it was filed in the Post-Office Department—how came that?—A. The schedule that was contemplated was a longer schedule than twelve hours, and they were told that they had to bring it down to twelve hours.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that.

Q. Who told you that?—A. Mr. Turner.

Q. You were told that at the Post-Office Department; what then was done?—A. He handed me this and I erased. I think, the word "fifteen" and put in "twelve."

Q. Where was that done?—A. That was done in room 22, Post-Office Department.

Q. Is there more than one room 22 in the Post-Office Department?—A. I forget what floor it is on, but it is on the same floor where the contract offices are generally located; it is the second story above the street, I believe.

S. W. Dorsey testified in regard to this, on page 3944:

Q. Trinidad to Madison. I had that affidavit, had I not?—A. No.

Mr. MERRICK. There is one of these routes upon which he was subcontractor or contractor; I have forgotten which.

The WITNESS. That is the one which you have just had. There was a subcontract in his name, but it was not filed.

Q. There was a subcontract in his name, but it was not filed?—A. I think so.

Q. You say that subcontract was not on file?—A. I think not, though I don't know.

Q. Did you not have a subcontract on that route yourself?—A. Perhaps I did.

Q. Who was the contractor?—A. I think Mr. Miner was. It was a matter of great surprise to me when these proceedings began—in fact, I never did understand it—to find an affidavit signed by John W. Dorsey. I think, upon inquiry, Rerdell told me that he was subcontractor.

Q. You got the benefit of the affidavit, did you not?

The WITNESS. What benefit?

Mr. MERRICK. The benefit of the increase that was allowed on it—expedition?—A. I got my part of it, I suppose, if there was any benefit.

John W. Dorsey says in speaking of this, on page 4142:

Q. Let me show you another paper. [Submitting 6 E.] I want to refresh your recollection about these things. Did you sign that?—A. Yes, sir; that is my signature.

Q. This is an affidavit, as follows:

Then the affidavit was read.

What interest had you in that route at that time?—A. I don't know, sir, that I had any. I know I did not have any.

Q. Were you subcontractor?—A. That I don't know.

Q. And did not know then, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did not you yourself transmit that affidavit to the Post-Office Department?—

A. No, sir; I never transmitted one there, and never corresponded with the department nor wrote them a line in my life.

Q. Is that affidavit true in reference to the number of men required at the time to perform the service on existing schedule?—A. I believed it was so, or I would not have sworn to it.

Q. What ground had you for your belief?—A. I don't know as I can state the ground. I believed it was correct. I had no object in swearing any different from the truth, so far as I knew or believed it to be true.

Q. Had you any object in swearing that that was true about which you did not know anything at all?—A. If I had confidence in another man I would accept his statement.

Q. Who was the other man?—A. Mr. Rerdell.

Q. You accepted his statement?—A. I accepted his judgment in the matter. If I made a mistake it was my fault, that is all.

Q. Look at the signature to the paper now handed you (5 E), and state whether Rerdell told you to swear to that?—A. I presume he asked me to.

Q. What is your recollection about it? I do not ask your presumptions.—A. That is my recollection, that he sent them all to me.

Q. Sent them all to you?—A. Yes, all that I swore to up in Vermont and those here, I think. I have no recollection of anybody else, unless my recollection could be refreshed.

Q. Did you not send affidavits in blank as he asked you?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Have you any recollection about it?—A. He told me last summer I did not.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not asking about that. You have been told not to speak of what he told you.

The WITNESS. I beg pardon

Mr. MERRICK. I move that that answer be struck out.

The COURT. Yes, it is improper, of course. But still, if the witness's own recollection has been revived by any circumstance, then he may swear now what the fact was.

Mr. MERRICK. Unquestionably he can state the fact from his revived recollection, but not the circumstance that revived it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, I do not see why he would not have the right to state what was told him about this business during the last trial.

The COURT. He may state that in consequence of a conversation he had with somebody his recollection was revived, and may swear to the fact now. But he has no right to say what the other party told him.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Independent evidence.

Q. Have you any recollection at all about that paper.

The WITNESS. What one?

Mr. MERRICK. The one I just handed you, marked, I think, 6 E, and I will hand it to you again. I do not want your recollection of what somebody may have told you, but your own recollection of that paper?—A. No, sir; I cannot say that I have.

By the COURT:

Q. You say you have no recollection?—A. I have no recollection of any particular case. I never expected my attention to be called to it again, and after I signed them I supposed that was the last of it.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Do you swear that you signed that at Rerdell's request?—A. I don't say that. Let me look at it again. [The paper was handed to the witness again.]

Mr. MERRICK. That was signed before Kellogg.

The WITNESS. I would not say in regard to that.

Q. Can you say that you swore to it of your own knowledge?—A. No, I don't know that; I won't say that.

Q. Did you have any knowledge?—A. As I said before, I do not claim to have any particular knowledge in regard to it.

Q. Did you swear to it at the request of S. W. Dorsey?—A. I don't remember that he ever asked me to swear to it.

Q. At whose request did you swear to it?—A. Well, sir, I could not say.

Q. Were you swearing at the suggestion of various people?—A. Mr. Rerdell is the only man I recollect of having anything to do with that. He had the whole control and management of the business here, and I did not suppose he would ask me to do anything but what was right.

Q. No matter about your suppositions. Where was Rerdell in April, 1879?—A. I don't know, sir.

Q. You were here, were you not, in April, 1879?—A. I think so. I suppose he was here.

Q. Were you here?—A. I was here part of the time, and I don't know but I was all the time. I can't tell now about it anyway. I went home and back and home again, and I can't tell, just the dates, anything about it.

Q. What were you doing passing back and forward between here and your home?—A. I was waiting to have this thing closed up.

Q. Was it not closed up before the 26th of April?—A. Yes; and I came back here and expected to go West and see about some routes, but finally did not go as I expected, as it was not closed up, and went home again.

Q. You had got out of business, had you not?—A. Yes; but they wanted me to go out and sublet some routes that were going to be put back on their hands the 1st of July.

Q. Who did?—A. My brother.

On the 28th of April, 1879, there was a letter from J. W. Dorsey transmitting the oath. It is found on page 1029, 5 E:

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1879.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to submit my proposition to carry the mails upon a faster schedule from Trinidad to Madison. The roads over this route, like most mountain roads, are very rough and the mails heavy. There is a very heavy mail passing over this route, and I believe it ought to be made daily.

Yours, truly,

JOHN W. DORSEY.

[5 E was handed to the jury.]

In this it says:

I believe it ought to be made daily. Yours, truly, John W. Dorsey.

Stephen W. Dorsey signed that letter and Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that letter.

On page 2336:

Q. I hand you 5 E, relating to the route from Trinidad to Madison.

Mr. MERRICK. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. KER. This is the testimony of Rerdell:

Q. I hand you 5 E, relating to the route from Trinidad to Madison.—A. All of this, including the signature of John W. Dorsey, was written by S. W. Dorsey.

Q. When you say it was written by S. W. Dorsey, do you speak from your knowledge of his handwriting or from your knowledge of the fact?—A. It is from my particular knowledge of his handwriting and the circumstances connected with it.

Q. When you spoke just now of the signature of Peck to the proposal being written by S. W. Dorsey, did you state it from your knowledge of his handwriting or from any other fact?—A. From my knowledge of his handwriting and from the manner in which he signed Peck's name in my presence.

Mr. Boone also testified in the same connection.

The COURT. Mr. Ker, was S. W. Dorsey's attention called to that?

Mr. KER. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. I did not call his attention to it myself, your honor recollects, because——

Mr. KER. [Interposing.] Was his attention called to this writing?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. KER. No; his attention was not called to it. I understood that the agreement of counsel was that where Mr. Dorsey denied nothing we were not to waste time to interrogate him.

The COURT. Of course it was the duty of the other side.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I did not understand, your honor.

The COURT. I say that if the testimony of Rerdell in regard to this paper was to be contradicted it devolved on the other side to do so. I simply wanted to know whether they had called his attention to it.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; he was not asked about that at all.

Mr. KER. On the 5th of May, 1879, there was a general letter from Miner to address communications to care of Rerdell, box 706.

On the 9th of May, 1879, Brady made an order (4 E, page 1028):

From May 9, 1879, reduce running time from 19 $\frac{3}{4}$ hours to 12 hours, and allow contractor \$2,758.05 per annum additional pay.

The explanation of reducing it from nineteen and three-quarter hours to twelve hours is this: You know it had started at thirteen. Then Raton was placed upon the route, without increase of distance or pay. Then French made an order to increase the distance and increase the pay. Then there was a schedule changing the time, and they allowed nineteen and three-quarter hours to carry the mail. Along comes this order from Brady to reduce it from nineteen and three-quarters down to twelve, so that practically it was brought one hour below what it started at. Brady testified in regard to this, at page 3416:

Q. Having made that order putting Raton upon that route and increasing it twenty-three miles, when the paper upon which it was made showed that it could be connected with another route more conveniently by an increase of only ten or twelve miles, though that order was made by Mr. French in the following May, how did it happen that by order 4 E you granted expedition over that extended route instead of detaching Raton from the Trinidad and Madison route, and placing it upon the route where Senator Teller asked that it should go?—A. It seems that Senator Chaffee and Mr. Belford asked for this.

Q. They asked expedition; but how did it happen that you left Raton upon that route, when it appeared affirmatively that the original idea was wrong that no increased pay or distance would be made thereby, but that twenty-three miles of increase was made, and you made an expedition which gave increased pay over that twenty-three miles also?—A. In all probability Raton got a better supply this way than it would have got by what was asked by the postmaster.

Q. Do you know that as a fact?—A. I presume that to be the fact.

Q. Do you not believe that when the postmaster asked for service in a particular way he knew how they would get it the best?—A. I do not know that he would; he ought to.

On the next page, 3417:

Q. You do not remember much about it?—A. No.

Q. Upon that route from Trinidad to Madison, six trips a week could, under the contract, have been given at $2,068; you made it three trips, and reduced the time from nineteen hours to twelve hours, at an expense of $4,290, thereby paying $2,222 more than would have been necessary for six trips a week?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that kind of a question unless the witness has time to make a calculation.

Mr. BLISS. I have no objection to his having all the time he wants.

Q. Can you give any reason for that?—A. To make it fast instead of frequent trips. The same reason would obtain with all these. Very frequently it would be much better to make a fast service than a frequent service, and it seems to have been asked by Belford and Chaffee that it should be made fast.

Q. Before you put Raton upon that route and extended the time, the time was only thirteen hours; then you put on Raton and extended the time to nineteen hours—

The WITNESS. [Interposing.] What has that got to do with it?

Mr. BLISS. Wait a minute until I finish my question.

Q. [Continuing.]—and then made a service to reduce the time to twelve hours?

The WITNESS. Had not the distance been increased twenty-three miles?

Q. Why did you not transfer Raton to the route that the postmaster and Senator Teller asked, and then leave the route as a thirteen-hour route without expedition, and save this $4,200?

Then there was some objection made by Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Wilson, who came to Brady's assistance in the matter.

Mr. WILSON. Leave that out and read on.

Mr. KER. The question was asked over again:

Q. Why did you not transfer Raton to the route that the postmaster and Senator Teller asked, and then leave the route as a thirteen-hour route without expedition, and save this $4,200?

A. As I said at the outset, I remember very little about this matter. The probability is that Raton having been added, the twenty-three miles were there, and the expedition was asked for afterwards, and urged, it would appear, with considerable persistence, and it was granted—granted for the reasons stated in the petitions, and upon the recommendations of Senator Chaffee and Mr. Belford. The original reasons for putting Raton on the route, instead of doing as the postmaster suggested, I do not know, unless it was to give direct communication with the county seat. After it was once on a route increased twenty-three miles, if they wanted faster time, the fact that Raton had been put on would not militate against reducing the time again.

Q. If you had taken Raton off you would have left the time a fast time without paying $4,000 for doing it?—A. Yes; but it seems we did not take Raton off.

Q. You did not do that. Do you know why?—A. I do not. Probably that way of doing it never suggested itself to us.

Mr. BLISS. I think it very probable, because it was a way of saving money.

Then, on page 3433:

Q. On this route from Trinidad to Madison, so far as you know, you made the order which you had in your hand just now, upon the affidavit of a person whom you did not know was even a subcontractor, did you?—A. I did not say that. I say that the jacket there appears to be regular, and there is a statement on the jacket that John W. Dorsey was the subcontractor.

Q. And you accepted that?—A. Certainly. It was made by Turner, and Turner was a very careful corresponding clerk, and I would accept any statement he would make on a jacket.

It seems that he did.

On the 10th of May, 1879, Miner sent a letter to Brady with additional petitions for increase. That is 63 E, defense, and is found at page 3251. One of these was dated May 5, 1879. I will read 63 E to you:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10th, 1879.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,
2d Ass't P. M. Gen'l:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith additional petition asking for increase of service on route 38140, from Trinidad to Madison, Col., and to request that it be placed on file.

Respectfully,

JNO. R. MINER.

In that was 65 E, page 3251:

TRINIDAD, COLO., May 5th, 1879.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,
2d Asst. P. M. General, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: I have this day forwarded a pition to you throug Hon. S. W. Dorsey for an increase of mail service between Trinidad, Colorado, and Madison, N. M. For one hundred miles SE. of Madison, the people have to goe to that point for their mail, and when it onely arrives once a week it inconveniences the settlers very much. The country along the line is settling up very fast and the public demand it.

I suppose you ar bothered so much with patitions that it takes a grate deal of your time.

I hope you will consider this one and favor us as we ar an isolated people and can onely appeal to you for assistance. With the wishes of mny for your prompt action in the matter,

I remain, respectfully,

W. G. RIFENBURG.

You see his petition was to come through S. W. Dorsey. You remember that Brady, in his testimony, in speaking about the reason why he reduced the time upon this route, spoke about the strong recommendation that Mr. Chaffee had given, and I called your attention to the fact that the "strong recommendation" of Mr. Chaffee was one of a series that had been prepared by Mr. Sibbald. Now, along comes a letter, through the mediuin of S. W. Dorsey, dated the 10th of May. Miner wrote that letter and signed it.

On the 11th of November, 1879, a subcontract of S. W. Dorsey was filed, dated April 1, 1879. Rerdell signed as a witness.

Then, on the 6th of December, 1880, S. W. Dorsey withdrew his subcontract.

On the 8th of February, 1881, there was a letter from Miner to Burgner, with his pay, and on the 30th of July, 1881, Miner sent another letter to Burgner with his pay. These letters not having been denied by Miner when he was on the stand, he not having taken the trouble to state whether they were or not his letters, and as his name is attached to them, I suppose there can be no difficulty in assuming that they are his. If a man is charged with a matter, and does not take the trouble to deny it, we can certainly assume it. Gentlemen, here is the letter of John R. Miner, dated in 1881, although, as he says, the route was taken by Dorsey.

Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey drew the pay, and J. W. Bosler drew the pay. Miner signed the drafts. He says he signed them previous to May 5, 1879, but they answered all the way through the contract term.

Now, I want to call your attention to some of the testimony in the case, and to our claim about Raton. We claim that putting Raton on this route was illegal, because the law says that there can be no office added to a route costing a greater sum than two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster. The pay of the postmaster was $12 a year. DeBusk testified that when expedition was ordered he made no close connection with any mail at the terminal points. When Raton was added the time was thirteen hours; then the time was brought up to nineteen and three-quarter hours, adding on Raton. You will remember that the request was not to put Raton on this route, but to give it connection with the railroad. The pay for adding Raton was first $172.75 a year, which was considerably over what the postmaster received; then the schedule was reduced to twelve hours, and the pay for the reduction was $2,758.05, which, added to the $172.75, makes $2,930.80. Gentlemen, the cost of carrying the mail to Raton was to the Government exactly $2,930.80.

The pay on this route originally was only $338; it was increased to $4,290.30. The subcontractor received $1,550. And that left Vaile, Dorsey, Miner, and those who were in this conspiracy, the sum of $2,740.30 clear profit. And Mr. Brady said, as I have read to you: "I do not think I considered the amount of mail, the productiveness, or the revenue, to any extent." Let us see what the entire amount was.

Trinidad was on the railroad. In 1879 the entire receipts, including Trinidad, were $3,718.18; throwing off Trinidad, which was on the railroad, the entire receipts were $168.09. That was in 1879.

In 1880, throwing off Trinidad, the entire receipts were $120.66.

In 1881, throwing off Trinidad, the entire receipts were $137.35.

Gentlemen, the letters stated "the country is rapidly settling up." I will show you, on the theory I offered to you the other day, that the "settling" portions were only a drain upon the others. In 1879 the receipts were $168.09. In 1880 the receipts were $120.66. There was a falling off. And in 1881 the receipts were $137.35. That is less than they were in 1879.

46132, JULIAN TO COLTON, CALIFORNIA.

[Maps handed to the jury.]

This was one of the routes that Vaile and Miner took in the division. It was one hundred and twenty-one miles long; there was one trip a week, and the time was fifty-four hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $1,188. Miner wrote the proposal; John W. Dorsey wrote "District of Columbia;" Rerdell filled in the amounts; and Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to it. A good beginning. The official orders are:

October 1, 1878, letter from Brady to Hayes.

November 2, 1878, letter to withdraw subcontract.

December 12, 1878, Auditor notified of Hayes's withdrawal.

December 30, 1878, date of Peck's oath.

December 30, 1878, letter of Peck with proposal.

April 11, 1879, oath and proposal filed.

May 24, 1879, Vaile filed his subcontract.

June 24, 1879, Brady ordered increase and expedition.

To go back and take the testimony upon the route:

On the 18th of May, 1879, there was a subcontract made with J. Chauncey Hayes.

On the 9th of July, 1878, there was a letter from Miner, Peck & Co. to Hayes. That is 20 P, and is found at page 1822.

The COURT. Have you a copy of the advertisement for proposals?

Mr. MERRICK. There was one here this morning.

Mr. WILSON. There are two in evidence.

Mr. KER. [Reading:]

[Miner, Peck & Co., mail contractors. John R. Miner, John M. Peck, John W. Dorsey. Branch office, Washington, D. C. Care lock-box 714.]

DENVER, COLO., July 9, 1878.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES, Esq.,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 29th ultimo received. We replied to former letter with regard to change of contract immediately upon its receipt. We wish to do all that is fair and just. Had we been asked to consent to the change in the contract when sent to us we should have declined, as we had offers for Descanso route at loss of only $12 per annum, while you ask us to lose $45 per annum.

With regard to increase of 40132, our contract specifies rate of pay. In case of increase we do not care to go on making new bargains for four years, and are surprised that you as a business man should ask it.

Truly, yours,

MINER, PECK & CO.

John R. Miner wrote that letter.

On the 3d of August, 1878, there was another letter from Miner, Peck & Co. (21 P, page 1822):

[Miner, Peck & Co., mail contractors. John R. Miner, John M. Peck, John W. Dorsey.]

WASHINGTON, August 3, 1878.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES, Esq.,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 23d received. Increases can only be obtained by our joint efforts. They are based upon petitions from the citizens along the route, but it requires active work here to consummate them; therefore, according to the terms of the contract, the benefits are to be shared.

We are willing to increase your compensation $12 per year, which is just what it would have cost us had your error been made known to us in time. This is really more than could be claimed, as the change made in your copy of the contract was without our knowledge or consent.

As we shall keep an office in this city no delay will occur by corresponding through us, and as you are not known on the records of the department it is necessary to so correspond.

Truly, yours,

MINER, PECK & CO.

That is signed by John R. Miner, and this was Peck's route. And he says:

Increases can only be obtained by our joint efforts.

Miner testified in regard to that, on page 4274 :

Q. Look at 21 P, and tell me if that is in your handwriting ?—A. It is.

Mr. HENKLE. What is it ?

Mr. MERRICK. It is a letter addressed to Hayes, bearing date August 3, 1878.

The WITNESS. I don't think it is 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. 1878.

The WITNESS. Possibly.

Q. What do you mean in this letter to Hayes by saying :

"Increases can only be obtained by our joint effort. They are based upon petitions from citizens along the route, but it requires active work here to consummate them."

What do you mean by "active work here?"—A. I mean what I said.

Q. You mean active work, and that is all you have to explain?—A. That is all.

On September 9, 1878, there is a letter written by Scipio Craig (48 P, defense, page 3300). I am exceedingly obliged to my friends for putting that in. We could not have done it. It was their defense, and, as I wish to be entirely fair in the matter, I am giving you both sides.

COLTON, SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY, CAL., Sept. 9, 1878.

Gen. T. J. BRADY,

2d Asst. P. M. Gen'l, Washington :

Inclosed find blank sent me in reference to proposed change of schedule on route 46132, which has been properly filled up and signed.

I also send you petitions for an increase of service from one to three times a week, and strongly and conscientiously recommend it. There are between 1,500 and 2,000 people who will be benefited by the change.

Please give the matter as early a hearing as possible.

Respectfully,

SCIPIO CRAIG, P. M.

You know that Scipio Craig was a friend of Hayes, and had also been a schoolmate with Brady.

On the 19th of September, 1878, there is another letter of Miner, Peck & Co. (22 P, page 1822) :

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19, 1878.

J. C. HAYES, Esq.,

San Luis Rey, Cal. :

DEAR SIR: Yours 1st and 4th received. Increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here and considerable expense. Your ideas as to how things are managed are very erroneous. You seem to fancy that everything is done on the route and nothing here, which is quite a mistake.

No change in distance affects pay unless by the establishment of a new office or the removal of the site of an office, increasing the distance, in which case certificates of the increase in distance should be made by postmasters each side of new office, or by postmaster where site is changed. The only office established since contract was made is Powell's Store, next after Julian. No office has been discontinued.

Truly, yours,

MINER, PECK & CO.

This was also written by John R. Miner, and his testimony in regard to it is found on page 4274 :

Q. Look at 22 P, and tell me if that is in your handwriting.—A. That is in my writing.

Q. What do you mean in this letter, which is a letter to Hayes of the 19th of September, 1878, by these words :

"Increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here and considerable expense."

A. I meant precisely what I said.

Q. "Never ordered without considerable expense here?"—A. I meant precisely what the letter said.

Q. Precisely what it said?—A. Yes, sir. If you want to know the circumstances under which that letter was written I can tell you.

Q. You can make any explanation you want. I want to know what you meant by saying "considerable expense?"—A. I can explain the whole matter. Mr. Hayes had a postmaster out there by the name of Scipio Craig, who was a schoolmate of "Tom Brady," as he called him, and he thought that anything he asked, whether reasonable or not, could be done.

Q. And you wanted to satisfy him that it could not?—A. I wanted to satisfy him that it required the indorsements of his members of Congress from California, and there is another letter in the case that so states.

Q. Is that your only explanation?—A. That is all.

Q. What did you mean by considerable expense?—A. I was at the expense of living here.

Q. You meant that?—A. I did.

Q. Then if you were at the expense of living here, and you meant that only, why did you refer to the expense in connection with increased speed, and say that increased speed required special labor here and considerable expense?—A. Because his letter that that was a reply to related only to increased speed.

Q. That is your explanation, is it?—A. That is my explanation, sir.

Q. That is your explanation of why you told him that increased speed required considerable expense here?—A. Yes, sir; and furthermore, Mr. Hayes was of the opinion that if any expedition was ordered on that route he ought to have it all, and I was trying to make a good trade with him.

Q. You wanted to make him believe you were at heavy expense in order to appreciate your services and to depreciate his?—A. I did, sir.

Q. That is, you wanted to deceive him, did you?—A. It would so appear.

Q. Is it a fact?—A. I think it is.

Q. Then when you said that it required expense here you told him a lie, did you?—A. Well, sir, I was not under oath when I wrote that letter.

Q. You will lie when you are not under oath, will you?—A. I have not said that I would.

Q. You have said that you told that lie and that you were not under oath.—A. I generally make the best trade I can.

Q. When you are under oath as well as when you are not, don't you?—A. No, sir; I think there are a good many other people that make the best trades they can also.

Then, on the 1st of October, 1878, there was a letter from Brady to Hayes telling him that his subcontract was put on file. Brady wrote to the friend of his old schoolmate telling him that his subcontract had been put on file. As it is rather a formal letter, it is not worth while reading it. He did not want to encourage his old schoolmate, so he wrote a very formal and stiff letter.

October 9, 1878, there was a letter from Miner, Peck & Co. to Hayes (23 P, page 1823):

"WASHINGTON, October 9, 1878.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 29th received, with inclosures.

Your informant is mistaken, or rather you got an incorrect idea from him. An increase of service, that is, from weekly to tri-weekly, increases contractor's pay pro rata. An expedition of service, that is, making the schedule time two days instead of three, is paid for in proportion to the increased number of men and animals employed. Expedition is not ordered except on important routes. Shall be pleased to answer all the questions you care to ask.

Truly, yours,

MINER, PECK & CO.

That is also in the handwriting of and signed by John R. Miner.

Then, on the 2d of November, 1878, we have 24 P, page 1823:

WASHINGTON, November 2, 1878.

J. C. HAYES,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Paying direct—

There is a word torn out here—department makes them extra work and delays settlement. Please sign and return inclosed application, and we can pay you more promptly.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. PECK.

This was also written and signed by Miner.

Then, on the 2d of November, 1878, there is a letter from Peck and Hayes to withdraw Hayes's subcontract. Miner signed Peck's name to that letter.

At last Miner had accomplished what he was working for. He got Hayes, who had a subcontract entitling him to receive the pay for expedition, to release that contract, withdraw it from the department, and enter into a new one. You see Miner was anxious at the beginning of the term to get service on, and made a bad bargain with Hayes, but at that time he had done the best he could. He was now only waiting to get Hayes out of the road, so that he could get increase and expedition. When they got Hayes's subcontract off the files, got that subcontract annulled, then they could make a new subcontract with Hayes that would be satisfactory to the coconspirators.

Then, in November, 1878, Vaile steps forward and makes a new subcontract with Hayes, and with his usual shrewdness, it provided for one trip at $1,069.50; three trips on shorter schedule $4,455.

On the 11th of November, 1878, there was a letter from Miner to Hayes (25 P, page 1823:)

WASHINGTON, November 11, 187—.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES, Esq.,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 26th October—

There is another word torn out here—received. Petitions have not been acted upon yet. I fear that your friend's influence with Tom Brady, as you call him, is not strong enough, and that strong pressure and influence of California Congressmen and Senators are necessary to get increases. The fact is that all parts of the country are always pressing for more mail service, and few get it.

You have many mistaken ideas. Congress, as a body, has nothing whatever to do with the number of trips on a route. The department alone contract that.

Truly, yours,

JOHN R. MINER,
Secretary.

That is also one of Mr. Miner's letters.

Then, on the 5th of December, 1878, there was another letter, (26 P, page 1823:)

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 5, 1878.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 24th received. I inclose a form merely suggestive for petitions on route 46132. You will please enlarge it, stating all the favorable facts you can. Get as many signatures as you can speedily and return to me, then write and have all the influential people you know write to your Representative and Senators (Sargent is quite ill just now), stating the necessity for increase and expedition, and ask them to have it done. Whatever is done this year (fiscal, ending June 30) must be done speedily. 46132 is the best for you and for me. So let us work at that.

Yours, truly,

JOHN R. MINER,
Secretary.

H. M. Vaile has the management of our routes. You can learn his standing from John G. Capron, San Diego.

This letter was written and signed by Miner. They had Hayes's subcontract out of the road, and Miner sent him forms, as he says, "merely suggestive for petitions," and gave him the directions that you have heard read in that letter about stirring up the members of Congress so as to demand an increase upon this route, and he says: "46132 is the best for you and it is the best for me." I will show you, when I come to the end of it, that it was a considerably good thing for Mr. Miner.

On the 12th of December, 1878, the Auditor was notified of the withdrawal of Hayes's subcontract.

December 30, 1878, is the date of Peck's oath (7 P, page 1813). [7 P was handed to the jury.] It calls for three trips and twenty-six hours. The time was then fifty-four hours. I will ask you to look at the "twenty-six" where that occurs, and hold it up to the light so that you can see where they scratched out and wrote in the "twenty-six." Miner wrote the interlineations in that oath.

December 30, 1878, there was a letter from Peck proposing to carry the mail, one trip, twenty-six hours, for $1,782 additional, or three trips, thirty-six hours, for $7,722 additional. (6 P, page 1813.)

Gentlemen, the thirty-six that was originally written in here was scratched out and twenty-six put in. [6 P handed to the jury.] Miner wrote that letter and signed Peck's name to it.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the jury.] You will have to hold that paper up between your eyes and the light in order to see the alterations.

Mr. KER. I ask you to notice them, because I assure you it was not done when that oath and proposal were written, but afterwards, and I will show you the time, right out of Miner's own mouth and under his own hand.

Miner says, on page 4232 :

Q. Here is another affidavit. [Handing 7 P to witness.] This is on the route you spoke of, from Julian to Colton. That was one of the routes that fell to you, was it?—A. It was.

Q. Will you look at that affidavit and tell me in whose handwriting it is?—A. It is in my own, except the signatures.

Q. Whose are the signatures?—A. J. M. Peck and J. S. Taylor

Q. All the rest of it is in your handwriting?—A. All of it.

Q. Was it all written at the same time?—A. There is nothing on the face of the paper to indicate that it was not all written at the same time, so far as I can see.

Q. Do you recollect whether it was all written at the same time?—A. I recollect nothing about it.

Q. You recollect nothing about this affidavit?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not?—A. Nothing except that I find it in my handwriting.

Q. That is all?—A. That is all.

Q. I see that one word is erased. Can you tell me whether that erasure and the word over it—the word that is erased and the word above it—were not written at a different time?—A. They may or may not have been. There is nothing on the paper to indicate.

Q. Do you recollect erasing that word?—A. I do not.

Then, on page 4234 :

Q. You got an affidavit for the purpose of having it increased on the 30th of December, 1878. You wrote the affidavit in your own hand, and by some means or other it came into the possession of Peck, and he swore to it, and by some means or other it came back into your possession?—A. I have not said it came into my possession.

Q. It must have come to you, must it not?—A. Mr. Peck may have sent it direct to the department. I do not remember.

Q. Did it not come back to you or to Vaile?—A. I cannot say that it did. I don't know whether it did or not.

Q. By some means or other it appears in the department, and its effect is exclusively to benefit you five or six thousand dollars, and yet you do not know who sent it to the department?—A. Mr. Peck may have sent it to the department himself.

Q. Do you mean to swear that Peck may have sent it himself?—A. I do mean to swear that Peck may have sent it himself.

Q. Do you believe that he sent it?

The WITNESS. Do I believe that he sent it?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; do you believe that he sent it? I will ask you that on cross-examination.

A. I do not believe that he sent it.

Q. Why, then, did you say that he might have sent it? Was it to deceive the jury?—A. Because he might have sent it.

Q. By a possibility?—A. He might.

Q. Do you not know that Peck never sent any affidavit to the department?—A. I do not know that he did not.

Q. Do you not know that every affidavit sent to the department on his routes was sent either through you or some other member of your combination?—A. I do not know that.

Q. Do you know of any affidavit that he ever did send?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you not know that his health was broken down at that time?—A. I have no knowledge as to his health, except that he died in 1881, and that I have not any knowledge of, except that I have been so informed.

And on page 4235:

Q. Let me refresh your recollection by the letter.

The letter was then read:

You wrote that letter and signed Peck's name?—A. I did.

Q. Did you write it at Chico Springs?—A. I did not.

Q. What did you head it at Chico Springs for?—A. Because I chose to do so.

Q. That was right. You did pretty much what you chose, did you not?—A. I did whatever I thought was lawful and proper.

Q. Is not that the letter that transmitted the affidavit?—A. I do not know. Is there any reference to the affidavit in the letter?

Q. There is one peculiarity about that letter. Was it all written at the same time?—

A. There is nothing to indicate that it was not.

Q. This letter was filed April 11, the same date as the affidavit. I observe in the letter that there is a word struck out.—A. That often occurs in letters.

Q. It does?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I am not disposed to question that. That is the way you account for this—that it ordinarily occurs with letters?—A. I said it often occurs.

Q. Let us see if we can go a little further. This letter says:

"Colton to Julian once a week on a reduced schedule of twenty-six hours."

Twenty being written over the thirty which was there originally. The same thing occurs in the affidavit, twenty being written over thirty. It often occurs that you make a mistake in a letter. It seems here that you made a mistake in the affidavit and the letter both at the same time?—A. Yes, sir; they are both dated the same day.

Q. Both dated the same day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you made the same identical mistake in writing each?—A. It so appears.

Q. Don't you think it would be a more reasonable way to account for it to say that you changed the affidavit after it was written, and made the letter conform with the affidavit?—A. That is possible.

Q. Did you write that affidavit at the same time?—A. I do not know.

Q. I want to call your attention to a fact. Will you observe the peculiarity of the ink in which the "thirty" is written, and the peculiarity of the ink in which the "twenty" is written, and tell me if that refreshes your recollection?

Mr. HENKLE. Do you want him to reason about it?

Mr. MERRICK. No; only to refresh his memory.

Mr. HENKLE. Ask him what the fact is.

Mr. MERRICK. I am trying to refresh his recollection, which is failing.

Mr. HENKLE. But you are willing to take his deductions?

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want his deductions. It is bad enough to have the deductions of his counsel.

A. On the affidavit I do not see the difference. On the letter the ink of the "twenty" seems to be a little paler than the other.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, I want to hand that paper to the jury, that they may look, in connection with his testimony, at the ink in which the "thirty" was written, both in the affidavit and the letter, and the ink in which the "twenty" was written. [Submitting paper to the jury.]

Q. Did you not at the time you wrote that affidavit and sent it to Peck send that letter along with it, and did you not have the "thirty" at the same time in both, and did you not alter the "thirty" in both at the same time afterwards when they came back?—A. I have not said I ever sent the affidavit to Peck. I have no recollection that I ever did.

Q. You wrote it?—A. I wrote it.

Q. To whom did you give it?—A. I do not know.

On the 11th of April—both those papers being dated on the 30th of December, 1878—on the 11th of April, 1879, the oath and proposal were filed. That is the date that is marked on the back. Now, gentlemen, I want to show you how it was that the oath was altered after it was signed. On the 23d of June, 1879, Miner telegraphed to Hayes (29 P, page. 1825):

Start Julian to Colton, three trips, thirty-six hours.

That is the 23d of June, 1879. - There had been no order made for a reduction of time to thirty-six hours when he sent that telegram. He was anticipating it. The order for reduction was made on the 24th of June, the day after. Yet Miner telegraphed to Hayes to start it on thirty-six hours. And I submit to you, gentlemen, that when the order came to be made on the next day, and Miner found that it was to be twenty-six hours, then he sat down and scratched off the thirty-six that was in the oath and in the letter and altered them to twenty-six, because he had sent a telegram to Hayes to start it in thirty-six hours. Miner knew the service was to be granted, and he anticipated it by telegraphing to Hayes the day before the order was made.

On the 24th of June, 1879, Vaile's subcontract was filed. Miner signed as attorney for Peck and Rerdell signed as a witness. Vaile put in his subcontract on that day in order that there should be no dispute about it and that he should be on the record when the order for increase was made.

Mr. MERRICK. When I told the jury to hold that up to the light I thought it was one of the erased affidavits. It seems that the word was struck out by a line and another inserted.

Mr. Ker's time is up, your honor.

The COURT. I have been looking for his peroration.

Mr. MERRICK. The peroration will come day after to-morrow.

The COURT. We will adjourn now.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, APRIL 26, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I was telling you about the telegram on route 46132, from Julian to Colton. The telegram is 29 P, and found on page 1825. The oath says twenty-six hours. The proposal says twenty-six hours and thirty-six hours; the thirty is erased up at the top and twenty written in, so that it reads thirty-six and twenty-six. On the 24th of May, 1879, Vaile filed his subcontract. I have already told you about that. It was put in evidently with the intention of having it there at the time the order was made. Miner signed this contract as attorney for Peck, and Rerdell signed as a witness. Vaile says, in speaking of this matter, on page 4037:

Q. The record shows that your subcontract on the Julian and Colton route was dated April 1, 1878. As you did not go into the business until October, 1878, how did your subcontract happen to be dated back to April 1, 1878?—A. It was antedated. I think all, or nearly, the subcontracts were antedated; that is my impression.

Q. What was the object in antedating them?—A. There were two objects, if I recollect now. One was that, after the subcontract law passed, the department recognized the subcontracts that had been made prior to its passage, but did not permit any to be sublet after the subcontract law passed. Another reason grew out of the difficulty between Mr. Dorsey and myself. My purpose was to get my subcontracts in advance of any other, so that if controversy came up between mine and any others of equal authority—Mr. Miner's or anybody else's—and mine was prior in date, I thought that would give me a little better chance. Those were probably the two reasons that induced the antedating of those contracts.

Again, on page 4061 :

Q. On the Julian and Colton route did you antedate your subcontract?—A. I do not know what date it is.

Q. You do not know whether it was antedated?—A. I do not know anything now about the date of it.

Mr. HENKLE. Show it to him and he will see.

Q. Were not all your subcontracts antedated?—A. As I have said, I cannot say. They may not all have been.

Q. Is it not your best recollection that all of them were?—A. Most of them were, if not all of them.

Q. What was the object of antedating the subcontract on the Julian and Colton route?—A. The same as on the others. I mentioned it to you, I believe.

On the 24th of June, 1879, Brady made an order. It is 5 P, and found on page 1813 :

First. Increase service two trips per week from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $2,376 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second. Reduce running time from fifty-four hours to twenty-six hours, and allow contractor $5,346 per annum additional pay, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement, from July 14, 1879.

Increase pay of subcontractor in like amount.

The amount that they bid was $7,122. Pro rata would have been $9,504. There was a difference of $1,782 between the offer and what would have been received under the oath. Mr. Brady, in speaking about this order on page 3434, says :

Q. Was your attention directed to the affidavit upon the route from Colton to Julian, No. 46132 (being 7 P), to the changes and interlineations in the affidavit?—A. I do not remember that it was. The interlineations would not attract any particular attention; they are very natural interlineations. The interlineations are simply the number of men and animals necessary to convey the mail on route 46132, Colton to Julian, and the interlineations come in in this way: "three times a week on the present schedule" is interlined. That is a very natural interlineation.

Q. And the alteration below is from thirty-six hours to twenty-six hours, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It would take more animals and men to run the route in twenty-six hours than in thirty-six?—A. I presume that it was a mere clerical error in writing thirty instead of twenty, and so twenty was put above it.

Q. It would take more men and animals to carry the mail in twenty-six hours than in thirty-six, would it not?—A. I should think so; that would be my theory.

Q. That is, to shorten the time you must increase the number of men and horses?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you examine any of these affidavits with any care as to their appearance?—No; not as to their appearance. They generally came to me through the regular channels, you may say, and I took it for granted that they were correct; that is, as correct as they make them. I was not going to assume that a man was a scoundrel simply because he was a contractor.

Q. But you did assume that his statements were not to be investigated because he was a contractor, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Where did you draw the line? You did not investigate his statements?—A. I did not draw the line; there was no line to be drawn.

Q. Did you investigate his statements?—A. I assumed that they were honest men.

Q. And you accepted these statements as conclusive evidence to you?—A. I accepted their statements as conclusive, so far as they knew.

Q. And upon those you made orders?—A. With my own rule besides as a guide.

Again, on page 3436 :

Q. Still, you made the order for thirty-three hours?

Mr. WILSON. That is what he said.

A. Certainly, I made the order for thirty-three hours.

Q. And you made it upon this affidavit?—A. It seems so. You say that is the only one there.

Mr. BLISS. I have shown you all the papers and asked you to look for yourself.

The WITNESS. The affidavit is just as good, even if it was made in January, as if it had been made in June.

Mr. MERPICK. A singular coincidence.

The WITNESS. Very.

Q. Do you remember the route from Julian to Colton?—A. I do.

Q. Did you make an order for increase or expedition upon that route?—A. I think so.

Q. I hand you all the papers in the case and ask you to look at them. Please tell me whether you made an order for expedition there?—A. I did. It was reduced from fifty-four hours to twenty-six.

Q. Your order on jacket marked 5 P is dated June 24, 1879?—A. Upon the recommendation of Mr. Wigginton, member of Congress, and Senator Booth, Senator Farley, and others.

Q. Did Mr. Wigginton, Senator Booth, and Senator Farley recommend twenty-six hours?—A. I do not know.

Q. Please look and see if, in point of fact, every paper now before you does not specify either thirty-six or thirty-eight hours.

By the COURT:

Q. What is the length of that route?—A. One hundred and twenty-one miles. The original schedule time was fifty-four hours, and it was reduced to twenty-six hours.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. Now, I ask you, do not all the papers there relating to expedition specify either thirty-six or thirty-eight hours?—A. I do not care to read all these papers through to find out that fact. I do not know whether they do or not. The service was expedited from fifty-four to twenty-six hours; that made about five miles an hour.

Q. You stated that Governor Booth and Mr. Farley recommended that increase to be made. Please look at that letter and tell us if that is the letter by which they recommended it?—A. They recommended the increase and expedition. They may not have recommended that it be twenty-six hours, but they recommended that it be faster. You say thirty-six hours. I do not care whether it is thirty-six or twenty-six.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not suppose you do.

The WITNESS. Certainly not. If I was going to expedite at all I would expedite properly, and that would be twenty-six hours.

Q. Have you found any paper which specified twenty-six hours? Have you any such paper before you?—A. I have not.

Q. How did you get at twenty-six hours?—A. I cannot say.

Q. It was not in accordance with the four-miles-per-hour schedule; how was it you got at it?—A. I cannot say as to that.

Q. You do not know?—A. No.

Q. If a schedule of four miles an hour was sufficient upon the other routes, why was it necessary on that route to have five miles an hour?—A. I do not know of any special reasons for it now. There were probably special reasons brought to my attention at the time; what they were I could not say now.

Q. All the papers on file specifying thirty-six and thirty-eight hours, and Mr. Wigginton and Mr. Booth—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I object to that.

Q. [Continuing.] All the papers on file specifying thirty-six or thirty-eight hours, and the order having been made on the 24th of June, 1879, for twenty-six hours, can you tell me how it happened that John M. Peck, in New Mexico, on the 30th day of December, 1878, knew that you wanted an affidavit which specified the number of men and horses that would be required on a twenty-six-hour schedule?—A. I cannot. That is the affidavit where the interlineations occur.

Q. But you said the interlineations did not amount to much.—A. I do not think they do, so far as that is concerned, because this is a very natural one.

Q. Well, how is it?—A. I say I don't know.

Q. You used that affidavit to make your expedition upon?—A. If that is the affidavit in the case, I presume it is the one upon which it was based.

Q. Upon that you made an order for twenty-six hours, which is the precise time named in the affidavit?—A. Yes; it seems so.

You see by the testimony of Brady, and as I showed you yesterday, the petitions called for thirty-six and thirty-eight hours. You will see that the oath of Peck, that Miner said he wrote and sent down to Chico Springs, dated the 30th day of December, 1878, has twenty-six written in, and you see that this proposal has twenty-six written into it. I told you yesterday that I would show you conclusively by Miner's own testimony and by the papers in the case that these two papers were altered after the date specified here, the 30th of December, 1878. Remember they both bear the same date, as if they had been written on the same day, the proposal and the oath. I called your attention to the telegram that Miner sent on the 23d of June. The order was made on the 24th. On the 23d of June, the day before the order was made, Miner sent a telegram to the contractor, J. Chauncey Hayes. Gentlemen, there is the telegram [exhibiting it]. It is 29 P. Here is the order, dated the 24th of June, one day after that telegram was sent. [Exhibiting order.] But we have still another piece of evidence that fixes this matter conclusively. Miner wrote to Hayes on the 25th of July, 1879. That letter is 28 P, and is on page 1824. I will read it to you :

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1879.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES,
San Luis Rey, Cal. :

DEAR SIR: Yours of 14th received. The telegraph got my message mixed, it seems, as it was written twenty-six. We tried hard to have schedule made thirty-six hours as petitioned for, but could not prevail on the department to make it so. We therefore had to accept twenty-six hours. We are willing to pay you four thousand per annum for three-trip service, twenty-six-hour schedule. If not satisfactory we will make some other arrangement.

Respectfully,

JNO. R. MINER.

Gentlemen, does not that explain the whole matter? He puts the blame upon the telegraph, saying the telegraph made it thirty-six instead of twenty six. The petitions called for thirty-six, the oath originally was thirty-six, and the proposal was thirty-six. When he sent that telegram off he no doubt expected that twenty-six hours was the time to which it would be expedited. But after he had gone to the department, and it had been arranged between Brady and himself, or whoever was acting for Brady, that thirty six would look too bald for such an increase, he made it twenty-six hours, and he did not notify Hayes of it until he received Hayes's letter, and then he put the whole blame upon the telegraph, and stated in addition that he tried hard to have it made thirty-six, but that the department would not have it so, and insisted upon twenty-six. As I showed you, he had made a sub-contract with Hayes providing for expedition, and he was obliged to make Hayes an additional offer. He did make him an additional offer. He said :

We are willing to pay you $4,000 per annum for three-trip service, twenty-six-hour schedule. If not satisfactory we will make some other arrangement.

Burgman, who was a carrier on this route, testified, on page 1817, that "the twenty-six-hour schedule disconnected the mail;" with a twenty-six-hour schedule he made no connection at the point he left and the point at which he arrived. Hayes says, on page 1826, "the schedule was changed, and then we failed to make the connection."

The pay in this case was drawn by Vaile, and Peck signed the orders upon which Vaile drew the pay for the entire term. The oath that was put in on this route says, that on the present schedule it takes four men and five animals, making nine, and that reduced to twenty-six hours it would require nine men and eighteen animals, making twenty-seven. Burgman says he commenced on the 14th of July, 1879, with three trips at twenty-six hours, and it took three men and ten animals, making thirteen, and he had two extra animals, making fifteen. The oath of Peck was twenty-seven. Burgman says it only required fifteen. Hayes says, "On three trips, twenty-six hours, it took four men and twelve animals," making sixteen, one more than Burgman took. But there is a great difference between sixteen that Hayes took and twenty-seven as stated in that oath. Remember, gentlemen, that Burgman, with fifteen men and horses, and Hayes, with sixteen men and horses, both carried passengers and freight.

The original pay on the route was $1,188. It was increased to $8,910. Hayes received for three trips $4,455, giving the contractors here in Washington a profit of $4,455. Brady said the general rule for pay was $25 to $35, or in the neighborhood of $30 a mile in that Western country. On this route, instead of paying from $30 to $35 a mile, it cost over $72 a mile.

I will now give you the revenues received from this route, including every office upon the route. In 1879 the amount was $524.03. In 1880 it was $399.52. In 1881 it was $479.75. So you see, gentlemen, that in 1880 the revenues on the entire route fell off from $524.03 to $399.52, a very good indication of the wants and needs of the people in that section of country, when the revenue received from the mail fell off so greatly. I am giving you the revenue of every office upon the route. In 1881, when the expedition was the highest, the amount received by the Government was $479.75, and at that time the Government was paying out $8,910 to carry the mail.

There are some overt acts on this route. Gentlemen, you have seen the oath. It is marked "Filed April 11, 1879." I want you to see that the date mentioned in the indictment is the same date as that mentioned upon the bottom of the jacket containing the order, June 24, 1879, and across the jacket, in blue pencil, is written, "Do this.—Brady." In that jacket was the petition I have shown you, as were also the letters and the oath. Those papers were used by Brady as the basis for his order.

ROUTE 46247, REDDING TO ALTURAS, CALIFORNIA.

This is another route that was taken by Dorsey. It was one hundred and seventy-nine miles in length; there were two trips a week, and the time was one hundred and eight hours. John M. Peck was the contractor, and the pay was $5,988. The official orders are:

June 3, 1878, Brady ordered an increase of one trip.

September 18, 1878, Peck's oath was made.

December 3, 1878, offer to carry the mail.

December 3, 1878, oath filed.

December 3, 1878, Brady made an order for increase and expedition.

May 20, 1879, subcontract made with Major & Culverhouse.

April 17, 1880, Postmaster-General reduced the service.

August 26, 1880, service was increased again.

February 11, 1881, service was increased to seven trips.

Now, let us return and take the official papers with the others we have received. On the 1st of May, 1878, Moore made a subcontract with Major & Culverhouse providing for increase of trips. Boone says that that is one of the subcontracts he helped to get up, and that he inserted the clause for expedition by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. The route was originally let at two trips. On the 3d of June, 1878, Brady made an order, which is 13 G, on page 1236:

Increase service one trip from July 1, 1878, and allow contractor $2,994 per annum additional.

That brought the service up to three trips. The increase was made upon eleven petitions. Here they are, gentlemen. [Exhibiting them.]

If you will examine these petitions you will find that they are perfect copies, each one of the other. There is not a syllable of difference between them. You know Moore was to get up petitions, and you know Mr. Donnelly was engaged in preparing petitions and getting them ready. Here are eleven petitions put in, and each one is precisely like every other one. This fact was so fully admitted that they were not all read to you. There were only two of them read to you. It was admitted all around that there was no use in wasting time by standing up and reading the same thing to you over and over again, because there would have been ten repetitions of the first one. On the 18th of September, 1878, the same date that has been so often mentioned, there was an oath made by Peck.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). I understood you to say that the names were all the same. You did not mean that, but that the form was the same in each case.

Mr. KER. The wording of the petitions is the same. I did not speak about the names. It was hardly worth while to send way off to the Pacific Ocean, where it is bordered upon by Southern California, to find out whether there were any people with those names there. The map will show you that it was the jumping-off place, right down by the ocean. I think Mr. Greene asked one of the witnesses if the railroad ran around by the sea-shore, and the witness said, "Yes; right along the sea-shore."

Accompanying the oath in this case, dated September 18, 1878, was the proposal, and that, for the first time, bears a different date. Miner wrote that oath. You can see that there are erasures in it. On page 4188 Miner testifies, in his examination-in-chief, in regard to this oath:

Q. What is 9 G?—A. 9 G is the affidavit on the Redding and Alturas route.

Q. In whose handwriting is it?—A. The body is in my handwriting. The signatures are not.

Q. Who signs the affidavit?—A. John M. Peck.

Q. Is that his genuine signature?—A. I believe it is.

Q. Was it filled up before it was signed?—A. I could only say as to that as I did as to the other; I have no recollection of the particular pieces of paper.

Q. Did you fill it up after it was signed?—A. Not so far as I remember.

By the COURT:

Q. Before whom was it proved?—A. Taylor, in New Mexico.

Q. Do you know in whose handwriting the filling up is?—A. The handwriting is all mine.

That is for seventy-two hours. Then the offer, dated December 3, 1878, is for three trips at seventy-two hours, the price being $26,946. Miner wrote the oath, and Miner signed Peck's name to the proposal. Miner says, on page 4248:

Q. Now, I want you to look at another affidavit. I am trying to refresh your recollection about that.—A. I will try to remember it.

Q. Do, please, will you? Look at 9 G, and tell me whether you ever saw that paper before?—A. I probably did, as it all appears to be in my handwriting except the signature.

Q. Do you recollect anything about it?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not recollect ever having seen it?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not recollect when you wrote it?—A. I do not.

Q. Was it all filled in at the same time?—A. The appearance of it would indicate that a portion of it was written at one time and a portion at another.

Q. Who wrote the portion at one time, and who wrote the portion at another?—

A. I wrote it all except the signature. There is a blank space—that is not certain.

Mr. MERRICK. There is nothing certain.

The WITNESS. There is a blank space before and after the words "eight" and "six," and the "eighteen."

Q. This affidavit (9 G) is as follows:

Then he read the affidavit to the witness.

Did you fill in those numbers?—A. I wrote all that affidavit except the signatures.

Q. Tell me, then, what words you erased in order to write the words "three" and "eight"?—A. I don't know.

Q. Did you not erase two words to write those?—A. I don't know.

Q. Do you recollect erasing anything?—A. I do not.

Q. How long after the body of that was written did you fill it in?—A. I don't know whether it was fifteen minutes or six weeks.

Q. It might have been six weeks?—A. I said I do not know.

Q. Do you not know that it was some little time after the body was written that you filled it in?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you remember when you sent it to Peck?—A. I do not.

Q. Who was interested in the route from Redding to Alturas at that time?

The WITNESS. What is the date?

The COURT. September, 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. 18th of September, 1878.

The WITNESS. I remember now.

Q. You remember all about it, I have no doubt?—A. I looked at it two minutes ago.

Q. Who was interested in the routes at that time?—A. Mr. Peck, John W. Dorsey, Mr. Vaile, and myself.

Q. And it was your business to look after all the details here?—A. It was.

Q. And attend to all these affidavits?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You do not recollect anything about it?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know that on this affidavit of yours you wrote out and that Peck swore to, there was an increase of expedition of that route amounting to $26,945?

The WITNESS. Of expedition?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I do not know that fact; it is not correct.

Mr. MERRICK. No; it is for expedition and trips. I have not got them separated. The order put them together.

The WITNESS. I know that there was an increase on the route; just the amount I do not remember.

Q. When did you first ascertain that there was an increase on the route?—A. When I received the official notice of it.

Q. And not before?—A. Not before.

Q. You did not know that it was intended to bring about the increased expedition, did you?—A. I may have known it; I don't remember it now.

Q. You do not remember?—A. No.

Q. You do not remember whether at the time you got an increase in your annual income of some $26,000 you then recollected about Peck's affidavit?—A. I do not now remember about Peck's affidavit. I probably knew at the time that one had been filed and it is probable that I filed it, but I don't remember that fact.

Q. Probably you filed it?—A. I naturally would, in the course of business.

Then, on page 4250:

Q. It seems that this affidavit which the jury have just been looking at (9 G) is headed "Chico Springs, N. Mex., September 18, 1878," in your handwriting, and it appears to have been sworn to on the 18th of September, 1878, the same day?—A. It was signed by a man who lived at Chico Springs.

Q. But it was written by a man who lived here?—A. Very likely.

Q. It was sworn to on the 18th, and it bears date on the 18th?—A. I do not see anything peculiar about that.

Q. You do not?—A. No.

Q. If you were here and headed it on the 18th, how could he swear to it in Chico Springs on the 18th?

Mr. DAVIDGE. He did not.

Q. You say you never were at Chico?—A. I never was.

Q. You say you probably were here?—A. I probably was.

Q. You wrote it here, did you not?—A. I did.

Q. And at the head it is dated 18th of September?

The WITNESS. Let me look at it, please.

Q. And at the bottom it was sworn to at Chico on the 18th of September, the same day. By what operation did you write that on the morning of the 18th, and transmit it to Chico so as to be sworn to on the evening of the 18th?—A. I don't think I ever did transmit it in that time. The date in the jurat appears to be in the handwriting of the notary.

Q. Then he was down there when he wrote the date in the jurat, the 18th, and you were here on the 18th?—A. I am not certain that I wrote it on the 18th; it does not always follow.

Q. How did you fix the precise date of the 18th as the day upon which it would be sworn to?—A. I don't know that I fixed it.

Q. You filled up the date the 18th of September as the date upon which you wrote the affidavit?—A. I have not any recollection of that paper and I cannot answer that kind of a question.

Q. Here is a paper, which is certainly not in the ordinary course of business, and I am calling your attention to this to refresh your recollection about it.—A. I have no recollection about it.

Q. Did you intend that the department should be made to think that it was written at Chicot?—A. I don't know what my intention was at the time.

Q. Did you intend to deceive the department as to the place where it was written?—A. I don't know anything about my intentions at that time. There was nothing to be gained by deceiving the department as to where it was written.

Q. You do not know anything about it?—A. I do not know anything about it.

Whenever one of them was cornered he always said: "I don't know anything about it;" "I don't remember;" "I have no recollection."

On the same day (the 3d of December, 1878,) Brady made an order, which is 83 G, defense, found on page 3297. You see how our friends on the other side helped us out. When we could not get the testimony in they put it in for us. And again I have to express my obligations to them for it. The order was:

Increase service three trips from December 16, 1878.

Reduce time from 108 to 72 hours, and allow subcontractor $26,946 per annum additional, as per agreement.

It started out at two trips. On the 3d of June it was made one more, and on December 23, 1878, it was brought up to six trips. This order I again call your attention to, gentlemen. You know, as I have told you repeatedly, that the law is that the Postmaster-General must express in the order the amount he allows for trips. But in this case Brady does not do it. He just says to increase the pay and reduce the time, and allow $26,946 per annum additional. You know, gentlemen, Mr. Brady said, that when he made expedition he did not think it was expedition at all unless it was somewhere in the neighborhood of four miles an hour. I think he told you that repeatedly on the stand. At least I have read different questions and answers repeatedly, relating to that subject, and I think it was impressed upon your mind. If you make a calculation in this case you will find that Mr. Brady forgot his old rule, because this increase is made a little over two and a half miles per hour. Suppose that Mr. Brady had brought the time down to forty-five hours; in that case it would have been about four miles an hour. But he brought it down to seventy-two hours. We will see what he says about it at page 3423:

Q. You have already testified that you made some orders upon the route from Redding to Alturas, or at least you have referred to the route. Do you remember it?—A. Yes, sir; I remember the route.

Q. Do you remember whether you made any orders upon it?—A. I made some orders upon it, I think. I cannot say now from recollection what order I made.

Q. Under the terms of the contract the cost per trip was $2,994, and for six trips the cost would have been $17,964. You made expedition and increase, costing $35,928, or $17,964 more than more trips would have cost. Do you know why you did that?—A. If you will show me the papers I will answer.

Q. You do not know independent of the papers?—A. I do not remember now.

Q. You stated with reference to that route that when you made the order you had no idea of the actual time in which the mails were being carried over the route?—A. I believe I so stated.

Q. And that you had no means of getting that knowledge?—A. No, I did not say that.

Q. I took it down—your answer that you had no means. I may be wrong.—A. Of course I might have ascertained.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It cannot be wrong if you put it down that way.

Mr. BLISS. I think I put it down so.

The WITNESS. I may have said that. What I meant was this: That I had no means of knowing unless I would send a man out there especially to ascertain the matter. The matter had not been called to my attention and there was no ordinary routine means of knowing.

Q. Would the schedule of arrivals and departures show it to you?—A. I presume not.

On page 3426:

Q. Could you not have found out the time in which the mail was being carried over that route by correspondence with the postmasters?—A. I could; that is, I presume I could.

Q. When you got the petitions and the request for increase to a given time did you, in any manner, seek to ascertain how much time was then, in fact, being taken in carrying the mail over the route?—A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Do you know whether you did or not?—A. I say I do not remember that I took any such steps.

Q. And yet you could have found it out by communication with the postmasters, could you?—A. It had never been suggested to me that I know of that it was being carried faster.

Then, on page 3472:

Q. I hand you paper marked 7 G. on the route from Redding to Alturas, and ask if from that paper you can tell how much less than pro rata the allowance was?—A. It seems the brief on the jacket states that expedition would be $10,419.12, and three additional trips would be $19,401.12, and the total increase $29,820.24, and that the contractor submits a proposition to expedite the schedule and increase the service three trips per week for the round sum of $26,946 per annum. The order, therefore, does not indicate, and I do not know that there is any necessity for it to indicate whether the saving was on the expedition or on the increase.

Q. But it does not indicate?—A. It appears not.

Q. Suppose you had made an order for expedition and increase of trips say from two to three, and then you came to make a further increase to six, would you there allow pro rata?—A. Usually if we thought that the service needed six trips, and were determined to put it on, there would be no method of compelling the contractor to do it for less than pro rata.

Q. In getting at that pro rata there enters in the previous amount that you have allowed for expedition when you increase it to three trips?—A. Certainly.

Q. And after increasing it three trips, you then increase it to six if you double the amount?—A. Certainly, unless we can get it for less, which is seldom the case.

Q. In such a case I understood you to say that you construed the law as requiring the full allowance?—A. I do, and that if we were determined of our own volition or for any other reason to make six trips a week out of a route having three trips a week, and to continue the fast schedule to which it had been expedited, it would be utterly impossible for all the power of the Government to compel that contractor to carry it for less than pro rata unless he wanted to.

Q. You could require the contractor to make the increased trips at a less rate of speed?—A. Yes, sir; my position in that respect, I believe, is not indorsed fully, but I think I could do it if I was there and wanted to do it.

Now, I have read this to you because it comes in connection with this route, and applies to routes that will follow. He says he could not compel the contractor to put on the service for any less than pro rata; he was totally at the mercy of the contractor.

I mentioned to you about the forty-five hour schedule—that if he had made it forty-five instead of seventy-two, as he did make it, that it then would be about four miles an hour. The reason I mentioned the forty-five hours to you is this: because I find, through the courtesy and kindness of my friends on the other side, that there was some talk or arrangement about forty-five hours. In the jacket they put in you will find that an oath of the contractor had been filed for forty-five hours. I suppose that they concluded that it would not do to make it forty-five miles an hour; that there might be some trouble with the subcontractor; and therefore they erased that portion of it and fixed up this affidavit that I have shown you for seventy two hours. You will find that what I say is correct by looking at 83 G, defense, page 3297.

Mr. WILSON. I want to be fair with you all the way through. You do not mean forty-five miles an hour, as you have said, but a schedule of forty-five hours.

Mr. KER. The judge wants to correct me. He says he wants to be fair all the way through, and reminds me that I have used the expression forty-five miles an hour. It should be forty-five hours. You see how closely he is watching me, and you see what close answers he will give to all these questions I have raised. I have given you the page, I have given you the paper and the date of it, and every circumstance connected with it. However, there was an arrangement made, and it was left on the record by some means for forty-five hours, and Brady acted upon the oath for seventy-two hours.

Gentlemen, let me remind you, in this connection, in speaking about Brady not knowing in what time the mail was being carried, you will remember the mail was always carried in about sixty hours. It was being carried in sixty hours even at the time when the schedule was one hundred and eight hours. J. N. Major says (page 1275) "I carried the mail in sixty hours in the winter and forty-two hours in the summer." He had a line of stage coaches. He was on the stand. Sixty hours in winter and forty hours in summer, and at that time the Government was allowing one hundred and eight hours. They, according to the record, prepared first the forty-five hour affidavit, then this affidavit and proposal, and Brady reduced the time down to seventy-two hours, and allowed them this immense sum of $26,946. Seventy-two hours was then considerably longer time than the man was actually carrying mail in.

On the 20th of May, 1879, there was a second subcontract made with Major & Culverhouse. Rerdell signed as attorney for Peck, and John W. Dorsey signed as a witness.

On the same day, for it is dated the same day, there is a third subcontract made with Major & Culverhouse. John W. Dorsey signed as attorney for Peck, and Stephen W. Dorsey signed the guarantee.

On the 17th of April, 1880, the Postmaster-General made an order reducing the service three trips from May 1, 1880 (84 G, defense, page 3298). That was about the time the Congressional committee were at work, and the Postmaster-General made this order, and one or two others that I have told you of, and cut off the three trips that Brady had ordered, but not the expedition.

Then, on the 26th of August, French made an order:

From September 1, 1880, increase the service three trips.

There was a petition dated in June, 1879, in the jacket upon which French made this order. He restored it back to what it was.

On the 11th of February, 1881, Brady made an order, (28 G, page 1239):

From February 20, 1881, increase service to seven trips per week, and allow contractor $5,988 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, and increase subcontractor's pay $2,000 per annum, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement.

This increase from six trips up to seven was made upon a petition that was signed by some of the postmasters upon the route. And so they brought it up to a daily mail, seven times a week.

I have read to you what Mr. Major testified—that he carried the mail in forty-two hours in the summer, and sixty hours in winter. Postmaster McCormick, of Redding, testified that "the mail was carried from July, 1878, in from forty to sixty hours."

Vaile drew the pay, Stephen W. Dorsey and J. W. Bosler drew the pay.

[55 G handed to the jury.]

You know that Peck died in September, 1881. Here is a warrant dated August 2, 1880. John M. Peck's name is signed on that warrant, and Stephen W. Dorsey wrote the name; there is no dispute about it. There it is, gentlemen. As you are looking at handwritings, you may as well see the different ways Dorsey took to write and sign names.

Mr. HERRIGAN. [A juror.] Mr. Ker, will you please say that again.

Mr. KER. The warrant is dated August 2, 1880. The testimony is that Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name on the back of that warrant, otherwise it could not have been negotiated or the warrant would not have been paid; and I say there is no dispute about it.

Now, gentlemen, the original pay on this route was $5,908 for two trips. It was increased to six trips, making $35,928. Let Mr. Horrigan see the warrant, 55 G. I suppose that is the right one. I did not look at it.

Mr. MERRICK. You said Peck died in September, 1881.

Mr. KER. Peck died in September, 1881.

Mr. MERRICK. This warrant was dated August 2, 1880, and you said that S. W. Dorsey signed Peck's name on the back. This warrant passed before Peck's death?

Mr. KER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HERRIGAN. [A juror.] That is the point.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what Mr. Horrigan wanted to know.

Mr. KER. Peck died in September, 1881.

Mr. HERRIGAN. [a juror.] Peck must have been living at that time.

Mr. KER. Yes. It was negotiated before Peck's death, and I say Stephen W. Dorsey signed Peck's name to it.

Mr. MERRICK. Give him the proof.

Mr. KER. It is proved by Rerdell, on page 2341, and by Hooper, at page 2652.

At six trips a week the price was $35,928; Major & Culverhouse received $21,000, giving to the contractors here in Washington a profit of $14,928. Then it was further increased to $41,916. The pay of Major & Culverhouse, subcontractors, was $23,000. That gave the people here, who were engaged in this conspiracy, $18,916 of a clean and clear profit.

As to the revenues on this route: Take every office on the route in 1879, and the revenues were $2,168.72. In 1880 they were $3,484.27. In 1881 they were $2,480.16. A falling off in 1881 from what they had been in 1880. Two thousand four hundred and eighty dollars and sixteen cents was received by the Government in 1881, when, at that time, by Brady's order, it paid for carrying the mail $41,916.

The overt act—there it is, the 3d of June. [28 G handed to the jury.] February 11, 1881.

NO. 38113, RAWLINS TO WHITE RIVER, COLORADO.

[Map handed to jury.]

This was one of the routes taken by Dorsey in the division; one hundred and eighty miles long; one trip a week; time, one hundred and eight hours; John W. Dorsey, contractor; pay, $1,700. The official orders were:

May 1, 1878, subcontract with J. A. Wright.

June 18, 1878, change address.

October 1, 1878, subcontract filed.
 December 3, subcontract withdrawn.
 December 28, subcontract with Rerdell.
 January 16, 1879, subcontract with Perkins.
 January 23, 1879, letter from White River.
 January 6, 1879, Rerdell's subcontract withdrawn.
 February 7, 1879, subcontract with Perkins filed.
 April 14, 1879, letter from J. W. Dorsey.
 April 16, 1879, oath of Perkins filed.
 April 16, 1879, petitions written.
 April 26, 1879, letter from J. W. Dorsey.
 April 26, 1879, second oath filed.
 May 1, 1879, order for increase and expedition.
 November 11, 1879, S. W. Dorsey filed a subcontract.
 October 15, 1880, subcontract with Eugene Taylor.
 March 3, 1881, order for increase.

Now, to go back and take the papers and the facts together: In the first place, we find that Miner wrote the body of the proposal, and that Rerdell filled in the amounts. This is the route, gentlemen, you remember, as to which Vaile and Miner testified that they had given it to Rerdell; that Rerdell was the subcontractor for the full amount, and that it was not taken into account in their division. I will show you the entire falsity of that statement.

May 1, 1878, J. W. Dorsey made a subcontract with J. A. Wright, at $1,500 per annum.

June 18, 1878, Brady ordered change of address to box 714; that was Miner's box.

October 1, 1878, Wright's subcontract was filed.

December 3, 1878, there was a letter written withdrawing Wright's subcontract. Miner signed Dorsey's name to the letter.

December 20, 1878, Rerdell had a conversation with Vaile and Miner; it is found on page 2225:

Q. That is the conversation I want, between you and Vaile and Miner, if there was such a conversation?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Miner stated to Mr. Vaile that he had been talking to me. Said he, "I have been talking with Rerdell about giving him employment, and told him that we would do the right thing by him, and we must fix a place for him to go to and give him employment." Mr. Vaile said, "Yes, I have been thinking of the same thing, though I didn't feel like telling Rerdell of it until the proper time came." Mr. Miner then said, "Well, Rerdell, we are going to fix you anyway. We will give you a good place, and a good salary." Mr. Vaile then asked me how I would like to take some mail service. That I didn't feel like doing, and so told him. Well, he spoke then of one or two routes. He says: "We can make a very good thing, and at the same time pay you a little salary in addition to it, and you will be out of Government employment and will be your own man, and you will be out in the western country where you have got some chance." I won't say that they told me positively that I should consider myself under employment from the first of the month, but, at any rate, I so acted—that I was in their employment from the first of the month, from the time Mr. Miner had first spoken to me about it.

Q. Did they say anything in that conversation in reference to the management of the routes and the probable profit that might be realized?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was said in that respect?—A. During that very conversation Mr. Vaile told me that with proper management the mail service that they then had ought to reach between $600,000 and $700,000 per annum.

Q. Profits, or gross?—A. Gross. The increases ought to make annual pay on it from $000,000 to $700,000. Following that conversation, we had another in reference to the White River route, 38113, when he said that route was a good route for me to take. He figured down for me how many men and horses it would take to carry it, and I went over the calculations with him so I could get to understand it. He said they would give me a part of the increases on that route in addition to a salary, and it was understood that I was either to go to Cheyenne, Rawlins, or Denver, so as to be at a central point to look out for their other service, and act as one of their superintendents.

Vaile says in answer to this, on page 4021 :

Do you remember having such a conversation with Mr. Rerdell at the National Hotel?—A. I do not; I have no recollection of any such conversation.

Q. At that time or at any time?—A. No, sir.

* * * * *

Q. I want to know whether you had any conversation with Rerdell in which you said any such thing as that?

Referring to what I have read.

A. I do not think I ever said any such thing. I would have been quite willing to have taken my money at that time and gone out. I don't think it is possible that I ever said any such thing.

Q. You think you never did have such a conversation?—A. I don't think I did.

Then another portion of the conversation was read to him :

Q. What do you say to that?—A. I don't think I ever had any such conversation as that with him. I think he is mistaken.

Then, on page 4023 :

Q. Now I want to ask you whether in the division of the routes which took place afterwards, in March, 1879, you took into consideration this route; and, if not, why not?—A. We did not. When we came to that route I remarked, "This belongs to Mr. Rerdell." "Yes," Miner said, "that is his." We threw it out entirely. It was not taken into consideration at all.

On the 28th of December, 1878, there was a subcontract made with Rerdell, and it was filed. Miner signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey.

On the 4th of January, 1879, Rerdell left Washington for the West (page 2226) :

Q. When did you go West after that conversation took place?—A. I think I left here on the 4th day of January, 1879.

Q. At whose instance did you go?—A. At the instance of Messrs. Miner and Vaile.

Q. Where did you go?—A. I went direct to Rawlins, Wyoming Territory.

Q. For what purpose did you go?—A. I went there for the purpose of putting service on the route from Rawlins to White River.

Q. What did you do when you got there?—A. The first thing I did was to look around Rawlins to see if I could find some man there that would take a subcontract, and failing in that, to make a subcontract there that I thought desirable. I employed a man, or hired a man and horse from Mr. Rankin, whom I saw on the stand here the other day, and sent him for Mr. Perkins, who was then carrying the mail under a temporary contract, I believe they call it, made with the postmaster. In the mean time I wrote out a number of petitions asking for increase and expedition. I left one in the post-office, and I think I got a gentleman by the name of Friend to circulate the other. The others I sent over the line to be circulated along the line.

Q. What expedition did you ask for in those petitions?—A. Eighty-four hours.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The petitions are here, and they will show.

Mr. MERRICK. I haven't possession of those petitions at this moment.

Q. What did you do in reference to getting those petitions signed, or getting letters written recommending increase and expedition on that route?—A. Well, sir, I believe I wrote three or may be four petitions asking for an increase to three trips per week and expedition to eighty-four hours. I put one of the petitions, as I said before, in the post-office there; another one I got a gentleman, I think by the name of Friend, to circulate, and another one, or may be two, I gave to Mr. Perkins, who, in the mean time, had come, and I had made a contract with him. I got some letters written there—

Q. [Interposing.] What representations did you make to any of those parties in reference to the probabilities of getting increase and expedition?—A. Well, I represented to Mr. Perkins that it would be increased right away.

* * * * *

Q. What authority did you have to make it, and upon what fact did you found your representation?—A. Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner both told me that it would be, and to make subcontracts with that in view.

On the 16th of January, 1879, there was a subcontract made with C. F. Perkins, providing for three trips and increase. Rerdell signed that subcontract, as attorney for John W. Dorsey, who was then out at Bismarck; and as he tells you, he wrote these petitions. The petitions that Rerdell wrote are 26 S, 27 S, and 28 S [handed to jury]. Here they are, gentlemen. There is nothing peculiar about them, excepting that Rerdell wrote them.

On the 22d of January, 1879, William H. Post, the postmaster at White River, sent a letter (35 S, page 1964):

WHITE RIVER POST-OFFICE,
SUMMIT COUNTY, COLORADO.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Route 38113, from White River, Colo., to Rawlins, Wyo., is through a rough, mountainous region, in which the snow falls very deep, and already on some parts of the route it is now from fifteen to eighteen inches in depth, which makes it almost impossible for the carriers to get through on the schedule time.

I would suggest that the time, which is now five days, be increased to six days during the winter, and that in the future it be permanently fixed at five days for the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, and at six days for the months of November, December, January, February, March, and April.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

WILLIAM H. POST,
Postmaster.

This was before there was any increase. This letter was handed to Mr. Brady when he was on the stand, and you remember how very angry he got about it. The time is one hundred and eight hours. The postmaster here writes about having it fixed at five days for the summer, and six days in the months he specifies. Mr. Brady says, on page 3407, beginning at the bottom:

Q. I find on paper marked 35 S, which was filed in the department in the contract office January 22, 1879, a letter from the postmaster at White River, in which he recommends that the schedule be increased to six days during the winter, and that in the future it be permanently fixed at five days for the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, and at six days for the months of November, December, January, February, March, and April. Did you in ordering the expedition to forty-five hours consider that letter?—A. I do not remember of ever having seen this letter.

Mr. BLISS. It was in the jacket on which your order was indorsed.

A. I remember nothing about it particularly. It is evidently not very well prepared; he talks about five days and six days—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] We do not want your opinion.

Mr. BLISS. I do not want you to criticise the letter. I want to know whether you considered it?

The WITNESS. I want to state that the letter could not be considered—

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] State, it then.

The WITNESS. [Continuing.]—simply from the fact that it talks about five days and six days, when there is no indication that he means a day of twelve hours or one of twenty-four hours.

Q. Did you ever see any order upon which you acted that indicated whether the day was twelve hours or twenty-four hours?—A. I do not know that I did.

Q. Do you know of any letters or petitions that specify, when they speak of days, whether they mean days of twenty-four hours or days of twelve hours?—A. I presume there are hundreds of them.

Q. Can you recall them on the files of the department?—A. They usually speak of hours, not days.

Q. When letters or petitions speak of days, do they not always mean days of twenty-four hours; was not that always your interpretation?—A. I think they generally spoke of hours.

Q. But when they do speak of days?

The WITNESS. That they mean a mere day of—

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] Yes, when the letter speaks of days.

The WITNESS. A mere day of twelve hours?

Mr. BLISS. No, when it speaks of days.

The WITNESS. That it means twelve hours?

Q. Was not the interpretation of the department upon a letter or petition speaking of so many days, that it meant days of twenty-four hours?

The WITNESS. Of twenty-four hours?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

A. No, sir; it is not so considered in the department.

Q. You consider that when a person makes a recommendation of—

A. [Interposing.] It depends a good deal upon who wrote the letter.

Q. If he spoke of five days, would he not mean five days of twenty-four hours each?—A. I should not consider it so.

Q. Did you consider that five days meant five days of twelve hours each?—A. I would consider that a man writing a letter of that kind did not know what he meant.

And he gave the letter a shoot out and dropped it on the floor. You know a day of twenty-four hours would be a little different from a day of twelve hours. Five twelves would be sixty, and the time is one hundred and eight hours. It is evident that the postmaster was speaking of days of twenty-four hours and not of twelve hours.

On the 4th of February, 1879, Rerdell returned to Washington, and on the 6th of February he sent in a letter withdrawing his subcontract. This was John W. Dorsey's route, and Miner signed Dorsey's name to the letter. Miner says in this connection, on page 4214:

Q. Look at 14 S, now handed you, and say in whose handwriting it is, and what it is?—A. This is a request to withdraw subcontract on route 38113.

Q. What route is that?—A. White River to Rawlins.

Q. What was the date of it?—A. February 6, 1879. It is signed John W. Dorsey, contractor, in my hand, and by M. C. Rerdell, subcontractor. I suppose his signature is his own.

Q. You wrote the signature of John W. Dorsey?—A. I did.

Q. Were you acting as the attorney of John W. Dorsey at that time?—A. I was.

Q. Whose subcontract was this that was to be withdrawn?—A. M. C. Rerdell's.

Q. Then on February 6, 1879, M. C. Rerdell's subcontract was withdrawn by direction of John W. Dorsey through you as his attorney?—A. Yes; and the request of Mr. Rerdell. If you want to know why I can tell you.

Q. What interest of record did Rerdell have after that?—A. He did not have any interest of record, so far as I know.

Q. Did not the route then fall back into the mass of routes?—A. That was withdrawn—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Answer my question first.

A. It did, by the record.

Mr. HENKLE. Now let him explain.

Mr. MERRICK. Now you may make your explanation.

The WITNESS. It was withdrawn because Mr. Rerdell had sublet the route to another party, and that other party was not willing to take Mr. Rerdell as paymaster, and wanted to put the subcontract on file. In order that it should be put on file his had to be withdrawn.

Q. What was that?—A. I say Mr. Rerdell had sublet the route to another party; that other party was not willing to take him as paymaster. He telegraphed me from Rawlins or Cheyenne, or somewhere, to withdraw his subcontract. After he came home his subcontract was withdrawn, so that the other party's subcontract could be placed on file and he be paid direct by the department.

You know Miner said before, and so did Vaile, that this route was given over to Rerdell; that Rerdell had all to do with it from that time; that they had nothing to do with it, and did not take it into consideration in the division of the routes. Here you find that Rerdell's subcontract was withdrawn in February, 1879, and they divided the routes in the following March.

Then, on page 4215, Miner continues:

Q. Then when Rerdell's subcontract was withdrawn Rerdell's record interest ceased, and then he made a subcontract as attorney for John W. Dorsey with Perkins; is that what you say?—A. He made a subcontract with Perkins previous to the withdrawal of the subcontract.

Q. As attorney for John W. Dorsey?—A. The record so shows.

Q. Not for himself, but as attorney, eh?—A. He could not make it in any other way.

Q. Then Perkins put his subcontract on file, did he?—A. So the record shows.

Q. Then at the time of the distribution this was one of John W. Dorsey's routes, was it?—A. At the time of the distribution this was not taken into account.

Q. That is what I understand you to say; of course it was one of John W. Dorsey's routes, was it not?—A. He was contractor.

Q. And Perkins was subcontractor?—A. That is the record.

Q. And that is the fact, is it not?—A. That is the record.

Q. You knew that to be so, did you not?—A. Very likely I did.

Q. And then, although John W. Dorsey was contractor and Perkins was subcontractor, this route was not taken into consideration, you say, at all?—A. That is what I say.

On the 7th of February the subcontract with Perkins was filed.

March 6, 1879, there was a conversation between Rerdell and Miner and Vaile about the affidavit in evidence upon this route. He states that it was on the 6th of March, 1879. That was after the 5th of March, on which they claim that the routes were divided up. On page 2228 Rerdell says :

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Vaile with reference to the affidavit for expedition on 38113, White River to Rawlins?—A. I did.

Q. As near as you can, fix the date within the same limits of a few months that you have heretofore?—A. Well, sir, Mr. Vaile left here immediately on my return, and was gone a few weeks and then returned to Washington; that is, that is my recollection now; that he left here about the 6th or 7th of February. I may be wrong as to the dates, but a very short time after my return from New Mexico he left and, I think, returned again in a few weeks. I cannot be positive about the time of his return; it was during the month of March, though, that I had a conversation with either he or Mr. Vaile. I won't be positive about who I had the conversation with. I know I received some instructions from either Mr. Vaile or Mr. Miner in regard to the affidavit on 38113.

Q. Did Vaile say anything in any of those conversations or in that conversation about the affidavit on 38113 in reference to Brady?—A. Before I answer that I will correct my answer there. The conversation was with Mr. Vaile, I remember. I have had something to recall it to my mind.

Then, on the next page :

A. There were two conversations; one of them was as to how they could get an affidavit of the number of men and animals in lieu of John W. Dorsey's affidavit as to the number of men and animals required in expediting the schedule.

And further down on the same page :

Q. If it is within your own knowledge. Do not state anything else.—A. Yes, sir. Mr. S. W. Dorsey was quarreling, or he was at outs with Miner and Vaile at that time, as to their relative interests in the service, and he had directed John W. Dorsey not to make any more affidavits unless he told him to, nor to furnish any papers to Miner and Vaile.

By the COURT :

Q. What time was this?—A. I think this was in March, 1879.

By Mr. MERRICK :

Q. Go on.—A. As I said, the subject that was under consideration between Miner, Vaile, and myself was how we could get an affidavit other than John W. Dorsey's. Mr. Vaile says, "I think I can get General Brady to accept one from the subcontractor." Subsequently—probably within a day or two after that—we were talking over the same subject, when he said that he had seen General Brady, and he had agreed to accept one from the subcontractor. I was then instructed to write to Mr. Perkins, with whom I became acquainted out there, and ask him to send his affidavit, the form of the affidavit being furnished me at that time. It was the first one I ever saw.

Q. By whom was it furnished?—A. I think Mr. Miner wrote it; I won't be positive, but it was given to me at the time.

On the 26th of March, 1879, Perkins swore to the statement in blank. You remember that Mr. Perkins was on the stand, and testified to swearing to that affidavit. It is 24 S, and found on page 1961. There is nothing peculiar about it, except that it was sworn to in blank. The notary who took the affidavit says the same thing. [Exhibiting affidavit.] On the 1st of April, 1879, a suit was brought by Rerdell against Vaile and Miner. It is hardly worth my while to go into that, except to show that at that time their relations became less friendly. On the 14th of April, 1879, there was a letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting the oath of Perkins. Rerdell wrote that letter and signed Dorsey's name to it. Rerdell says he filled in the blanks in the oath himself. On the 16th of April, 1879, the petitions that were written by Rerdell were filed. I have shown you those petitions. They are 26, 27, 28, and 29 S. They ask for eighty-four hours' time. Adams says that he wrote 29 S for Rerdell. Adams was a witness on the stand here.

On the 26th of April, 1879, there was a letter from J. W. Dorsey to Brady. It is 30 S, and found on page 1963:

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1879.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: In sending my sworn statement respecting the requirements of men and animals on route 38113, I beg to say that the reduction of the time to fifty hours from the present slow schedule will make the service expensive and difficult to perform, and I do not believe that I have put the number of men and animals necessary to run it satisfactorily to the people and the Government as high as I ought to have put them.

Yours, truly,

J. W. DORSEY.

Gentlemen, that letter was written and signed by Stephen W. Dorsey. I will give you Boone's testimony for a change. Boone says, on page 2702:

Q. I hand you 30 S?—A. This is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. What is it?—A. It is transmitting a sworn statement on route 38113.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. By whom does it purport to be written?—A. It is signed J. W. Dorsey; it is all in the same handwriting, dated April 26, 1879.

That was a statement, as you see, that in the oath of Perkins he had not stated quite enough men and animals.

On April 26, 1879, the same date of that letter, is this oath of John W. Dorsey. [Exhibiting it.] It is 25 S, and called for three trips and forty-five hours. Now, Mr. Foreman, be kind enough to follow me on the oath, as I read to you what the testimony is, and see if I am correct. W. F. Kellogg wrote the body of that oath and the jurat. Stephen W. Dorsey filled in the words "three," "four," "twelve," and "three," and the figures "45," "11," and "33." Remember it could not have been Rerdell. It is dated the 26th day of April, 1879, and we have shown you that Rerdell was not in Washington upon that date, but, on the contrary, that he was away out West. On the 25th day of April, 1879, two days after that letter was sent, Rerdell wrote two letters for Governor Pitkin to sign, and one was filed upon route 38134. I have shown you these two letters of Governor Pitkin that he wrote on the same day.

The COURT. Where was he when he wrote those letters?

Mr. KER. He was wherever Governor Pitkin was, in Colorado. can tell your honor at what place they are headed.

The COURT. On the 24th of April he was at Denver.

Mr. MERRICK. He was at Denver on the 24th, and on the 21st he was at Greeley.

Mr. KER. Those letters were written at Denver, Colorado. There was no testimony given by Stephen W. Dorsey as to that affidavit. He was not interrogated about it by his counsel, and he did not mention it in his testimony. But there are two men who testified to the handwriting. Therefore the other side cannot put it upon Rerdell. It would be impossible to do that, because he started away on the 17th of April, 1879, and we showed you that on the 21st of April he was in one place, and on the 24th or 25th of April he was in Denver, Colorado. On the 28th he wrote the letters for Governor Pitkin, and he did not come back to Washington until the 5th of May. John W. Dorsey signed that affidavit. In speaking of it, John W. Dorsey says, on page 4123:

Q. Look at the paper now handed to you, marked "25 S," and state whether that is in your handwriting?—A. That is my signature.

Q. In whose handwriting is the body of the paper?—A. I do not know, sir. I am no expert in handwriting. I do pretty well if I tell my own.

Q. You never saw it before?—A. Oh, yes; I have seen it before. It is my signature. I say I could not tell.

Q. Your signature is in one handwriting and the body of the paper is in another. Is there a third handwriting there anywhere?—A. It is different colored ink; whether in different handwriting or not, I do not know.

Q. If you had nothing to do with these routes after the division, explain how it came that on this route, 38113, you made an affidavit on the 26th day of April, 1879, in order to get increased pay for expedition?—A. When I sold out I agreed to sign all the necessary papers.

Q. That was part of the consideration, was it?—A. That was the agreement.

Now, on the next page, he says:

Q. Were the others to do the same thing?—A. I do not know anything about that. I had nothing to do with that at all.

Q. You do not know anything about it?—A. No, sir; it was not any affair of mine at all.

Q. You carried out your part of the agreement?—A. I did; I tried to as far as I could.

Q. You signed any necessary papers they brought to you?—A. Yes, sir; any that I thought was proper and right, I signed.

Q. Had you ever been on the Rawlins and White River route prior to the 26th day of April, 1879? I know you were there afterwards.—A. No, sir; I had not.

Q. Did you know anything about it?—A. No sir.

Q. Did you know the length of the route?—A. I think I did; yes, sir.

Q. How long was it?—A. I think one hundred and eighty miles, if I recollect right.

Q. One hundred and eighty miles?—A. I believe so.

Q. On the 26th day of April, 1879, did you know the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail according to the then existing schedule over that route?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not know it?—A. No.

Q. What did you swear you did for?—A. I do not know as I did swear I did.

The COURT. Show him the paper.

Q. [Submitting paper.] Look at that paper, marked 25 S. What did you swear to it for?—A. I cannot tell particularly about it, but I will say in regard to those contracts generally that those contracts—

Then Mr. Wilson and Mr. Merrick interposed, and then—

Q. If you did not know the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on that route at that time, what did you swear as to the number for as within your own knowledge?—A. I relied upon another man. That is why I did it. I had no interest in the thing at all.

Mr. MERRICK. You said so, I know.

The WITNESS. Can I be allowed to state how I understand these affidavits?

Then, on the next page:

The WITNESS. My understanding about it generally was that it was one of the regulations of the department that the contractor should make the affidavit on what he thought was the necessary number of men and animals; that is, when they were to have expedition on the route; but if the department thought the estimate was too high that they would make their own estimate as a basis for the increase of pay.

Then, further down on the same page:

The WITNESS. I understood it was the regulation of the department that the contractor was to make an affidavit of what he thought was necessary as to the additional number of men and animals on the expedition of a route, and if the department thought his estimate was too high they were entitled to fix the basis upon which to make the increase, and if the contractor was not satisfied with that he could decline to take it, and the contract would go back to the Government and they could relet it; so that I never could see how anybody could do anything to get advantage of the Government in any way. I supposed they had a rule of their own. That was my idea of it.

The COURT. Your idea then was that it did not make much matter about the affidavit.

The WITNESS. I thought a man must come pretty near to it—whatever he thought was right. That was my idea about it, but at the same time I did not claim to be an expert in the business at all.

The COURT. I observe in that affidavit what seems to be a filling up of blanks. It may be he did not make the affidavit in that way.

Mr. MERRICK. I am coming to that. That is part of this history.

Q. Were you in the habit of swearing to affidavits in blank and allowing people to fill up whatever they wanted?—A. I do not think I was.

Q. Did you ever swear to any blank affidavit?—A. Not that I can recollect of.

Q. Was not this affidavit blank when you swore to it?—A. I could not say.

On the 1st of May, 1879, Brady made an order. It is 22 S, on page 1958:

First. Increase service two trips per week from May 12, 1879, and allow contractor $3,400 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Second. Reduce running time from one hundred and eight to forty-five hours from May 12, 1879, and allow contractors $8,600.25 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

Brady says, on page 3406:

Q. I will ask you why, when the contract price for one trip was $1,700 a year, and you could at that rate have made the route six trips for $10,200, you instead of that added two trips and expedited the time to forty-five hours at a cost of $13,606.25, thereby costing the Government $3,406.25 a year more than would have been necessary for six trips a week upon that route?—A. This seems to have been a route one hundred and sixty-five miles long and a very slow schedule, and they wanted three trips a week and expedition. It seems by the jacket that Mr. Teller and Senator Chaffee and others recommended it. Three trips a week upon a forty-five-hour schedule would be a far better service than seven trips a week upon a very long schedule. Anybody can see that without even a microscope. That was the reason that was done.

Q. Yes; but Senator Teller and the other people did not recommend a forty-five-hour schedule. Why did you take that?—A. Simply because we would not expedite it without making it fast.

Q. How did you happen to light upon a forty-five-hour schedule?—A. To make the running time, I think, about four miles an hour.

Q. Then you did not in that case follow either the petitions or the recommendations of the Senators and Members you have referred to, did you?—A. No. It looks a little as if in that case I had done as I pleased about it, just as I had a right to do, without petition or recommendation of anybody, under the law.

He did as he pleased about it, just as he had a right to do, without any petition or recommendation, so he says. Then he says, further down on the same page:

Q. I say, then, in that case you did not follow the request of the petitions or the recommendations of the Senators and Members of Congress who indorsed them?—A. It seems, as I see by these papers, that the strict letter of their recommendation was not followed. I made it faster than they wanted it to be made probably, but no faster than it ought to have been made if it was to be expedited at all. I say further that a quick service three times a week is much better than a slow service seven times a week.

Q. Did you upon that route in making the expedition consider at all the question of the revenues of the offices?—A. I presume I did not.

Q. What did you consider?—A. The fact that that service was recommended and wanted, and I thought it would be a good thing, and did it.

Q. But when the service was asked for at eighty hours and you gave forty-five hours, what did you consider in arriving at that? It was not what was asked for.—A. I said a moment ago that we would not have expedited it simply to eighty hours. If it had been expedited at all it must be made faster. Four miles an hour even was not very fast, not as fast as it ought to be.

Q. You therefore exercised your own judgment?—A. I said a moment ago I probably did that.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, before getting away from the subject of the affidavit, and the letter that was sent by Stephen W. Dorsey, I want you to look at the figures and the letters that were placed in this oath and compare them with the writing upon this piece of paper. [Handing paper to jury.] For instance, take some of the words that are here written, and see if you will not say at once that they were written by the same person. I show you the oath and the proposal, and for the purpose of comparison I show you 3 T, as this signature is not disputed.

On the 5th of May, 1879, there was a letter from John W. Dorsey to change the address to box 706. That letter was written by Rerdell. Then, on the 22d of May, 1879, Vaile wrote to Stephen W. Dorsey about Rerdell's suit. I do not want to read that letter, but I want to call your attention again to the facts contained in it. Rerdell had brought a suit against Vaile and Miner, and Vaile wrote a letter to Stephen W. Dorsey, telling Dorsey that if Rerdell went on with his suit it would be known who the true parties were that belonged to the firm of Vaile, Miner & Co. On the 24th of June, 1879, Vaile made his answer to Rerdell's suit, in which he stated that Stephen W. Dorsey had employed Rerdell. The only connection it has is to show that Dorsey had an interest in the routes prior to the 4th of March, 1879, when he left the Senate.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor distinctly ruled that the statement of Vaile could not affect Dorsey in any way. You ruled it as good evidence against Vaile.

The COURT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KER. That was a statement made under oath by Vaile and under oath by Miner, and it does affect Stephen W. Dorsey to this extent, because it is admitted that he had an interest in these routes; that he had advanced $13,000, nearly $3,000 of which was money given to him by John W. Dorsey. John W. Dorsey says it was a private arrangement between himself and his brother. Part of that $13,000 was the $3,000 that John W. Dorsey had given to him, and Stephen W. Dorsey collected the whole of it, and John W. Dorsey had absolutely paid nothing to the combination.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You evidently did not hear the objection I made to the court.

The COURT. The ruling of the court was, that as that transaction was not a transaction done in pursuance of the conspiracy, but was a subsequent affair altogether, it was evidence against nobody but those who were parties to it.

Mr. KER. In July, 1878, John W. Dorsey went out to Rawlins, and while he was at Rawlins he had a conversation with Mr. Rankin. Mr. Rankin, I think, was the sheriff there. He came here and gave his testimony, which is found on page 2057:

Q. What time was it?—A. As near as I can recollect, it was in the latter part of June or first of July.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir; I had some conversation.

Q. Upon this subject we have been speaking of, that route and its running?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was that conversation?—A. He talked to me in Rawlins something about me taking the contract to carry the mail. I told him that I did not want to have anything to do with it; that I had not time. Him and me traveled the next day, or two days afterwards, anyhow me and him traveled from Rawlins to Omaha together on the train, and we talked it all over. I told him there was no money for me in carrying the mail, and he said he expected to have extra service; that it would be made tri-weekly, and there would be some money in it.

Q. Did he say anything how he was going to get that service?—A. The conversation came up just like it did, as near as I can recollect, when Mr. Rerdell was there, that we were a great way West there, and it took a long time to get anything done out there.

Q. Who said that?—A. I said that.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said that he had a brother that was a Senator, and through his influence he could get it done pretty soon, or something to that effect.

Q. Did he say anything further in that connection? Did he mention anybody else?—A. I do not think Mr. Dorsey did mention anybody. If he did, I don't recollect it.

Q. Did he hold out any inducement to you to take the contract upon the promise of increase, or otherwise?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is not that a little bit leading?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; it is a little bit leading.

The COURT. I think it is.

Mr. MERRICK. I say it is.

Q. What did he say about the profit you would derive and the probability of getting it increased?—A. I do not think Mr. Dorsey ever made any promise. There was a man there that was an agent of his, that is all.

Q. I am not speaking of him; I am speaking of Mr. Dorsey.—A. I do not recollect of Mr. Dorsey being—

Q. [Interrupting.] Have you stated all that passed between you and him in reference to your taking the contract and the considerations of your taking it?—A. There was quite a talk, but it has been a good while ago, and I disremember the whole conversation; but he gave me to understand that the mail line would be increased. I don't recollect of him mentioning anybody's name only Senator Dorsey.

This was before the increase was made, and John W. Dorsey was talking about having it made through the influence of his brother. He was talking to Rankin in order to get him to take the subcontract. On the 31st of July, 1879, the schedule was changed. Now, gentlemen, let me remind you, in connection with the conversation of John W. Dorsey, that whatever other conversations he may have denied, he did not deny this conversation. There was no denial of it, nor was there any denial of the conversation that he had with French and the conversation he had with Steineger. With those three men he did not deny conversing, nor saying what they said.

On the 11th of November, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey filed his subcontract, dated April 1, 1879. On the 27th of December, 1879, there was a subcontract made with Foote & Dalton for three trips at $14,000. Rerdell signed that subcontract as attorney for John W. Dorsey. This was John W. Dorsey's route. On August 14, 1880, the subcontract of Foote & Dalton was filed. On the 15th of October, 1880, a subcontract was made with Eugene Taylor for three trips at $10,000, and six trips at $20,000. They were preparing for additional trips. Rerdell signed for John W. Dorsey. Then, on the 19th of October, 1880, the subcontract of S. W. Dorsey was withdrawn, and on the next day, the 20th of October, the subcontract of Eugene Taylor was filed. On February 8, 1880, Rerdell wrote a letter to Eugene Taylor. It is found on page 2077:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1881.

EUGENE TAYLOR, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: If you will get up petitions asking that the route be made six or seven times a week, I can get the increase. Get the officers at White to both sign petition and write letters to the Postmaster-General, asking for an increase.

Very truly,

M. C. RERDELL.

P. S.—This must be done at once, so that I can get it by the 1st of March.

On the 4th of March the then President would vacate the chair, and a new one would go in; and consequently, on the 4th of March, Mr. Brady's tenure of office would be in jeopardy, and it was necessary to have this thing done before the 4th of March. I suppose that was the reason why they insisted so strenuously upon having the petitions in by the 1st of March. Taylor says that he got up petitions. There was a gentleman who undertook to get up petitions also. His name was John B. Adams. He stated to you how he succeeded. The people were all stirred up out in Rawlins, and all commenced to run around and get petitions signed in accordance with the letter that they had received. They immediately began to make their preparations to do as they had been requested. It was a sort of a holiday in Rawlins, and everybody took an interest in it, and everybody tried to get petitions signed. Adams went to work at White River, and here is what he says, on page 2007 :

Q. What did you do?—A. I went to the commanding officer with the petition and woke him up before sunrise in the morning.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

A. [Continuing.] He refused to sign it. I showed it, I think, to three other officers there, who all refused. I think finally I did get about two signatures.

Q. And that was the end of your trip, was it?—A. Yes, sir; it was.

But there were petitions gotten up. Here they are, 33 and 34 S. Those two petitions were circulated by Taylor. On 33 S you will find an indorsement by General Sherman. General Sherman was placed upon the stand and gave some testimony in regard to these routes, in a general way, and as to his idea about the country. You all know General Sherman, I suppose, and know what sort of a man he is. I had the pleasure and the honor of serving under him, and marching under his command, and I know exactly what his character is. He is a noble-hearted, kind gentleman, a brave officer, and a good commander, and a man who would be very likely to grant any request that was apparently reasonable. This petition was taken to General Sherman for his signature, and I will read to you what Rerdell says in regard to it, on page 2350 :

Q. I hand you paper 33 S, and ask you if you ever saw it; and, if so, where you first saw it?—A. I received this petition by mail.

Q. How came you to receive it?—A. I had written to Eugene Taylor to get up petitions for an increase.

Q. The letter that has been in evidence?—A. The letter that has been testified to.

Q. And you received that back?—A. Not in this shape.

Q. When you received it back what did you do with it?—A. I had it taken to Army headquarters and obtained this indorsement upon it.

Q. To whom did you give it to take there?—A. To Col. John W. Steele.

Q. Whose employment was he in?—A. In the employ of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Q. It came back with that indorsement upon it, did it?—A. He took it up there and brought it right back; I went with him and staid in the corridor until he went in and got it.

That was the way that General Sherman's name came to be attached to that petition. Steele took it in and Rerdell waited outside, and it was signed and brought back and put in the Post-Office Department as the basis for Brady's order. On the 3d of March, 1881, as you will find by looking in the back of those petitions, they are said to have been filed or placed in the Post Office Department. On the 8th of March, 1881, Brady made an order. It is 32 S, on page 1963 :

From April 1, 1881, increase service to seven trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $18,275 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, and allow subcontractor $13,333.33 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

By the jacket upon which Brady made the order he knew that the subcontractor was performing that service for a less price, and he knew that the order that he then made was $4,941.67 in excess of the subcontract price. This was on the 8th of March, four days after the inauguration. On the 14th of March, 1881, when Postmaster-General James came into office, he noticed this order, and had a conversation with French about it, and the next day he had a conversation with Brady. His testimony will be found on page 2035. I do not like to make a statement from recollection. I would rather read the testimony, so that there can be no mistake about it:

Q. Did you, subsequently or prior to that time, and if so, when, have any conversation with Mr. Brady in reference to any star-route matter, and particularly in reference to the route from Rawlins to White River, No. 38113?—A. Yes. I sent for General Brady when the journal was brought me, some time during the second week in March, to sign, and I discovered that there had been an increase on one of the routes.

Q. What route?—A. Rawlins to White River. Do you wish me to state the facts?

Q. Yes; state precisely what occurred.—A. I sent for General Brady, but he was not in; the chief clerk, Mr. French, came in.

Mr. WILSON. Never mind what Mr. French said, or what you said to Mr. French in General Brady's absence.

Mr. MERRICK. I think your honor can tell how far that is applicable after the statement is made.

The COURT. [To the witness.] You ought not to state what French said.

The WITNESS. The next day General Brady came in, I think, with the sheets I had sent for showing fines and remissions, according to my recollection.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. He came in with some papers?—A. With some papers, yes; and referring to the conversation I had had with Mr. French the night before he said, "Then, economy is to be the policy of your administration?" I said, "Yes."

Q. What conversation did he refer to?—A. The conversation had the night before with Mr. French in regard to increasing the service on the route.

Then, on page 2038, in the middle of the page:

Q. Was it on the next day when you saw General Brady that the conversation you have given in evidence took place in which General Brady asked you, as you have testified, "Referring to that conversation with Mr. French yesterday, is economy to be the policy of your administration?"

Then there was some interruption, and then—

The COURT. Go on.

Q. Was the order that you gave to the Second Assistant's office, to revoke this order of March 8, carried out?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you discover that it had not been?—A. Some time in September, I think.

Q. What did you then do?—A. The order was revoked.

Q. At that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time did Mr. Brady leave the office?—A. I think in April.

From March, when he had the conversation, up to April Brady did nothing. Dogged, quiet, and determined, he meant to brave the thing out. He allowed the order to stand, and there it remained until the following September, when it was found that it had not been revoked, and the Postmaster-General himself revoked it.

Vaile, Stephen W. Dorsey, and Bosler drew the pay on this route. You know, gentlemen, in the early part of the day, when I took up this route, I read you the testimony that this route was given to Rerdell, and was not taken into account in the division of the routes; that it had nothing at all to do with the division. I say that Rerdell never drew a cent upon this route. The warrants in this case and the drafts have all been offered in evidence. The warrants are found on page 727 and the drafts on page 2085. Rerdell never drew a cent of pay, not a penny. John W. Dorsey signed the drafts upon which the pay was drawn all the way through the contract term, and he says it was according to his agreement.

You will remember that there was some testimony given by Mr. Taylor. You will also remember that there was one small office near Rawlins, and from that to White River there was no post-office on the route. White River was an Indian agency, and beyond that there was no mail carried whatever. The route ran from Rawlins, on the railroad, over to the Indian agency, and there it stopped. The only way communication was had with the outside world, from the Indian agency, was over this route. At that Indian agency all were Indians with the exception, as Taylor says, of ten or twelve people who were connected with the Indian agency. I submit to you, gentlemen, that Indians are not a class of people that either send or receive much mail. Taylor says the mail to White River was twenty to thirty pounds from Rawlins, but the other way it was only a few pounds. There was an Indian outbreak in September, 1879, which was soon put down. During the time that this Indian outbreak occurred there was an interruption in the mail service, but during that time when the troops were brought, they ran what are called military couriers. I believe the testimony in this case warrants me in saying that there were military couriers who carried the military mail.

You will remember also that the schedule in this case was reduced to forty-five hours, a less time than the petitions called for. Mr. France, who was the assistant to the postmaster at Rawlins, says, "On the forty-five hour schedule the mail arrived at Rawlins at 6 o'clock in the morning from White River, but the mail left Rawlins for the east at 4 o'clock in the morning." Remember that. The mail left Rawlins and went on east two hours before this mail came in. The mail for the west left at midnight. That being the case, the mail leaving at 4 o'clock in the morning for the east, where most of the letters went, and the mail for the west leaving at midnight, the mail from White River reaching Rawlins at 6 o'clock in the morning had to lie over there. Gentlemen, what difference did it make to the people at White River that the mail was run on a fast schedule of forty-five hours? What advantage was it to them to have their mail lie in the Rawlins post-office from 6 o'clock on one morning until 4 o'clock the next? The only advantage I can see is the advantage the contractors derived from the expedition.

The oath says, that on the present schedule it required four men and twelve animals, making sixteen, and that expedited to forty-five hours it would require eleven men and thirty-two animals, making forty-three. Perkins says, with three trips on a forty-hour schedule he used ten men and twenty animals. That would be thirty, and forty-three is what the oath calls for. He says in the summer he used ten men and twenty animals; but in the winter he used thirty animals, making a total of forty. The oath called for forty-three. But he carried passengers. Dalton says that on three trips at forty-five hours he used nine men and twenty animals, making twenty-nine. There is considerable difference between twenty-nine and forty-three. Dalton says he used those men and animals in carrying passengers as well as in carrying the mail. I submit to you, gentlemen, that the Government does not undertake to pay a man for carrying passengers as well as for carrying the mail.

The original pay on this route was $1,700. It was increased to $31,981.25. Taylor's pay was $20,000. The profit that was derived from this route by the contractors here in Washington was $11,981.25. Do you wonder why it is that they did not allow Rerdell to take this route? He said he was to have a part of the increase. It was denied that they had made any contract with him at all. We produced the contract and it was offered here and read in evidence. In that contract it was shown conclusively that Rerdell was to have a portion of the proceeds of this route as well as $1,000 for attending to Vaile and Miner's business; but his subcontract was withdrawn and the record and the testimony show that Rerdell never received a cent from this route. I am speaking by the papers, and I give the page that my friends may find out whether I am stating to you what is true or what is false. It was their own testimony—trying to throw upon Rerdell the burden of having manufactured these papers and done all this on his own account, whereas the truth is, as the records show and the papers show, and the testimony shows, that Rerdell was working faithfully and well for the people who employed him and were paying him $3,000 a year.

The productiveness of this route can best be shown by the testimony of Mr. France. He said, "The mail from Rawlins to White River was fifteen or twenty letters." Just think of it! Fifteen or twenty letters going from Rawlins to White River, and the Government paying for that service, seven trips a week, $31,981.25!

I have explained to you how the petitions were gotten up and arranged, and the people stimulated to ask for what they did not need, and did not require. It was of no earthly advantage to them, except to see some money go into the pockets of the subcontractor and thus to assist a fellow-townsmen. Upon the petitions that I handed you Brady made this order [exhibiting order]. Mr. Foreman, will you see that the date is correct. As alleged in the indictment, it is March 8, 1881. I have already handed you the petitions, and the two oaths, one of Perkins, and the one of John W. Dorsey, which was written in by Stephen W. Dorsey, and you have examined them.

ROUTE 35015, VERMILLION TO SIOUX FALLS, DAKOTA.

This route was taken in the division by Vaile and Miner. It was advertised as fifty miles, but the actual distance was seventy miles. There was a mistake in the advertisement. It was one trip a week and the time was fourteen hours. John W. Dorsey was the contractor, and the pay was $398. Miner wrote the body of the proposal and Rerdell filled in the amount. The official orders are:

January 14, 1878, letter from A. Boynton.

May 2, 1878, order to embrace Brighton.

June 10, 1878, order to change address.

October 5, 1878, allowance for embracing Brighton.

December 23, 1878, order for increase.

March 31, 1879, Vaile filed a subcontract.

May 14, 1879, Vaile made an oath.

May 15, 1879, Vaile filed his oath.

July 10, 1879, Brady made an order for increase and expedition.

December 15, 1879, letter from the postmasters.

Now, to go back and refer to all the papers in the case and the testimony. I stated to you, gentlemen, that this route was advertised as fifty miles. The correct distance was seventy miles. When you bear that fact in mind you will understand, as I go along, the reason for the different acts. On the 14th of January, 1878, there was received a letter from A. Boynton. It is 13 R, on page 1906:

PHOENIX INSURANCE COMPANY, HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT,

BRANCH OFFICE, CINCINNATI, OHIO,

Agency at Lincoln Centre, Dak., January 1st, 1878.

Hon. J. P. KIDDER,

Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: I will call your attention to the fact that the Post-Office Department in advertising for bids for mail service has advertised the distance from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, fifty miles, by mail route number 35015. Now, the distance is at least seventy-five miles. Of course bidders will bid accordingly, and we fear that the department may reject all bids on account of their being too high. Can you arrange the matter with the Post-Office Department, or shall we go into the petition business again? The people are very anxious for service on that route, and will not be contented until the route is in successful operation. We dislike to trouble you so much, but as the people think that Congressmen can cure all their ills, then so long we will have to trouble you about that mail route. Accept our thanks for the services already rendered by yourself for our interests.

Yours, respectfully,

A. BOYNTON.

Indorsed :

Respectfully referred to the honorable Second Assistant Postmaster-General, January 12, 1878.

J. P. KIDDER.

Gentlemen, this letter was sent to the Post-Office Department on the 12th of January and filed on the 14th.

Let me explain this route to you. [Maps distributed.] Vermillion is down on the railroad. When you get to Glenwood there is another mail route crossing this one, just below the line on the map [indicating]. That route is the route from Yankton to Eden, Yankton being to the left and Eden to the right. The railroad was not constructed through there until later. This route was divided in two. There were two carriers. One man carried thirty-five miles, and the other carried thirty-five miles, making seventy miles, the length of the route. Subsequently, as I will show you, by an order the route was cut off to end at the railroad. On the 12th of January, 1878, there was a notice sent to Brady that there was a mistake in the distance. At that time the proposals had not been received or opened. There had been no contract made and nothing done. Disregarding the letter, they went on and made the contract with John W. Dorsey at $398 a year for one trip. On the 2d of May, 1878, before the route had gone into operation, Brady made an order, 3 R, on page 1901 :

• From July 1, 1878, embrace Brighton next after Alsen.

You will find Brighton at the lower end of the route. It had not been mentioned in the advertisement. On the 10th of June, 1878, Brady ordered to change the address to box 714, which was Miner's box. On the 5th of October, 1878, there was an order made, signed by French. It is 5 R, on page 1901 :

Allow contractor $10.90 per annum additional, being pro rata, from July 1, 1878, for two miles increase for Brighton.

In the first place, the order was retroactive; and in the next place, Brighton had already been on the route. The carrier passed through it, and left a mail there, and took no account of the fact that it was not mentioned in the contract. But French made this order giving him $10.90, and apparently increasing the distance two miles. There was some dispute as to whether the distance was seventy miles or seventy-two or seventy-three miles. The testimony of the mail carriers was that it was seventy miles. This order made it two miles further, or seventy-two miles by the record testimony. On the 23d of December, 1878, there was an order made by Brady. It is 81 R, defense, and found on page 3305:

From January 1, 1879, increase service to twice a week, and allow contractor $408.90 per annum additional, being pro rata.

That brought it up to two trips a week. This order was made upon five petitions, 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86 R. Here they are, gentlemen [exhibiting them]. I call your attention to the space in each petition. They are all precisely alike. They are all in the same handwriting, with the same space, and with one or two names upon each. These petitions were used by Brady to make the service twice a week. On the 31st of March, 1879, Vaile filed a subcontract, which Miner signed as attorney for John W. Dorsey. This was after the division, if you will believe what Miner says. On the 14th of May, 1879, Vaile, the subcontractor, made an oath for three trips in ten hours. It is 8 R, found on page 1905. Here it is, gentlemen [exhibiting it]. It is the only oath that is not scratched, or erased, or written over; but it is in the well known handwriting of our well-known friend, John R. Miner. The signature is Vaile's genuine signature, and the only difficulty about it is that Vaile, like the rest, was a pretty good hand with an affidavit. You notice that the oath was taken before Kellogg, who was Dorsey's secretary, and whom he had to do the swearing for the whole crowd. I want to read to you what Vaile said about this, on page 4030:

Q. What had you to do with procuring the affidavits for increase and expedition which were made by John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck upon the routes upon which they were the original contractors?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. What had you to do with the affidavits made by Miner upon the routes upon which he was the contractor?—A. I never had anything to do with their affidavits. I made an affidavit on one of those routes myself.

Q. You say you made one affidavit. Let me read it to you and see if this is the one. I read from page 1905.

Then he read the oath to him.

Then the jurat is attached. Did you make that affidavit?—A. I did.

Q. Will you state how you came to make it?—A. My recollection is that I met Mr. Brewer, who had charge of the section, in the hall, and he said to me that increased service was wanted on that route, and it was necessary to have an affidavit. I had no communication with the Dorseys or with Peck, and I said, "I can't get an affidavit, unless I make it as subcontractor. Will that do?" He shrugged his shoulders and said to me, "I don't know. You make it and we will see." It was made and it was done. My having this conversation with him leads me more strongly to believe that I never had any such conversation with him—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Wait a moment. Wait a moment. I object to any argument. It is enough for him to state what he knows.

Mr. HENKLE. [To the witness.] Never mind about that.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Brady upon that subject at that time?—A. None whatever.

Q. Your only conversation occurred, according to your recollection, with Mr. Brewer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And at his suggestion?—A. [Interrupting.] No; it was not his suggestion. It was my suggestion.

Q. He suggested to you that an affidavit was required?—A. Yes, sir; required.

Q. That route seems to have been advertised as fifty miles, and the distance circulars show it to be, I believe, seventy miles or seventy-three miles. How did you come to make an affidavit for a schedule of ten hours upon a route seventy-three miles long, and was not that pretty fast?—A. Very fast. I made it upon, as I supposed, what was then the fact—fifty miles as advertised. I had no idea that it was seventy-three miles or other than what was advertised. If I had I should have made a very different affidavit. I had no means of knowing, as I had not access to the distance circulars or the files. I don't think any one ever called my attention to it. If they ever did I did not have it in my mind at the time I made that affidavit.

On the next page, at the top:

Q. How do you say it happened that you never learned this fact that the distance circulars showed it to be seventy-three?—A. I had no means of knowing, unless somebody especially called my attention to it, as I had no access to the distance circulars. The official papers were not at my command, and I do not think any one ever called my attention to it.

That was upon his examination-in-chief. Now, upon cross-examination, on page 4067, he makes another statement:

Q. Did you make an affidavit on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route?—A. I believe I did.

Q. At the time you made that affidavit had you ever been on the route?—A. I never had.

Q. Had you any knowledge, and, if so, what, of the nature of the country?—A. I had a general knowledge of the country.

Q. What knowledge had you?—A. Well, I had been up in that country, in Nebraska. I don't think I was ever in Dakota, although I was once attorney for that Territory.

Q. You never had been on the route and you never had been in that Territory, had you?—A. No.

Q. How near to the route had you ever been?—A. I could not say.

Q. When you fixed the number of men and animals required to carry the mail on that route three times a week on the then schedule, what knowledge had you?—A. I had no special knowledge of the country, only I imagined I knew generally the character of the country and the distance.

Q. Did you know how many men and animals were in fact actually being used?—A. No; I did not.

At the bottom of page 4068:

Q. [Submitting paper.] Please look at the paper, 8 R, and tell me if that is your affidavit?—A. That is my affidavit; yes, sir.

Q. You say you would not have made the affidavit based upon the length of the route without inquiring?—A. Without I thought I knew the distance.

Q. Why did you make an affidavit as to the number of men and horses required, without some inquiry?—A. Well, I know about how many men it would take to perform a given service a given number of miles theoretically from my general information, and it was made upon that—what I supposed was necessary to carry that service. I am not infallible by any means. I might be mistaken, and get too high or too low.

Q. I see the affidavit was made on the 14th of May, and filed on the 15th of May. You testified yesterday as to how you came to make it. Had you at that time no means of knowing the length of the route?—A. I had not without going up there and inquiring. Of course I could have sent up there, and ascertained out on the road.

Q. Were not you and your firm in constant communication with that route?—A. I was not.

Q. Was not Mr. Miner representing you?—A. He may have been. If so, he did not give me that information.

Q. He gave you no information?—A. No.

Q. You did not ask him anything about the route?—A. I have no recollection that I did.

Q. But you went on and made the affidavit based upon the idea that it was fifty miles long, and with no knowledge of the character of the route?—A. That is my impression.

Q. Why did you not get an affidavit from John W. Dorsey?—A. I wanted no communication with him or with the party. I don't think I would have had it expedited if it had been necessary to get their affidavit.

Q. How long did that condition of mind continue?—A. Up to the last trial. It was a little that way at the last trial, but we have gotten over it somewhat now.

Q. Was your feeling against John W. Dorsey particularly?—A. Not all.

Q. It was a feeling against the whole combination, was it?—A. That was it.

Then, at the bottom of the next page:

Q. Then your idea was that you would not have taken the money if to do it you would have had to get an affidavit from the contractor on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route?—A. I think if it depended upon my asking for any such thing as that I never should have asked it in the world.

Q. Was it necessary for you to ask it in order to get the affidavit?—A. No, sir.

Then, on page 4071:

Q. Going back for a moment to the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, could that route, being seventy-three miles long, be properly run in ten hours?—A. It could not. The horses would have had to have been put right down on the run to have done it, and you could not have driven them more than two or three miles before you would have had to change them at that speed.

You see, gentlemen, the route was seventy or seventy-two miles long, and the time fifteen hours. That would be about five miles an hour.

The mail was then being carried on this route at a little less than five miles an hour; but it was necessary to have it increased and it was necessary to get a little more money out of it. Vaile said he did not know how long it was. He thought it was fifty miles, and made his affidavit based upon that idea. On the 15th of May, 1879, the oath of Vaile was filed. It is so marked on the back. At the time that Vaile filed that oath, and when the order was about to be made, Brewer, who Vaile says told him to make the oath, notified Brady that the oath made in that case was made by the subcontractor and not by the contractor. Brewer's statement is found on page 1881. The faithful clerk notified his superior that it was irregular.

There are three petitions, 9 R, 10 R, and 11 R. Here they are, gentlemen [handing them to the jury]—another set of patent petitions, because they are identically in the same language. I read 9 R:

Hon. D. M. KEY,

Postmaster-General:

We, the subscribers, residents on the line of mail route 35015, Dakota Territory, respectfully petition for daily service on that route, and also that the schedule be reduced to ten hours. Southern Dakota is receiving very large numbers of emigrants, and this route is one of the principal lines running northward from a railroad point, and is being very rapidly settled, and is, we believe, entitled to the additional mail facilities asked for.

They ask that it be made a daily line and a ten-hour schedule. They are all the same.

Postmaster Shaw was shown one of these petitions, 9 R, and he was interrogated about it, and says:

My name is there. If I had read the petition I should never have signed it. I do not recollect anything about it.

10 R is Miner's petition. Miner wrote it, and it is not disputed.

On the 10th of July, 1879, with the petitions I have shown you, and Vaile's oath before him, Brady made an order (7 R, page 1904):

From August 1, 1879, increase service to six trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $1,635.60 per annum additional, being pro rata. Expedite schedule to ten hours each way, and allow contractor and subcontractor $3,608.10 per annum additional, being pro rata, as appears by sworn statement.

He expedited the route, and allowed pro rata, based upon a false sworn statement. Gentlemen, that brought the route up to the extraordinary time of over seven miles an hour, if you take the full two miles additional. But, according to the testimony of the men who ran the route, it was seventy miles in length, and ten hours would make just seven miles an hour. That is a pretty good rate of speed. I think if you were to drive through the streets of Washington at the rate of seven miles an hour you would receive a polite invitation to step before Judge Snell and pay for the privilege.

Brady says, in telling why he did this, on page 3396:

Q. Have you any recollection, independently of the papers, touching that route?—
A. I have.

Q. Please state to the jury what it is.—A. Judge Kidder, who was then Delegate in Congress from Dakota, lived at Vermillion, and was very anxious to have a daily mail line to that place. I presume he thought, like most members of Congress, that it would be a benefit to him if he could give his own neighbors a daily mail. He was very anxious for me to get him up a daily mail to his town. I tried to do it. The contractors kicked against it, because they said they were losing money on the number of trips they were then performing, and to make it daily would only make them lose so much more. Accordingly, we conjured up some plan to help them through. For this purpose of obliging Judge Kidder, and as a matter of course the people out there, we expedited the route in order to help the contractor a little. That was one of the principles we went upon in that department while I was there—to help a contractor rather than to compel him to lose money, if we could. We would rather help a contractor any time than to press him. Therefore we got up the service in the way it was gotten up; it was increased and expedited. Subsequently Judge Kidder went out of Congress. Mr. Bennett came in as his successor, and wanted the same thing done some other where. I told him there was no money to do it with. He suggested that we cut down this Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, and save enough money on that to do what he wanted done. I told Judge Bennett that I was not doing business that way; that I had put up that route for Judge Kidder, and I proposed it should stay just where I had put it; that if I could do what he wanted done I would do it subsequently, but that I would not cut down one service in order to put up another.

Q. Do you recollect of their asking you to increase it two hours beyond the contract time?—A. Well, I believe that I have an indistinct recollection—I have no recollection except as I have got it during the trial. The petition, as I understand it, asked for two more hours' running time than the original contract called for. That could not be done under the law.

Then, on page 3458, he was cross-examined :

Q. Did you consider that it was your duty as Second Assistant Postmaster-General to put up the service for an individual?—A. I sometimes tried to accommodate my friends in that way.

Q. Under the contract, if expedition is ordered, the contractor has a right to throw up his contract; did you ever know such a case while you were Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. I do not remember any. Contractors were very well treated while I was Second Assistant.

Mr. BLISS. I judge so.

The WITNESS. I guess they are throwing up contracts now.

Q. You think they are?—A. I have been told so; I don't know it.

Q. Do you not know that the department is self-sustaining now?—A. But not by reason of any curtailment of the star-route service; simply by sale of stamps throughout the country, because the people pay for the stamps they have bought. That is the reason it is self-sustaining.

Even in his dying moment he would hang on to his own theory. The contractors had a good time while Thomas J. Brady was Second Assistant Postmaster-General. And when you send your letters from one end of the country to the other with a 2-cent stamp, where you formerly had to use a 3-cent stamp, Brady would have you believe that it is because you buy more stamps, and not because an honest Postmaster-General stamped Thomas J. Brady out of existence as Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

On the 15th of December, 1879, there was a letter from all the postmasters to Brady. It is 16 R, and is found on page 1907. I cannot help reading it. If I do not read it the other side will. They will not read again what I have read :

To the Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: We, the undersigned, postmasters on United States mail route No. 35015, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, Dakota Territory, do respectfully represent that the mail on the above route is now carried between Vermillion and Sioux Falls—distance, seventy miles—on ten hours' time between the two places.

In our opinion there is no reason why the time ought not to be extended. We therefore ask and petition that the time for carrying the mail on the above route between Vermillion and Sioux Falls be extended to sixteen hours.

Signed by all the postmasters on the route, and indorsed on the back:

Respectfully recommended. Granville G. Bennett.

Indorsed below in the handwriting of Brady:

BREWER: Write Judge B. that cannot be done.—BRADY.

The note that was sent stated that it would change the terms of the existing contract; it is found at page 1939. The reason why he could not bring the schedule back to sixteen hours was that it would change the terms of the contract and be an injustice to the competing bidders. It would be an injustice to those people who had put in bids at the same time that Dorsey's bid had gone in.

On page 3555 Brady says:

Q. On the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls you stated, I think, that when they applied for an extension of the running time you could not grant it, because it was beyond the contract time?—A. I understand that is the fact. That extension, I believe, was recommended by Judge Bennett.

Q. [Submitting paper.] "Write Judge B. it cannot be done." That is your indorsement, is it not?—A. I believe so.

Q. That is the petition, 16 R, signed by all the postmasters.

Then on page 4032 is found 88 R, defense. The postmasters wrote asking to have the service cut down from daily to tri-weekly, to end at this station up here, Worthing.

March 16, 1880, Brady made an order (87 R, defense, page 4032):

All the postmasters ask that service end at Worthing, 3 a w. from April 1, 1880. Omit Sioux Falls and Prairie Grove and end at Worthing, curtailing distance 16 miles; reduce service, Vermillion to Worthing, 59 miles, to tri-weekly, and deduct from pay of contractor and subcontractor $3.720.99 per annum pro rata, on which one month's extra pay is to be allowed.

Vaile drew the pay, J. W. Dorsey signed the orders for the pay, and Miner signed the receipts.

Let us take the oath: On the present schedule it required three men and three animals, making six. Reduced to ten hours, it required five men and ten animals, making fifteen. That was Vaile's oath. Leech, who was contractor for the whole route, testified that he made one trip in fifteen hours, using one man and four horses, making five. Vaile had it six. For three trips, ten hours, he used two men and ten horses, making twelve. Vaile had it fifteen. But Leech carried passengers. Millie carried the mail for thirty-five miles, and he used one man and six horses, making seven. And Nichols carried the balance of the distance, using one man and four horses, making five. Five and seven are twelve. And with those twelve men and horses they carried the mail and carried the passengers. According to the oath that Vaile put in it required fifteen.

Leech says there were times when if you had a hundred horses you could not make the time. He says: "I carried the mail from August, 1878, to February, 1880. I lost all I had, and had to give the route up." They fined him so that he lost everything. He received nothing from the route, got into debt, and had to throw it up. He could not make seven miles an hour.

Millie says the mail consisted sometimes of a postal card and sometimes from three to five letters and two or three papers. You remember Millie. He was the funny fellow who said he got fat driving seven miles an hour, going seventy miles a day every day. He said his horses were not in very bad condition. But he said sometimes there was nothing but a postal card in the mail, and somebody put the question to him whether he was not very anxious about that postal card, whether he was not afraid he would drop it. "No," he said, "I always hung on to that; I watched it for fear of its slipping out."

Nichols said that the largest mail was fifteen to twenty pounds, the smallest a postal card. That was coming up from Vermillion. You remember, the mail that was sent up from Vermillion went off on the other route, as I have already explained, and Nichols, coming up from Vermillion, says that the largest mail on that route was fifteen to twenty pounds, and the smallest a postal card. Just think of it, gentlemen, seven miles an hour for a postal card! and the country was rapidly settling up, according to these petitions, and they required increased mail facilities. I think that this is one of the wickedest routes of the lot; there was more bad work upon this probably than upon any of the others, although it was a small route.

Vermillion was on the railroad. Now let us see how the schedule worked. The testimony was that the mail left for the east at 9.30 a. m. and for the west at 4 p. m.; and that the mail on this route arrived at 5 o'clock p. m. It left for the east at 9.30 a. m., and left for the sea-shore that Mr. Green was inquiring about at 4 p. m., and the postal card that ought to have been carried with expedition had to lie over in the office at Vermillion from 5 o'clock p. m. until 9.30 the next morning before it could start on its journey east; and it had to wait until 4 p. m. the next day if it was going the other way.

At Sioux Falls it was altogether as bad. The mail left for the east at 1 o'clock p. m., and for the north and west by stage, three times a week, at 7 o'clock a. m. The mail arrived at 5 o'clock p. m. When the mail on this route got in at 5 o'clock p. m. it had to wait until 7 the next morning if it wanted to go out west, and then, unless it happened to hit the stage day—because there were only three trips a week made by the stages—it would have to wait until the stage went. When it got in at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, if it was going east, it could not leave until 1 o'clock the next afternoon.

But you know the people required expedition. It is the best indication of the arrangement that was made between these people. The arrangement was that they were to take the routes at a low figure, and that the routes were to be expedited up so as to give them a large amount of pay. And on account of the mistake made in advertising the distance on this route they were never able to find out, in the hurry and confusion of fixing up these routes, that there was a mistake, and that the mail was being carried at the rate of five miles an hour already. And then, acting without that knowledge, they agreed to get up petitions, and did get them up, as I showed you, in Miner's handwriting, copied by somebody else, and they put them in. And acting upon the petitions and the oath, Brady gave them a weekly service, and brought the time down to ten hours, having the mail to run at the rate of seven miles an hour, and all there was to be carried was a postal card and a couple of letters, and sometimes two or three papers. Finally, it was cut off at Worthing, and left with three trips and expedition.

The original pay was $398; it was increased to $6,133.50. We had no contract from Leech on file, and we could not find out what Leech received for carrying the mail on this route. But we did find out from the papers that $6,133.50 was the price that Thomas J. Brady was willing to pay for carrying a postal card.

There were some mail bills put in on this route, but it is not worth while for me to go into the mail bills.

I will call your attention to the overt acts in the case. Here is the oath marked, "Filed May 15, 1879" [handed to jury]. There is the jacket, 7 R, July 10, 1879. I have shown you the five petitions that were inside of it. This is the correct date that is mentioned in the bill of indictment.

No. 35051, BISMARCK TO TONGUE RIVER, DAKOTA.

[Maps handed to the jury.]

This is another of the routes taken by Vaile and Miner. The route was advertised as two hundred and fifty miles in length. The real distance was three hundred and three miles. There was one trip a week; time, eighty-four hours. John R. Miner was the contractor; pay, $2,350. The official papers are:

April 20, 1878, S. W. Dorsey wrote to General Rosser.

April 21, 1878, reply of General Rosser received.

June 25, 1878, letter from Miner to Brady.

Same date, letter from Boone.

July 15, 1878, two letters from C. B. Wright.

September 30, 1878, Miner's oath was made.

October 1, 1878, Miner's oath was filed.

October 4, 1878, offer of Miner to carry the mail.

December 23, 1878, an order for increase and expedition.

March 1, 1879, letter from Judge Kidder.

August 2, 1879, order to increase service.

July 31, 1881, the route was discontinued.

This route, I suppose, has formed the subject of more talk than any of the others, because it was a route that was run by these people themselves; they did not sublet it to anybody, but chose to run it themselves.

The first thing that appears is, that on the 20th of April, 1878, Stephen W. Dorsey wrote a letter to General Rosser, asking General Rosser to give the correct distance of the route. General Rosser was an engineer upon the railroad. That letter is marked 3 T, page 2137. It is one of the letters in Dorsey's handwriting about which there is no dispute.

On the 21st of April, the next day, General Rosser sent an answer to Stephen W. Dorsey, and this answer is marked 4 T, and appears at page 2137. The answer of Rosser was that the distance was three hundred and three miles. You know that it had been advertised as two hundred and fifty miles.

Then, on the 24th of June, 1878, there was a letter from Miner to Brady asking to have the mail discontinued, and giving five reasons. That letter is 5 T, page 2137.

The fifth reason is:

5th. The whole country between Bismarck and Tongue River is occupied by hostile Indians, and no mail can be carried over this line except with a large military escort. It is simply impossible to carry the mails over this route until military posts are established along this route.

I therefore respectfully ask that this route may be discontinued.

Respectfully, &c.,

JOHN R. MINER, Contractor.
"B."

The letter "B" under it stands for Boone, I believe. Boone at that time had not been frozen out. He was one of the elect, with visions of cash before him.

June 25, 1878, there was another letter, and the very valuable Kellogg wrote the body of the letter, and Mr. Boone, still with visions of cash and fears of a loss before him, signed it and swore to the statement contained in the affidavit. That is 6 T, page 2138. It is in substance about the same thing, that it would be impossible to carry the mail over the route at all.

On the same day, June 25, 1878, on these letters that were sent in to Brady, Judge Kidder indorsed a request for the discontinuance of the route (5 T, page 2137):

Judge Kidder presents this with the statement that he has reason to believe that the facts set forth therein are correct, though he does not know of his personal knowledge.

BRADY.

JUNE 25.

Brady put his own indorsement upon it.

In June, 1878, you will remember, John W. Dorsey was out on this route trying to get the service put on. At that time he had a conversation with Mr. Pennell. Mr. Pennell was a gentleman who was examined here as a witness upon the stand. He did contract work in Montana and Dakota in building railroads. And although our friends on the opposite side wanted to make it appear that he was in Government employ—he told them that he had been—but it was at a little loss to himself. He had gone out, at our request, to bring a witness back here whose presence we thought necessary to testify to a conversation. But Mr. Pennell's testimony and his character are unimpeached. If they wanted to impeach him they might have done it, but I suppose they found it would be an impossibility to do it. Nobody knew better than John W. Dorsey and Miner that they could not have impeached Pennell's testimony, because they had both been out there. Pennell says, at page 2157 :

Q. Did you have at any time any conversation with Mr. Dorsey with reference to your becoming interested on the route?—A. Yes, sir; when he first came there he wanted me to go in with him and take a half interest with him.

— Q. What did he say to you then?—A. Well, he said to take a half interest.

By Mr. INGERSOLL :

Q. [Interposing.] What is that? I did not hear you?—A. He wanted me to take a half interest. I had some stock, and he said he would furnish the money to build ranches, and I could build the ranches and take care of the stock, and he could go back. He said he did not want to stay there. I declined to do that.

Q. Was it you he wanted to take a half interest?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Go ahead.

By Mr. BLISS :

Q. What further?—A. I declined to do so.

Q. Was anything said about any reasons why you should take a half interest?—A. They did not like to buy stock and come into the country—that Indians were liable to run off with it, &c.

Q. Was anything said about any increase of service?—A. Yes, sir. I told him there was not money enough in it for me to go into it. He said they would have an increase of service.

Q. Did he state what the increase would be?—A. He said first it would be three times a week, and then the time would be shortened, and it would be increased to six times a week.

Q. Did he say anything as to the amount that would be allowed for increase?—A. He did not claim to know exactly himself. He said it would be at least $25,000 a year, and might be a great deal more for three times a week.

Q. Was anything said as to when these increases were to take place? Give us the whole conversation.—A. He said there would be one increase inside of six months sure, and he thought another one inside of a year, to six times a week.

Q. Anything said as to how it was to be obtained? If there was anything of that kind, give us the whole conversation?—A. We had considerable talk about it at that time, and he said that he had a brother in Washington that would help them through with it and have influence in it, and gave me to understand that they could have it about as he wanted it.

Mr. WILSON. Do not state what he gave you to understand.

The WITNESS. I couldn't say exactly word for word what he did say.

Mr. MERRICK. State in your own language the substance of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Had the dead wood on it.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, that is it.

Mr. BLISS. This belongs to the Deadwood region.

The WITNESS. He told me that they were sure of getting it increased, and they would get this amount of money for it, and that his brother here would help them get it, and he spoke about being all right with the department—that he was all right with the department, and that there was no trouble about that—whoever had the increasing and expediting. I didn't know at the time who that was, but I didn't have much faith in what he said, and therefore I didn't take the interest.

Q. You did not become interested in the contract?—A. No, sir.

Afterwards, in another conversation, page 2156:

Q. Was anything at any time said to you as to why more ranches were built than were used?

Mr. WILSON. That is very suggestive, your honor.

The COURT. I do not know that it suggests the answer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think it will do him any harm.

The COURT. It calls his attention to the subject.

Mr. WILSON. Go ahead.

The WITNESS. Yes; he said the reason was that they would need them.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. Who said?—A. John W. Dorsey said that on increased service they would need all the ranches, and it would be cheaper to put them up going through once than to make two trips.

Then, again, you remember that about the 1st of July they were to start out to build the ranches. Pennell says that he started on the 17th of July, and that he was to build twelve of them. They were to be twenty miles apart. He says that he did go on and build twelve, and afterwards, when John W. Dorsey came along the line over from Fort Keogh, he gave orders to build some more, and acting upon the order of John W. Dorsey he built three more ranches, making fifteen altogether.

Rerdell started out there about the 11th of July, 1878. He says, at page 2218:

Q. For what particular purpose were you to go West?—A. I was to go West for the purpose of assisting John W. Dorsey in putting service on the route from Bismarck, Dakota, to Tongue River, Montana, or Fort Keogh, as they called it then, I believe.

Q. Did you go?—A. I did; leaving here on the night of the 11th of July.

Q. Did you receive any instructions before leaving?—A. I did.

Q. From whom?—A. From Senator Dorsey.

Q. Did you receive any money, or were you given a credit upon which to draw at the time you left?—A. I was, but I would have to explain how that was done. I got no direct credit to me in my name.

Q. Did you receive any money?—A. I did.

Q. How much?—A. One thousand five hundred dollars.

Q. From whom?—A. Senator Dorsey.

Q. Now, will you explain the credit?—A. He went with me to the German-American National Bank, on the corner of F and Seventh streets, and placed to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co. $3,000, causing me to sign the firm-name of John W. Dorsey & Co. on the signature book, so that they would know who drew the drafts.

Q. Did you sign the firm-name?—A. I did sign the firm-name of John W. Dorsey & Co., and he placed to the credit of John W. Dorsey & Co., for me to draw out over the signature that I signed on the signature book, $3,000.

Q. How much money did you say you took?—A. He gave me $1,500 in money and a credit to John W. Dorsey & Co. of $3,000.

Q. Was that all the money or credit?—A. At that time; yes, sir.

Q. Did you subsequently receive any further money or further credit to be used on that trip?—A. No, sir; not till after I came back. I had some more money, that is, I negotiated some more money after I returned from Dakota.

Q. What paper was it that you had to negotiate?—A. I am at a loss to remember. I cannot recall now, positively, whether Mr. Miner had some blank notes or I had them. I do not remember. Those notes were signed John W. Dorsey & Co., and they were indorsed S. W. Dorsey, but the amount was not in the note. It strikes me now there were three of those notes. I know there were two.

Q. Who gave you those notes?—A. Well, I cannot remember whether Mr. Miner had them or I had them or whether Mr. Dorsey gave them to me. I remember having the notes after my return, or, at least, I remember negotiating the notes. I cannot remember whether Mr. Miner had the notes or I had them, Mr. Miner being here on my return from there.

Q. How much of the whole fund did you use in stocking the Tongue River route?—A. Well, sir, it was pretty nearly all used, except a small balance that I had along in the fall of the year and turned over to Mr. Miner and Vaile.

Q. Used for what purpose?—A. It was all, I think, or at least the majority of it, within a few hundred dollars, used for stocking the Tongue River route. What I mean by stocking is building stations, buying grain, and paying freight bills, &c. I went all over that line and spent nearly all that I had that I carried out with me, and then had to get some more after I got back.

Q. Aggregating, I suppose, several thousand dollars?—A. Well, there was $3,000 and $1,500 and then a note for $1,000 and a note for $2,500 that was negotiated.

Q. Making $8,000 in all?—A. That is the gross amount that passed through my hands.

I ask you to remember this testimony, gentlemen, in this connection, because Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner, as I will show you as we go along, will make a claim that they never received a dollar from the route. I want you to see what was actually expended upon the route, and how much they were likely to have received as the product of Mr. Miner's oath, filed in this case, and Mr. Brady's excessive generosity.

Q. At the time you received your instructions from S. W. Dorsey in reference to what you were to do in the West, did he say anything to you about establishing a line or a post-office about sixty miles north of the Bismarek and Tongue River route?—A. He did.

Q. What did he say about this route to be added to the Tongue River route, and running to the north?

Mr. HENKLE. About whom are you inquiring?

Mr. MERRICK. I am inquiring about the instructions which he says S. W. Dorsey gave him.

A. Among the instructions that he gave me was one to the effect that I was to arrange for an office. He first furnished me with the necessary blanks for the establishment of post-offices. The Post-Office Department furnished the blank applications to be filled up. He furnished me with some of those blanks, explaining how they were to be filled up, and said the advertised distance was short, and, when I put the men out over the road, to make an application for an office off to one side at an angle, giving me a little draft of what he wanted, and to have it sent to the Post-Office Department.

You see, gentlemen, these were instructions given by Stephen W. Dorsey to Rerdell before Rerdell started out upon the route at all.

Q. How far off from the line of the Tongue River route did he indicate that this new post-office was to be?—A. I was to put it far enough off to get an increase of distance of about sixty miles, that being about the distance that the line was short.

You know, as explained to you, that it was advertised as two hundred and fifty miles, and General Rosser said that it was three hundred and three miles, and some of the papers on record mention it as three hundred and ten miles. But Rerdell says here that the object of this "elbow" post-office was to make up the distance so that it would make their pay equal to the pay for three hundred and three miles.

Q. Did he tell you how you were to accomplish that purpose?—A. He did.

Q. How were you to do it?—A. I was to have one of these blank applications filled up, applying to the Post-Office Department for the establishment of the new office, and to get the men employed on the line to sign it, designating one as postmaster.

Q. You mean the men employed to build your ranches, and so forth?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do in execution of the instructions you received from S. W. Dorsey, as to stocking the Tongue River route, building ranches, and establishing a post-office off the line of the route?—A. Well, sir, I went direct from here over the lines that I had passes on—I think that was about the direct line—from here to Saint Paul. When I arrived at Saint Paul I did not make the connection with the train going to the northward over the road running up to the point where I wanted to go, and I was compelled to remain there nearly one day. I had only missed the train probably a couple of hours. There I met John W. Dorsey. I was sitting in a hotel and he walked in, to my astonishment. I did not know he was there. He took me down to the corals or stables near the depot and showed me a car-load of horses that he and Mr. Pennell had been to Saint Louis to buy. We went on together, I think, to Bismarek. As soon as I got there and saw the condition the route was in I went right to work buying grain and buying materials to build the stations, that is, such lumber as would be needed, and cooking-utensils and provisions. All this I did with the assistance of Mr. Pennell, who assisted me in all of it, and Mr. Dorsey, too. I paid the bills for all these materials and supplies through the house of J. W. Raymond & Co., drawing on the German-American Bank here in the name of John W. Dorsey & Co.

Q. You signed their name?—A. I signed their name. I had letters of introduction to Mr. Raymond. As soon as we got the train ready and started Mr. Pennell out over the mountains to build the stations, dig wells, cut hay, and build bridges and everything of that kind so as to open as good a road as we could, my instructions were to cross the prairies and stake it out. I filled up one of these blank applications for that post-office, and I think we selected the name of the post-office, but I have forgotten what it was, and got it all fixed up for Mr. Pennell to carry it and remain there and have the men sign it, and so forth. I shipped the grain up the Missouri River to Fort Buford, and from Fort Buford up to Miles City, which was the western terminus of the line; and going along with it I distributed some of that grain at the mouth of the river there—I have forgotten the name of the place. It was directly on this line, or supposed to be, where we were going to establish the office. When I got to Miles City I found the boat would only stay there about twenty-four hours, and I got up a petition there asking for an increase of service over the line and got all the men I could find there to sign it. I do not think any one refused. I went across to Fort Keogh, just across Tongue River, probably two or three miles from Miles City. I think I had a letter of introduction to General Miles. I presented it and got him to write a letter. I think he wrote a letter or caused a letter to be written. I returned on the boat, leaving John W. Dorsey there.

Q. To go back a little, if you recollect, please state where the route that you were to arrange for was to part from the regular Tongue River route in order to reach the new post-office?—A. I do not exactly understand your question.

Q. Whereabouts did you locate the contemplated post-office that was to be north of Tongue River, and whereabouts was the road leading up from the Tongue River route to this post-office to leave the Tongue River route?—A. Well, sir, we had a map showing the topography of the country, and the map showed a creek, and as I was informed by Mr. Pennell as to the direction—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] You need not say what you were informed. I suppose they would object to that.

A. [Continuing.] We marked it out on the map and also on the blank map that was placed on the back of the application, and I also marked off the stream that I found located. I think I had a post-office map.

Q. What was the amount of population in and about the place at which this new post-office was to be located?—A. From my personal knowledge I knew nothing about it.

By the COURT:

Q. That was the paper post-office?—A. The paper post-office for the purpose of increasing the distance.

We do not know which one of these little creeks it was he had mapped out to locate the office upon, but it was one of them. He had with him a large post-office map, and, of course, the creek does not show so plainly on these maps as it would upon the larger post-office map.

Stephen W. Dorsey, of course, is mentioned in this testimony as having given the directions, and having told Rerdell how to fix up the post-office and how to build the ranches, and of course he is entitled in that connection to have read to you what he said. It is found at page 3920:

Q. Where was John W. Dorsey at that time?—A. I supposed that he was somewhere on this line, but it appears from the information I have since got that he was not. He was buying horses out in Minnesota, I believe.

Q. Where was Peck?—A. Peck was in New Mexico.

Q. Where was Miner?—A. Well, of course I do not want to answer questions of this sort when I was not personally present to know, but I think he was in Denver.

Q. Where was Boone?—A. I believe he was here, though I do not know.

Q. Did you not procure passes for Rerdell to go west?—A. I do not remember, but I suppose I did.

Q. Have you any recollection of procuring passes for him?—A. No, sir; but I have no doubt I did.

Q. Did you give him letters of introduction?—A. I think I did.

Q. Did you give him any forms of petitions?—A. That I do not remember.

Q. Did you give him any money?

The WITNESS. For himself?

Mr. MERRICK. Did you put in his control or his possession any funds.

A. I think I did.

Q. How much?—A. I believe $3,000; but as to that I will not make an absolute statement. I think it was $3,000.

Q. Did you give him any instructions as to building ranches or organizing post-offices along on routes connecting with the Tongue River route?

The WITNESS. As to building ranches?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. I think the ranches were mostly built at that time.

Q. That is not an answer to my question.—A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

Q. You don't remember whether you gave him any instructions or not?—A. No, sir; I gave him general instructions to go out there and assist John W. Dorsey in putting that service on, for the reason that at that time I was afraid it was going to fail.

Q. Did you give him any instructions about petitions for expeditions and increase?—A. Possibly.

Q. Did you not tell him that the route would be increased?—A. I may have told him so. Whether I told him so or not, I believed it.

Q. Had not the contractors and others at that time asked to be relieved from that route because it was not needed?—A. I don't know. If they did they made a statement that was not true. It was needed. They may have asked to be relieved on account of the Indian troubles.

The COURT. Are you ready to adjourn?

Mr. KER. Yes, sir.

The COURT. [To the Crier.] Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I explained to you yesterday the instructions that were given to Rerdell by Stephen W. Dorsey, when Rerdell started West, about fixing up the stations and about getting up the paper post-office, and told you that he gave to Rerdell some eight or nine thousand dollars to spend. I also read to you Dorsey's testimony in that respect, in which he practically admitted all that Rerdell said, except about the paper post-office. On the 15th of July, 1878, there were two letters of C. B. Wright. They are 20 and 21 T. They were both written by Rerdell. Here they are, gentlemen, both alike. [Exhibiting them.] There is no difference in them at all. Rerdell said he had a letter of introduction from Stephen W. Dorsey to Mr. Wright, and he stopped at Saint Paul and procured those letters from Mr. Wright. They are both filed in this case as petitions or recommendations for an increase. Then, as I told you, on the 15th of July, 1878, Rerdell met John W. Dorsey at Saint Paul, and they started out together towards Bismarck along with Pennell. On the 17th of July, when they reached Bismarck, Rerdell had a conversation with Pennell, in which conversation Rerdell told Pennell about the petition that he had written and was to send out to Pennell upon the road in order that Pennell might get the men to sign it. It was the same one that John W. Dorsey had spoken to Pennell about previously, but Rerdell, having his instructions from Stephen W. Dorsey, probably reiterated to Pennell what John W. Dorsey had said. On the 17th of July, the same day, John W. Dorsey again repeated to Pennell the instructions, in order to impress upon Pennell's mind the importance of getting up this paper post-office, on a branch of the Little Missouri River. In July, 1878, Rerdell wrote petitions for increase, as he has already said, and I have read to you his testimony in that respect.

Here is one of the letters that Rerdell wrote and got General Miles to sign. [Exhibiting 25 T.] Here is the petition, 24 T, that Rerdell said he wrote, and had no trouble in getting people to sign. Everybody he asked signed the petition. On the 17th of July, 1878, Pennell started out to build the ranches. You will remember that both John W. Dorsey and Rerdell went together over to Miles City. Then, as Rerdell says, he started back and came over to Bismarck again. You know instead of going back by way of the railroad and steamboat from Miles City, John W. Dorsey cut across the line of this route, and he says that he met some of the outfit on the way and started down with them to another place from the place where he met them. That night he had a conversation with the men at the camp. The conversation he had with Coll McLellan is given on page 2656, beginning at the bottom of the page:

Q. Well, give the substance of what you remember.—A. He told us that he intended to have the service increased. In about three months, I think, he expected a tri-weekly service, and in about three months after that he expected a daily service.

Q. Did he say anything about the profits or cost of it?—A. Yes, sir; he said that while they were having a weekly service, they expected to lose money on it, but when it was increased, and the time expedited, they expected to make a very good thing of it.

Q. Were any sums named?—A. I think he mentioned $150,000 as the sum to be realized.

Q. Did he say anything about how he expected to get it increased?—A. Yes, sir; he told us that his brother, Senator Dorsey, was chairman of the Post-Office Committee, I believe it was, and through his influence he expected to get the increase, or partly through his influence.

Q. Did he say anything as to who was interested in the route?—A. He did not say who all of the parties were.

Q. Did he name any?—A. I don't remember any, excepting Senator Dorsey and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. He named him, did he?—A. He did not give the name; only the position.

Mr. WILSON. Does the court hold that is competent.

The COURT. I think so at this stage.

Mr. WILSON. I reserve an exception.

Mr. DAVIDGE. So do I.

Q. Was anything said about the way the service was to be performed?—A. I do not understand.

Q. Was anything said about performing the service on time or anything in that connection?—A. I think he said at one time he did not care whether they got through on time or not; that they expected to draw pay just the same.

Now remember, gentlemen, that was the same as the conversation John W. Dorsey had with Steineger when Steineger objected to taking the route upon the time which had been fixed. John W. Dorsey told Steineger that "the Post-Office Department took no account of time upon a route that passed over mountains." You see the similarity there is between what he told one man and what he told the other. Dorsey denies this conversation, on page 4093. He was interrogated by his counsel, going all over this conversation. I will read to you his answers:

No, sir; I do not remember any such conversation.

Then, again:

No, sir; nothing of the kind at all.

That is the most infamous lie that was ever sworn to in the world. It is a lie without cloth or warp or woof either.

That is on a par with the rest of it; it is false in every respect. It is absurd that I should tell some mule-whackers such things as that the first time I met them. There is not a word of truth in it.

Then, on the next page:

That is another lie, if there ever was one. I insisted all the time that I was there that that mail should be carried on time. I made one round trip myself, and got in on time and got back on time, and I knew it could be done.

Then he speaks about the ring:

What have you to say to that, whether there was a ring organized in Washington?—

A. I never said any such thing in my life; I never knew of any such thing.

Q. Did you say anything to him about Senator Dorsey being interested?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or about Senator Dorsey being in any ring?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or about the Second Assistant Postmaster-General being in any ring?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or being interested?—A. Nothing of the kind. I would like to explain my meeting with those men there that night.

Then he had a conversation with Isaac Cable, the young man who was brought here by Mr. Pennell. You remember I told you we sent Mr. Pennell back to Bismarck to hunt up the people who were at the meeting on that night, in order to have one corroborate the other. Mr. Cable's testimony is found on page 2656:

Q. With whom?—A. The conversation was addressed to Mr. McLellan.

Q. Where was it?—A. It was at Beaver Creek, on the west side of the Little Missouri.

Q. Do you know when it was?—A. I think it was in the latter part of July, 1878.

Q. How did the conversation come about?—A. We met Mr. Dorsey that evening on his return from Miles City; we met him that day in the afternoon some time, and that night we rode very late, and the men of the crew working for him was very angry at having to work so long, and rather thought it was Mr. Dorsey's fault, I guess, and they made some kick, and wanted to go back, and others thought they had no other way of getting their pay, and for this reason, Mr. Dorsey gave this conversation when they made this—

Q. [Interposing.] Kick?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the conversation?—A. I don't think I can give the conversation.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same objection as before.

Q. You can give the substance of it?—A. I think I can.

Q. Well, what was it?—A. Well, he said that in the first place they did not expect to make any money out of the contract under the first bid or at the figures they had it at that time, but they took these contracts low in the first place to keep out small bids, or to be sure of getting the contracts, knowing that they would have an increase of service.

Q. What else?—A. He said they would get the increase with the influence of his brother, Senator Dorsey.

Q. Did he state how the influence was exercised?

Mr. WILSON. Wait a moment.

The COURT. Tell the whole story.

Mr. BLISS. State the whole conversation.

A. I will, if they will give me time, as much as I can of it. I believe he said with the influence his brother had over the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he did not mention any name. He also said there was a ring formed here in Washington, but I don't remember as he said at that time what that ring was formed for.

Q. Anything else that you remember?—A. Not at present; no, sir.

Q. Was anything said about the amount of increase, or anything of that sort?—A. Well, he spoke of what their pay would be at the end of the year if it was increased as he expected. He said the pay would be $150,000.

Q. Was there anything else said that you remember?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with John W. Dorsey, or was any conversation held in your presence, with reference to any post-office?—A. Mr. Dorsey asked me at one time if I thought his men would sign a petition for a post-office on the west side of the Little Missouri.

Q. When was that conversation?—A. I think it was in August; it was on our return trip.

Q. On the west side of the Little Missouri; do you mean on this route?—A. Yes, sir. I asked him at the time what his idea was for a post-office there, and he said that it would make the road longer—for to make the road longer.

Q. Did he state just where he expected the post-office to be located, or anything of that sort?—A. No; he did not.

Q. At that time was there anybody living at this place west of the Little Missouri River?—A. I never knew of any, and I have been through there a great many times.

Q. When was this conversation, do you say?—A. It was in August, I believe.

John W. Dorsey says, on page 4095, in answering categorically inquiries put to him by his counsel :

Q. Did you see him when he was here on the stand ?—A. Yes, sir ; he was another mule-whacker.

By Mr. MERRICK :

Q. What ?—A. A mule-whacker ; that is what they call them out there.

Then, as to the conversation, his answers are :

No, sir ; nothing of the kind.

It is not true.

No, sir ; nothing at all like it.

No, sir.

No, sir ; not a word of it.

No, sir.

And so he goes on and denies the conversation in toto.

On page 4094 he gives us a general explanation :

Q. All right. Where did you meet them ?—A. I will say that in returning with this escort from Fort Keogh I met a mule team at the Little Missouri on the second day ; and the next day a little after noon we met this outfit about ten or fifteen miles west of the Little Missouri, west of what is called the Custer crossing.

Q. Custer or Rosser crossing ?—A. Custer crossing. They had gone about fifty miles too far north. I told Mr. Pennell the mistake he had made in going to Custer crossing, and said I, "Now, it makes pretty near one hundred miles extra travel for the round trip." He said they had looked for the Rosser crossing for three days, and could not find it. I told him to go to the Rosser crossing, and the stage driver with me said to him, "If you find any water, you have got to start right off ; if you get there to-night you have got all you can do." So they packed up everything—they had got their dinners and started. And between 8 and 9 o'clock, quite late, we got to the only water there was, what they call a water-hole, fifteen or twenty feet square. They built one fire, and there were twenty-five men there besides myself. We started out with thirty men, but two men staid to drive some ox teams and three men stopped at the ranches. We were all there that night at the fire ; there was nowhere else to go. And that is the only time that I ever saw or staid with those men, that I know of. That is all there is of it. I recollect the night very well. That is the first time I ever saw them. If I told it to one, I told it to the whole of them. Mr. Pennell was there. He said that there was some kick among the men about the pay, and that I was to blame for it. There is no truth in that. I had no more to do with it than you gentlemen here. I never even heard of it until I heard it here. The fact is that nearly all of them were paid before they left Bismarck by Captain Raymond, the banker there, and they were to be settled with when they returned. So there is no truth in that : not a word.

Gentlemen, let us see whether there is any truth in it. This conversation, as you will remember, is variously stated as having taken place on the last of July or at the beginning of August, 1878. It was away out, as you see by your maps, upon the Little Missouri River, and consequently it would take a number of days for John W. Dorsey to get from where he met the men over to Bismarck. Here is a letter dated September 27, 1878. It is marked 27 X, and found on page 2239 :

[John W. Dorsey & Co., Mail Contractors. Branch Office, Kansas City, Mo.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 27, 1878.

M. C. RERDELL :

DEAR SIR : I have just returned from the prairie, but did not find the money here to pay off the men, and they are clamorous for their pay.

I have just telegraphed you in regard to it. I presume you all think it is an enormous bill, but if you knew what we had to do you would not be surprised. You have not written me anything about the prospect for the increase, or in fact anything else lately.

Have you written S. W. about the Black Hills route from Keogh ; and, if so, what did he say ? And what does he mean by $30 a mile. What did the express agent at Chicago say about the business ?

Yours, in haste,

J. W. DORSEY.

You see that letter was written in September, and in it he says he has just returned from the prairies, and the men are clamorous for their pay. That is a direct contradiction of his statement that the men were paid at Bismarck, and that he never heard about their asking for any pay. Then, again, it further corroborates the testimony of Pennell, McLellan, and Cable, because he asks about the increase. He says:

You have not written me anything about the prospect for the increase.

Certainly there was in his mind some idea about an increase at that time. In the same month John W. Dorsey had a conversation with a man named Howard T. Lambert. He was also on the stand and gave his testimony, which is found on page 2175:

Q. Was it September, 1879, or 1878?—A. I should say it was September, 1878; I was wrong before.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir; I talked with him several times there.

Q. Was anything said about any change on the route?—A. There was. I was talking to him about the route, and he said he expected to make a good route out of it.

Q. Did he say how?—A. He said the route would be expedited.

Q. Anything more?—A. That was all at that time, I believe.

Q. Did you have any other conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir; after I got on the road.

Here is a man that he talked with, and his testimony John W. Dorsey does not deny. He had almost the same conversation with Lambert that he had with the others. The route was to be expedited. In point of fact, Stephen W. Dorsey, in his testimony that I read to you yesterday, said it was probable he told Rerdell that the route would be expedited. On the 30th of September, 1878, Miner made his oath for three trips at sixty-five hours. It is 12 T, and found on page 2140. Miner says it was an estimate that he made. On the 1st of October, 1878, Mr. Vaile came in, and filed a subcontract. On the 4th of October, 1878, Miner made a written offer to carry the mail. With this offer Miner filed his oath. It was an offer to carry the mail for $32,650. Gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that on the jacket there is a mention of another oath. The jacket states that the other oath that was put in by Miner called for thirty-seven men and seventy-three animals. The oath that Miner put in last, that was acted upon, called for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. If you will take the oath calling for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals, and figure upon it for yourselves, you will find that oath put in by Miner figures out the precise sum that John W. Dorsey said the route would be expedited to, that is $150,000 a year. I suppose the size of the figures startled them a little and they did not think it was safe to go on with an oath and a calculation of that size, or to take that amount of money out of the Treasury. But Miner had put in another oath in which he states the numbers differently. I submit to you, gentlemen, that where a man makes two oaths about the same matter, and there is such an immense difference between them, that you ought to agree with me in calling it perjury. Miner says, in speaking about this oath, on page 4197:

A. The estimate made at the time was with a view to transporting all the forage and provisions by team over the route from the east end. We afterward found that by buying a year's supply we could send it by boat over the west half of the route up the Missouri and Yellowstone; but unless we bought a year's supply we would be obliged to transport it by teams and wagons; and that would take a large number of men and animals.

By the COURT:

Q. So in counting your animals you took into account all those employed in carrying out supplies?—A. All the animals that were in use on the road, and as I understood at that time, that was permissible. Of course, I had not the knowledge of the law then that I have obtained by going through two trials since.

There is some truth in that. Then, on page 4265:

Q. If you did not know anything about it, where did you get the basis for that affidavit that the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail three times a week was twelve men and thirteen animals?—A. I got it from the best information I had, talking with other parties as to those matters.

Q. When you were talking to the other parties, did they not tell you that it had never been carried three times a week on the original schedule of time?—A. They did not.

Q. And you say you did not know that it never had been?—A. I did not know anything about it.

Q. You got your basis for that affidavit from talking with other parties?—A. I did.

Q. What other parties?—A. I think I talked with Mr. Salisbury, and I think I talked with Mr. Vaile, probably, and concluded that a horseback mail could be divided into sections of twenty-five miles each, and carried by a man and animal on each section.

Q. How many men and animals had been used in carrying it once a week?—A. I did not know.

And while he did not know, yet he was perfectly willing to swear to it. Then, on page 4280:

Q. Is it true that the affidavit was a matter of estimate; purely estimate; a jumping estimate?—A. It certainly was an estimate, for I never had been on the route and did not know at the time I made it the exact number it would take.

Q. Was it a jumping estimate?—A. I do not know whether it was a jumping estimate or not; it was an estimate.

Q. Did you not say that it was a jumping estimate?—A. I don't know whether I did or not.

Q. You cannot say whether you said that or not?—A. I cannot.

Q. And you did not expect the pay to be based on that affidavit at the time you made it?—A. It was not based on the affidavit.

Q. I did not ask you that.—A. I do not know whether I expected it or not.

Q. You do not know whether you expected it or not?—A. I do not. It was not based upon that affidavit.

I have not given you the order that Brady made. On the 23d of December, 1878, Brady made an order. It is 10 T, and found on page 2139:

From January 1, 1879, increase service to three trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $4,700 per annum, being pro rata. Reduce schedule time to sixty-five hours in each direction, and allow contractor $27,950 per annum additional pay, being less than pro rata, as appears by his sworn statement of stock and carriers required.

Brady says, in speaking of the order he made at that time, on page 3430:

Q. When John R. Miner swore, on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route, that it would take one hundred and fifty men to make the expedited time called for, did you accept that as correct?—A. I do not know whether he swore to that or not. Will you show me the papers?

Mr. BLISS. There is the affidavit, sir. [Submitting paper to witness.]

Mr. WILSON. Now hand him the order.

Mr. BLISS. No, I am handing him the affidavit, which is in evidence.

The WITNESS. I would like to refer to a memorandum which I have before I answer that question.

Q. Did you assume that that statement as to one hundred and fifty men was correct?—A. Certainly, as I said before, I assumed that the affidavits made by the contractors were correct.

Then, further down on the same page:

Q. Did you undertake to examine the affidavits at all, to see whether on their face, without going outside of them, they did not lead to absurd results?—A. Oh, no; and there are not any absurd results in them, either.

Q. We will see. Did you look to see at any time how many miles the affidavit would require a horse to travel in a day on any one of these routes?—A. We frequently counted that up in our leisure moments; we sometimes counted it up.

And on page 3446:

Q. Do you know of any better way of ascertaining the number of men and horses employed on an existing schedule, and the number that would be employed on a proposed schedule, than by taking the sworn statements of the contractors?

Then there was some objection by counsel, and the witness continued, on page 3447:

I said that there could be no better general rule than to take the statement of the contractor interested in the service, and I don't care a snap of my finger whether he had had any experience in it or not. You can't make a better rule than that.

Then, on page 3452:

Mr. BLISS. I will explain to you. You stated with reference to the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route:

"But how to increase it by simply adding trips to it at the ridiculous figure at which it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling-block. No contractor could even do the once-a-week service really across there at that price. They had probably bid upon it blindly, like a good many contractors, lumping the whole service, bidding so many dollars a mile, as is the common practice among contractors.

"It was very evident that it could not be increased to three-times-a-week service and make an efficient service simply for three times what they had bid for once a week."

Then you went on to state that you ordered expedition. Now I ask you in what way that tended to make an efficient service?—A. It tended to make a more efficient service, as a matter of course, to make it three times a week. It tended as a matter of course to make it a much more efficient service to make it a fast service, and that could not be done with any regard for the rights or safety of the contractor at the price, as I have said before, that they had originally bid for the contract.

Q. Then you considered that you were not to hold the contractors to the original terms of their contracts, but you were to make changes which should benefit them, did you?—A. I answered that before by saying that we would prefer to help the contractors to crushing them.

Further down:

The WITNESS. The distance was misstated in the advertisement. They had to carry over three hundred miles of service. That, at the figures they gave, even throughout this country, where the expense of performing the service is comparatively cheap, would have been a comparatively low figure. Now, to require that contractor to perform three-times-a-week service at that figure, which would be simply three times $2,350, would have been ruinous to him, and no good service could have been obtained by it. Possibly if there had been stations along the route he might have carried it on a mule at that rate of pay. If there had been ranches along the route, or if it had been in the southern portion of the country, where he could have turned his mule out to graze during the night-time, he might have performed the service. But it would be apparent to anybody, whether they had had much experience in mail service or not, that he could not have performed a good service, say, a stage service, even at that price and not have lost a great deal of money. Therefore, when we wanted to get up a better service, that is, a faster service and a more frequent service, the only way to do it was by increasing and expediting, and paying the contractor something near what it would actually cost him to perform it, or else we had to continue the old contract.

Q. But if the contract was a losing one for one trip at $2,350, did it become a gaining one by multiplying that sum by three and making three trips?

The WITNESS. Without expedition at all?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

A. That is a question you will have to ask the contractor.

Q. You were stating your theory. Is it your theory that it would?—A. My impression is that it would not probably cost him twice as much to do three trips a week in proportion as to make only one.

Q. Does your experience tell you that three trips a week could have been performed over that three hundred miles on the schedule then fixed, for three times $2,350?—

A. I would not want to undertake it.

Q. If the allowance for expedition is to be gauged by the number of men and horses used on the one service and the number of men and horses that would be used on the other service, how would you in that way convert a losing service at one trip and slow time into a profitable service at three trips and fast time if you did not make an allowance in cases of that kind in excess of the amount authorized under the statute?

Then there was some conversation, and then :

The WITNESS. It is a matter that I have had very little experience in personally. As I said before, a contractor could tell you much more about that than I could. In some way I arrive at the conclusion that we benefited the contractors more or less in that way.

Q. And thereupon you made the expedition to sixty-five hours, first adding to the $2,350 $35,000, and then adding three trips more, and carrying the total up to $70,000, did you?—A. Yes, sir; for the purpose of getting up good service between those points.

Now, on the 25th of December, 1878, John W. Dorsey wrote to his brother. The letter is 26 X, and found on page 2239 :

[Merchant's Hotel, L. N. Griffin, proprietor.]

BISMARCK, DAK. TER., December 25, 1878.

DEAR SENATOR: I send you the inclosed blank d'fts as per your instructions.

I send you the inclosed blank drafts.

If all right I suppose you will send to Mr. Miner. I returned here Monday after a very uncomfortable trip of nearly eight hundred miles by stage. The last ten days the thermometer has ranged from zero to 20 below, and there is almost six inches of snow from Keogh here. There were five passengers down on the stage. Your favor of the 9th is received, and I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out, though I have no doubt but this route alone will pay him or some one else $100,000 clear of all expense within the life of the contract.

You may think that I am oversanguine, but I would be willing to take my chances on it. I did not expect to suit every one when I came here, and have succeeded in not doing it. Mr. Vaile, nor any one else, knows anything about the difficulties one has to contend with here till he tries it. I thank you very much for your offer, and will be pleased to accept it and do the best I can. I would be glad to leave here at once, but Mr. Vaile writes me to start the mail three trips a week January 1, on horseback. I don't want anything to do with it, as he will not be pleased if I do ever so well. I have done all the hard work and he talks as if it was fun to do it. I will do the best I can while I remain, but hope to leave soon after Jan'y 1st.

Thanking you for your many favors, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

J. W. DORSEY.

Gentlemen, you see the reiteration of what he told the men out on the route—that it would be increased to $150,000. The increase of three trips a week came, and he was waiting, according to Vaile's orders, as he states in this letter, to put on the service on the 1st of January, 1879; but he says there can be a profit of $100,000 a year clear of all expenses within the contract term. It seems to me that these letters, one written to Rerdell about the men making trouble as to their money, and the other written to his brother in December, both go conclusively to show that what the men testified to was the truth. Stephen W. Dorsey gives an explanation of this. It is found on page 3885. The letter I have read to you was read to him :

Do you recollect receiving that letter?—A. Yes. But I do not understand how it got in here.

Q. In this case?—A. Yes

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Rerdell kept it as a voucher. [Laughter.]

Q. Mr. Ingersoll says Rerdell kept it as a voucher; do you know anything about that?—A. No; I do not.

Mr. MERRICK. There seems to have been a distribution of the papers between you and him, respectively, some of which belonging to the one ought to have been in the custody of the other.

Q. It seems that in your letter to John W. Dorsey you had informed him that Vaile had bought out—A. [Interposing.] No, not that Vaile had bought out, but had cut out.

Mr. MERRICK. This word is "bought" out.

The WITNESS. Well, Vaile had bought out nothing that I know of at that time. That was the period in which I was having some difficulty with Mr. Vaile in regard to these notes over here.

Q. You were having some difficulty with Mr. Vaile about that time?—A. Yes.

Q. What about?—A. About these notes over at the German-American Bank.

Q. Did you not inform John Dorsey that Vaile had bought out?—A. No, sir; I did not; that is some error, either in the print or in the writing.

Mr. MERRICK. I have the original letter here, 26 X, before me, and that seems to conform to the printed copy in the record; there is no alteration in it.

The WITNESS. That may refer to the time when Mr. Vaile came in, the August previous; but that is in answer to a letter which I will explain, if you desire.

Then there was an interruption of counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

“Your favor of the 9th is received, and I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out”—

Did you write to him on the 9th?—A. Yes, I think I did. After this letter was published in the testimony here I referred back, and found a copy of a letter that was very much blurred; but I thought what I said was that “Mr. Vaile had cut you out,” but not bought out, and that an error had been made.

Q. You said Mr. Vaile had “cut you out,” not bought you out?—A. Yes; I think that is what I said.

Q. There is no “you” here?—A. That is not my letter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is an answer to his letter.

Q. That is an answer to your letter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. “I am glad Mr. Vaile has bought out.”—A. He probably misapprehended what I said. When I came back here the first of December, if you will allow me to state it, I found that Mr. Miner had given to Mr. Vaile subcontracts covering all these important routes, which cut out entirely the interest of Peck and Dorsey, and also cut off the drafts which had been given to me to protect this note over here and the money I had advanced, and the whole thing was in Vaile’s hands; but I could not have said anything about being bought out at that time.

Q. Vaile was trying to swindle the whole party then?—A. I don’t know; I did not see how he could protect the subcontracts after filing the subcontracts so as to cut out these drafts.

Q. Did you not in your letter to John Dorsey, to which this is a reply, say that Mr. Vaile had “taken the whole business, and is to pay you $10,000 for your interest?”—A. No, sir; I do not think so.

Q. “In payments to be strung out?”—A. No, sir; I do not think so.

Q. You do not think you did?—A. I do not think I did.

Q. Have you any recollection?—A. No recollection of it.

Q. You have no recollection of it?—A. No, sir; there may have been some possible conversation at that time (because that is when we were trying to fix the matters at the bank) in which Vaile said “I will take all these and pay Peck $10,000 and Dorsey $10,000.” That is a possible thing.

Q. I do not want possibilities. What is your recollection?—A. I do not remember. We had a good many controversies and a good many meetings.

Q. Did you not inform John Dorsey that Vaile had actually taken the whole business, and was to pay him $10,000 for his interest and Peck $10,000 for his interest?—A. I think not; I do not remember it. I say it is possible that I did.

Q. Do you remember that you did not?—A. I don’t remember whether I did or did not.

Q. Was it a fact?—A. I say I don’t remember whether it is a fact or not.

Q. No; you say you do not remember whether you told him or not.—A. I do not remember whether it is a fact or not.

Q. You do not remember whether it is a fact or not?—A. No.

Gentlemen, we called upon the other side to produce this letter of the 9th of December, and we called upon them to produce their press copy of the letter. We served them with the proper notice—the notice we were required to serve upon them when we wanted papers of this kind to offer to the jury. We had no desire to conceal anything, but simply wanted to get at the whole truth, and after we had made this call for the letter of December 9, Mr. Ingersoll, the counsel for Dorsey, said “we won’t give it to you. You can’t get it. Here is one of the 7th you can have.” As the letter of the 7th had no relation to the matter at all, and was not in controversy, and had no bearing upon the case, we did not care about offering you the letter of the 7th. We wanted the letter of the 9th, in which we claim that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote to his brother, John W. Dorsey, and told him that Vaile had bought out, and that Vaile was going to give him $10,000 for his interest, and pay Peck $10,000 for his interest. We wanted to show you what Stephen W. Dorsey had written at that time, but they kept it out, just as they kept out their books and refused to give them to you. In other words, after Stephen W. Dorsey took the witness stand, and was sworn, or affirmed, to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, undertaking to conceal nothing from you, he permitted his counsel to stand up and say to the court and to you, gentlemen of the jury, who are to pass upon the question of his guilt or innocence, "We will not furnish you with that evidence." I submit to you that when they do not furnish us with evidence that is called for, and is evidence in the case, it is your duty to presume that that evidence would have hurt them, or otherwise they would have offered it to you.

Mr. HENKLE. That is a new rule.

Mr. MERRICK. We do not claim that to be the rule on notice to produce, and failure to produce; but when a party goes upon the witness stand and avails himself of the privileges of the act of Congress to testify, and on cross-examination he is called upon to produce papers which are in his possession, and he says he will not produce them, the jury must presume that if he did produce them they would prove that he was not telling the truth, or operate against him.

Mr. HENKLE. That question has been decided exactly the other way.

Mr. MERRICK. I shall ask the court to instruct the jury that that is the rule of law, and I shall argue the point in my argument of the facts and the law, when I come to make it.

Mr. KER. I say to you, gentlemen, and I think his honor will so instruct you in this matter, that every presumption is against the party to whose possession the paper is traced if he does not produce it on notice.

I have told you about the conversation that John W. Dorsey had with Mr. Lambert. On the 12th of January, 1879, John W. Dorsey had another conversation with Lambert. Lambert was carrying the mail, had made his first trip, and when he came back he saw John W. Dorsey. I read from page 2179:

Q. Then after you got on the road, you say you had another conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In January, 1879?—A. I did.

Q. And in that conversation he volunteered the remark that his brother would have everything on the road and make a good road of it?—A. Yes, sir; that is what he told me.

Q. How did that conversation come to pass?—A. I started in on him about the condition that the road was in. It was not equipped or anything of the kind. He told me it was not his fault; that his brother was running that part of the business; that he was doing the best he could.

You know this was Miner's route. On the next page, about the middle of the page:

Q. Then you were in Bismarck on the 11th and 12th of January, do you say? Was it at that time that the conversation took place?—A. It was right after that, before I went back on the trip.

On the 29th of January, 1879, Vaile and Miner asked to withdraw the subcontract of Vaile. Then, for some reason that is not explained, on the 3d of February they asked to rescind that order and allow Vaile's subcontract to remain on file. On the 12th of January, 1879, there was a new schedule. It is 43 T, and found on page 2152. Gentlemen, that schedule was all written by John R. Miner, and was signed by Mr. Brady. On the 1st of March, 1879, there was a newspaper article sent to Brady in a letter signed J. P. Kidder. The letter is 35 T, found on page 2150. Rerdell wrote that letter and Judge Kidder signed it. I think there is an indorsement of Mr. Maginnis on the back of it. Then there was a letter of H. H. Bingham, on the 11th of June, 1879. That is 34 T. General Bingham was a member of Congress at that time, and represented a district in Philadelphia. I do not think he was much interested out there in Dakota. His letter is recorded on page 2148. It is a very conservative letter, marked at the head "personal:"

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1879.

MY DEAR GENERAL: The inclosed explains itself. Please file the paper with the other recommendations in the case. The increase seems to be very much needed, and the friends of the interest are very earnest and sincere in the movement. I hope you can see it possible to determine the question favorably before July 1st. Can you let me know just how the case stands and the chances for your favorable action?

Very truly, yours,

HENRY H. BINGHAM.

General BRADY, Washington, D. C.

I should judge, from the tone of that letter, that it made very little difference to General Bingham whether the request was granted or not. It seems that the article was brought to him, and doing as members of Congress sometimes do, to oblige those who are either members or ex-members of Congress, he wrote that very conservative letter to General Brady, and inclosed the newspaper article. Brady took the letter and newspaper article and had them put on file along with the rest of the papers. I am showing you the material upon which Brady based his orders for increase.

On the 31st of July, 1879, there was a letter from Frederick Billings (32 T, page 2143). I suppose it is a genuine letter. But over on the back of it you see it is indorsed:

BREWER: Increase Bismarck to Tongue River, as requested within, to 6 times a week.
BRADY.

Make the order to commence as quickly as contractor can put on the increased service.

B.

On the 2d of August, 1879, an order was made (39 T, page 2151):

1st. From August 11, 1879, increase service three trips per week, and allow contractor $35,000 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

2d. Increase pay of subcontractor in like amount.

Gentlemen, I have shown you what this increase was based upon—the papers that were brought in to have this made a $70,000 route. First, there was a letter from Judge Kidder, which I showed you, containing an extract from a newspaper, the Avant-Courier; then the petition written by Rerdell; then the letter from General Bingham; and, fourth, the letter from Frederick Billings, with the newspaper article in it. Those were the letters, or petitions, or whatever you choose to call them, upon which Brady based his action and said to Brewer:

Increase Bismarck to Tongue River, as requested within, to 6 times a week.

Make the order to commence as quickly as contractor can put on the increased service.

It seems to me that it was not a very forcible recommendation that was made to General Brady, but upon those letters he made this order to increase the service up to six trips a week, and allowed them at that rate $70,000.

On the 5th of January, 1880, Postmaster Lounsberry, who was on the stand—you remember him; he told you about the Bad Lands—sent a telegraphic dispatch to Brady (48 T, page 2153). He says:

Regarding Keogh service, whole shall be regarded failure. Impossible for any person to perform in winter on present schedule. Could probably secure six days' service.

Then, on the 31st of July, 1881, the entire route was discontinued.

John W. Dorsey, it seems, did a great deal of talking while he was out there. He talked with McLellan, with Cable, with Pennell, with Lambert, and finally he had a conversation with Lounsberry, found on page 2681 :

Q. What were you asked to do? Let us understand.—A. A petition was presented to me for the establishment of a post-office on the Little Missouri River.

Q. When was that?—A. That was about December, 1878.

Q. Who presented it to you?—A. John W. Dorsey.

Q. What did he wish you to do when he presented it to you?—A. The petition was before me. Whether it was accompanied by the usual blank form for the establishment of a post-office or not, I do not remember, but it was to certify to the fact of a settlement being up there, and the necessity for a post-office.

Q. Did you so certify?—A. I did not.

Q. Was there any settlement up there?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any necessity for a post-office?—A. No, sir; I so understood.

There was what John W. Dorsey did in 1878—present that petition to Lounsberry. You will know, from the testimony, as to the rule and the law, that before a new office is put on the nearest postmaster has to send a certificate giving the distance and stating that at such a settlement or such a place a post-office ought to be established. So John W. Dorsey requested Lounsberry to certify that there was a settlement up there on the Missouri River, and that there was a necessity for a post-office being established at that place. That Lounsberry very properly refused to do.

Before I read what John W. Dorsey said in relation to that I want to remind you that after Lounsberry had left the witness-stand and gone into the ante-room, John W. Dorsey came to him there and they had a conversation. This is what Lounsberry says, in relation to that, on page 2681 :

Question. Since you were on the stand before have you had any conversation with any of these defendants?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. With which one?—A. John W. Dorsey.

Q. What did Mr. Dorsey say to you, if anything?—A. Mr. Dorsey said he was very glad that I was not examined as to that post-office to be established on the Little Missouri River.

Q. What else did he say, if anything?—A. He said he was glad I had not been examined on that case, because I was asked to certify to a petition for this post-office and refused to do so.

Q. You had refused?—A. I had refused to certify to it. He said that was the only wrong that he had asked any one to do in connection with this route.

There was Dorsey's statement made to Lounsberry—"That was the only wrong he had asked any one to do in connection with this route." Now, I will read what John W. Dorsey says about that on page 4106 :

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Lounsberry at the time he mentions in this testimony during the present trial?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you state to the jury what that conversation was?—A. Well, after he testified here, I supposed he was through then and I could talk to him freely, and I told him just as I honestly felt about it. I did have a conversation with him as he states, but he did not state it correctly as I stated it to him. I said that it was the only wrong that I had done in this business, or known to be done. That is what I told him as far as I now remember. He says, "I believe it." I never thought then he would be called again, but I stated just what was true. It was the only thing I had ever done, or tried to do, or known to be done in this business; the only wrong thing.

Q. Now, when you came back to Bismarck and Keogh, you stated, I believe, last night that you found a petition there and some papers, and among other things a letter from Rerdell?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do in consequence of that letter?—A. I carried this petition to Mr. Lounsberry and asked him to indorse it.

Q. What did he do?—A. He declined to do it.

Q. Then what did you do with the petition?—A. I think I inclosed it and wrote to Mr. Rerdell about it. That is what I think about it, but I had forgotten all about the thing, until it was brought out on the other trial of this case, entirely.

Q. Was Mr. Rerdell in Washington?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you wrote him a letter at the same time, you think?—A. I think I did. That is my recollection now.

Q. Do you know as a matter of fact what became of the petition afterwards?—A. I do not.

Q. With the qualification you have stated was the testimony that I have read of Mr. Lounsberry substantially true?—A. Yes, sir.

There he admits what he told to Lounsberry in the ante-room, but he undertakes to alter it in a way to weaken its force and at the same time help him. Mr. Lounsberry, you will remember, was a man of character, and I suppose it would have been a pretty hard thing for John W. Dorsey or anybody else to induce you gentlemen to think he was testifying to a lie. He was a man of intelligence, and by his conversation you could see that he knew what he was talking about. When he had that conversation with John W. Dorsey after he had left the stand, I presume you will agree with me that Mr. Lounsberry knew exactly what John W. Dorsey had told him. And when Mr. Lounsberry says that John W. Dorsey told him "it was the only wrong that he had asked any one to do in connection with this route," I think you will be disposed to believe that Mr. Lounsberry was telling the truth, and that John W. Dorsey did not say to him, "It was the only wrong that I had done in this business, or known to be done."

But, gentlemen, is it the only wrong thing? Have I not shown you his affidavits? If they were taken in blank, and handed over to somebody else to be filled in, to be used against the Government, I submit that is a wrong thing. If he took those affidavits and swore to them without knowing what he was swearing to, I submit to you, gentlemen, that is another wrong thing.

I need not recur to the letter of John W. Dorsey sent to Rerdell on December 9, 1882 (page 4150), in which he told Rerdell he was going to punish him if he (Rerdell) pleaded guilty or took the stand against the defendants. I will not bother you with that.

On this route Vaile drew the pay, and Miner drew part of the pay. Vaile says, on page 4062:

Q. You stated yesterday that you made a loss upon the Tongue River route, did you not?—A. Yes.

Gentlemen, I want you to follow me in order to see where this loss comes in:

Q. In calculating your loss, did you calculate as expenses of the routes the building of ranches?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you calculate the expense of building mounds?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you calculate the expense of making a road?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you calculate the expense of making bridges?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And of all that permanent outlay you counted in as part of the expense?—A. Yes, sir; because we did not own the land; it was Government land; and as the railroad ran over us we abandoned those ranches; I think $25 was all we ever received for a ranch.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to how many men and horses you had at any time upon that route?—A. I have not.

Q. What other expenses did you include in your estimate?—A. Well, all; everything.

Q. Well, what?—A. Paying labor—

Q. [Interposing.] Labor for what?—A. Carrying mail; and ranchmen. We had to keep our own ranchers. Supplying all the stock with food; grain was very expensive up there; I think we paid as high as six cents a pound for oats in some instances, perhaps more.

Q. Anything else?—A. Oh, I can't now enumerate; but whatever was necessary to keep men and animals and guard stations.

Q. You do not know how many animals you had there?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how many men you had there?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how much was paid to each man?—A. I do not.

Q. Have you any knowledge whatever of the details of the matter?—A. I have not.

Q. Except that you were called upon for a certain amount of money?—A. That is so.

Q. And you paid it?—A. I paid it.

Q. That is all the knowledge you have on the subject?—A. That is all the knowledge I have.

Q. What was the aggregate amount of expenses on that route?—A. I could not say that. It was after I really got possession of it, or my men were in charge of it, that we sought to pay up everything every quarter.

Q. Do you know how much you paid out?—A. No, I cannot say that; I kept a sort of run of it in my head.

Q. Do you know how much you received upon that route?—A. No, I do not.

Q. Did you keep any books?—A. No.

Then, on page 4064, the next page:

Q. If the contract was a losing one, why did you continue it?—A. If my attention had been called to the provision on that on its first expedition, I think I should have thrown it up.

Q. The contract gave you the absolute right, on an order of expedition, to throw it up, did it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was then a losing contract?—A. It was.

Q. You knew it was then a losing contract?—A. Well, of course I could not say positively that we would lose until I had experimented under the expedition, but I felt sure that I could not make any money, and if I had thought I would not have been jeopardized in other matters, I think I should have thrown it up.

Q. If it was a losing contract before expedition, and the expedition was to be made according to the rule laid down in the law, how could it, after expedition, become a profitable contract?—A. It did not.

Q. How could it be?—A. It could not be.

Q. Then why did you not throw up the contract at the time the expedition was ordered?—A. As I say, my attention was not called to this provision in the contract. I may have known of that provision years ago, but I don't think I had read one of those contracts for twelve years, may be longer.

You see he could have thrown up the contract at any time after it was increased, if he had wanted to, and I ask your attention to what he says about losses. His claim was that he lost from $40,000 to $50,000 upon this route, and we wanted to know where he lost it.

I recall your attention to the fact that the schedule time was not made on this route. Barnes said that it took him from seven to nine days; Lambert says he went in from eight to ten days. You know the time was reduced to sixty-five hours. It had been eighty-four hours, and then by some means it ran up to one hundred and eight hours. That does not appear upon the record, gentlemen, only upon the back of one of the jackets. There does not appear to be a schedule of one hundred and eight hours; there is of eighty-four. And Mr. Henkle strenuously insisted that it was run up to one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes, and showed it from the records.

Mr. KER. I also can show it, certainly, by 89 T, page 2881. That is the jacket containing applications for remission of fines and deductions, and on that jacket is a statement that the schedule time is one hundred and eight hours. But nowhere else is it stated upon the record, openly, where it could be found out, where people could see, as was done in other cases, whether there was an order fixing the schedule at one hundred and eight hours. But take the testimony, and you will find that, by some mysterious means known to Vaile, who was "close to Brady," and Brady himself, it was run up to one hundred and eight hours. Calculate the traveling time, and you will find that they traveled the route in one hundred and eight hours. If they were longer on the road than one hundred and eight hours they were fined, but if they performed the trip in one hundred and eight hours they were not fined. The old schedule was eighty-four hours, but between them they quietly and secretly made it one hundred and eight hours, and in that way they were saved from the fines and saved the deductions.

Mr. HENKLE.. They did not save the fines.

Mr. KER. They did not save fines for not making the trips, because when trips are not performed there can be no remission of them without a great deal of trouble.

Miner says in his oath that it took twelve men and thirteen animals. To increase, it would take one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. In proportion that would have given Miner about $150,000 a year. He took the other oath away, leaving the damaging piece of evidence upon the record that there had been another oath, and if it had not been that Brewer was a faithful clerk that evidence never would have been left there at all. They left the piece of evidence on record that they had filed another oath stating that eleven men and twelve animals were actually employed, and for the increase it would take thirty-seven men and seventy-three animals. Gentlemen, if you take the oath that has been taken away—the one that I have last referred to, thirty-seven men and seventy-three animals—it will be just about the amount of money that Brady allowed for this expedition. But I suppose they wanted the oath for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals to remain, in order that whoever would look at it might suppose that Brady had made one of the best bargains that could be made for the Government.

Barnes testified that he ran from January to April, 1879. He said there then were eight men and eighteen horses. Lambert said there were eight men and twenty-two horses. There is a great deal of difference between that and the oath that Miner took, one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. Pennell said that for the sixty-five-hour schedule it would take eight men and forty animals, but when he was figuring with Rerdell—you know Rerdell was told what to do—Rerdell just doubled that, making it sixteen men and eighty animals. But Rerdell did not make out the oath.

Pennell says they paid $75 to $90 per head for the stock that they bought. He helped John W. Dorsey to buy the twenty-five head they had. If you will take the stock that they purchased and multiply it by the price they had to pay out there, $75—or give them the highest figures for good stock, $90—then I defy my friend on the other side to count up and by any possible system of arithmetic make it appear that Vaile had made a losing contract. Take the entire outfit and allow for building ranches. Rerdell says that part of the $10,000 he paid out went to pay for the horses, and we have not heard of any other money that was expended. Of course they had to pay men for carrying the mail, and Vaile says he had to pay guards. Did you hear from any witness who had been over that route that there ever had been an Indian down upon the route except before the route was established?

But with the oath calling for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals was not where the steal came in so badly as it was when Brady ordered it increased to six trips. When Brady increased that service he allowed for three hundred men and three hundred animals. Just to think of it! His increase allowed them pay for three hundred men and three hundred animals! This last increase was pro rata, for in it was calculated the one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals that Miner had sworn would be required for three trips. The trips were doubled, the calculation was doubled, and it amounted to three hundred men and three hundred animals. Vaile says, at page 4070 :

Q. Did you know anything about the affidavit on the route from Bismarck to Fort Keogh or Tongue River?—A. I do not now recollect anything about it. I may have at that time.

Q. As a mail contractor, is it your opinion that to carry the mail on the route from Bismarck to Fort Keogh three times a week on a schedule of sixty-five hours one hundred and fifty carriers were necessary?—A. I think so.

Q. You think one hundred and fifty carriers were necessary?—A. Not actual carriers. I mean men engaged in one way or another in the mail service.

Q. What do you mean by men engaged in one way or another in the mail service?—A. Cutting hay, distributing forage, staying about the ranches, ranch-tenders, guards, and so forth. We often had to send guards out with the men.

Gentlemen, his honor made a remark during the course of the trial that they might as well charge for the men who made the clothes or furnished the food for the men who carried the mail, and then charge for the men who made the shoes. They could have gone on in that way estimating for the number of men required to do it; they could have estimated for the men required to bake the bread and do the cooking, and then they could have estimated for the people who were to furnish those men with clothes and shoes; and they could have estimated for the men who shod the horses, and then for the clothing of the men who shod the horses, and they could string it out in that way to a very considerable length. I suppose that is Mr. Vaile's idea.

Q. Guards with the men?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is it your opinion that to perform the service on that schedule it needed as many men as horses?—A. Yes, sir; I think it did.

Q. You think it did?—A. Yes, sir; we never had as many as we ought to have had.

Q. Did you ever have one hundred and fifty men employed there?—A. I don't think we ever did.

Q. You ought to have had one hundred and fifty men there?—A. I think so. We had a great deal of trouble. Our men were scared off repeatedly, and we lost trips because we had not sufficient guards.

Q. You had not a sufficient number of men?—A. Yes, sir; it was one of those routes three hundred and ten miles long, and there was not a man between the two points; or, we will say, two hundred and fifty miles of it perhaps, and you had to get them from one end or the other.

Q. You say there were no men between the two points?—A. Out at Fort Lincoln, as I am told, there was a settlement, and again, perhaps, forty or fifty miles from Fort Keogh, there may have been a settlement.

Q. It was a wilderness, was it?—A. It was a wild——

Q. [Interposing.] It was a wilderness?—A. Yes, sir; and if anything happened to any of our drivers or men, there we were, and we had nothing to go on.

Q. On the 30th of September, 1878, had not the winter's supply of feed and hay been put up?—A. The supply of hay, I think, was put up, but there was no grain on the road.

Gentlemen, I want to explain to you what was meant by this statement in Vaile's testimony [submitting map to jury and pointing]. Here is Bismarck. The route ran along here. But they tell us that instead of running directly, it ran up here to a point forty miles up the river. Then when it got up to this point, forty miles up the Yellowstone River, the mail was carried by the same carrier. This was John W. Dorsey's route, that ran down from Buford to Fort Keogh. There was only one carrier for both routes for forty miles there. Then when the mail reached this point, forty miles up the river—there was no settlement there, it was a mere stopping place—it cut off east across the country, and for two hundred and fifty miles right straight across that country there was not a living soul upon the route. Up here, upon the Buford route, there were some settlements. You have heard about the settlers upon the Yellowstone. Up here there were some settlers. But that was an entirely different country from the two hundred and fifty miles right across to Bismarck.

The original pay upon this route was $2,350, and I told you it was increased to $70,000. Gentlemen, I want you to follow me while I analyze this to show you how much they lost.

There were deductions upon that route. Forty-six thousand two hundred and ninety-nine dollars and eighty-nine cents were deducted from their pay. Brady remitted $13,303.74. He remitted for every trip in which they were late—every one. Mr. Lake, the clerk, reminded him, upon the jackets that were shown you, where they applied for a remission of fines, that he had remitted everything in the way of fines for a loss of time, and if he remitted any more it would be for trips that they had not performed. If they did not perform the trip at all, there should be no remission for that. But they received back every dollar that was lost because they were late. When Brady went out of office the only thing that remained unremitted was deductions for trips that they had never performed, and the amount deducted for trips that were never performed was $13,994.84. That was all that Brady left when he went out of office unremitted. One half of all that had been imposed in the way of fines and deductions during his time he remitted, and he would have remitted the whole of it if it had not been that his clerk called his attention to it. But after Brady went out of office, after this dishonest Second Assistant Postmaster-General was turned out and an honest administration came in in his place, they figured it out, and $18,991.31 were deducted from their pay, money that Mr. Brady should have deducted, and which an honest administration recovered back, taking Brady's orders as a basis to go upon. Therefore, you see they did not come out so badly after all. The route was started, or ought to have been started, in July, 1878, and in July, 1881, it was discontinued. The total amount of money they gathered in during those three years was $157,487.83. That was their pay; money actually received during the three years they held this route; and that, of course, was independent of the fines and deductions. One hundred and fifty seven thousand four hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-three cents passed out of the public Treasury into the hands and into the pockets of Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner. Now, gentlemen, taking that for three years' service, do you think they lost any money? You can do a little figuring on your own account. You can then see how much that service netted or should have netted these people.

Between the points that I have shown you there were no post-offices, no people, and of course there could be no revenue, and nothing to the advantage of the Government, good or bad. But the mail carriers tell you and the postmaster tells you what mail was sent out and what was received, and you can judge whether Brady's orders were honest or dishonest when you see the amount of mail matter that was actually being carried over the route. They say that when the mail went from Bismarck over to Miles City it was from fifty pounds up to two hundred and fifty pounds when there was a heavy mail. But when it came back to Bismarck from Miles City it was very light. The testimony of Mr. Lounsberry is that he usually made up two sacks of mails to go over from Bismarck to Fort Keogh, and he says that when it came back in the same two sacks there were thirty to forty pounds of mail matter. There is the best way you can take to get at the value of the route—thirty to forty pounds of mail coming from Fort Keogh, the place that was "being rapidly settled up, and required more facilities."

Why, General Sherman told you on the stand that there were no settlers between Bismarck and this point that I have pointed to, on the Yellowstone, on the map. There were settlers, a very few of them, at Miles City, which was a place that was growing, I suppose, like all these Western places grow where there is a railroad established or a military post; and General Sherman said that there were a few settlers up there on the Yellowstone, but none between that and Bismarck.

Gentlemen, we had in this case overt acts. I have shown you the petitions, letters, and papers, and I have shown you the orders that Brady made. There is no use in taking up any more time, because I have, I think, shown you that the allegations contained in the indictment are correct, and that the dates that are there mentioned are the correct dates. If my friends on the other side should undertake to dispute the facts just ask them to hand you the papers, and I think you can then judge for yourselves whether what I have told you and shown is correct, or what they say is correct.

Gentlemen, I have gone carefully over this testimony. It has been a long and tedious task. You have listened with the greatest attention, and I must thank you for the patient attention you have given me.

The testimony that I have referred to covers 4481 printed pages of what has been taken down by the stenographer and printed in what we usually call the record. You have listened to the testimony of one hundred and fifty witnesses, some of them called more than twice. You have had read to you, handed to you, and exhibited before you two thousand seven hundred and sixty-one separate pieces of paper of documentary evidence.

And just here your, honor, I think it is my duty to pay a tribute to the clerk, through whose hands these papers have passed. With wonderful ability and skill he has so marked those papers that not one of them bears a duplicate mark, and there is not a single inaccuracy in the marks upon them. And also to the gentleman who has come with these papers from the Post-Office Department; he has, as you have seen, handed out, when called upon, these two thousand seven hundred and sixty-one papers without the loss of half a second of time.

That is the mass of testimony through which I have wandered, in bringing it together and putting it in a concise and, as I thought, clear shape, in order that you might understand the different events and the order in which they occurred. There are a great many dates mentioned, and it would be impossible for you or for me or for anybody else to remember them. But in mentioning the testimony, in mentioning every piece of paper, I think without exception I have given to you the official mark upon it, as I have given the page upon which it is recorded; and I have done that from a conscientious regard for the duty that devolves upon me not to misstate one single item of evidence, not to misinterpret one single word that fell from the lips of a witness, but to give it to you properly and truthfully, so that the gentlemen who will succeed me cannot say that I have endeavored in the slightest way to mislead you.

And I ask you, gentlemen, when you come to hear from those gentlemen—and I repeat, I think, for the third time—do not permit one statement to go unchallenged when you think or when you know that it differs from the testimony I have read to you or the paper I have handed to you, for I have given the official mark upon every paper about which I have spoken, and the page upon which it is recorded.

There are twenty-one oaths in this case. I will drop from those twenty-one the oath that was taken on route 38150, called the Saguache route; that was an oath taken by Sanderson, and I do not want to hold anybody accountable for what somebody else has done, unless it was done in pursuance of this conspiracy. And I will drop from that twenty-one, also, Vaile's oath. That will be two. Nineteen oaths I have handed and shown you. Has there been one of those nineteen oaths that has not been written in, altered, erased, or changed? I examined them carefully, and compared them with the evidence. When I started out I told you I thought there were sixteen altered out of eighteen. I find that there were twenty-one oaths. I take off Sanderson's and Vaile's, leaving nineteen; and I submit to you that there is not one of them that is not a false, fraudulent, forged oath. Perkins's oath was signed in blank, and filled in here in Washington. It was one of the nineteen. Vaile's oath that I have excluded from the nineteen, if it were not altered, if it were not changed, erased, and written in, like the others, gentlemen, it was as false in every respect as any one of the oaths exhibited to you in this case. Twenty false and fraudulent oaths placed in the department, in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to get expedition upon seventeen of these routes. Twenty oaths were used, and not one of them a truthful oath. Not one of the nineteen is such an oath as would bear upon its face even the stamp of truthfulness.

I do not want to take up your time in going over the dates. I have shown you that on the 21st of April, 1879, the jurat was signed to four of the oaths made by John W. Dorsey. Three of his oaths were signed, according to the jurat, on the 26th of April, 1879, and those three oaths, made on the 26th of April, 1879, were written or filled in by Stephen W. Dorsey. They cannot lay the blame of that upon Montford C. Rerdell, because these seven oaths were signed and written on days when it was conclusively shown that Rerdell was out West, in Sidney, Nebraska, in Greeley, Colorado, and in Denver, Colorado, writing letters that are here and undisputed.

Then you have the oaths of Miner and you have oaths of Peck. I handed them to you until I was tired of showing them; until, I am sure, you were tired of looking at them. "Chico Springs, Sept. 18, 1878," was at the head, and down at the bottom was the jurat of the notary public, signed the same day. And accompanying these letters put in the department were proposals bearing the same date, said to have been signed by Peck, but really signed by Miner. Mr. Merrick reminds me that the proposals were dated at Washington City on the same day the oath was dated at Chico Springs, "Sept. 18, 1878." The offer was dated "Washington, Sept. 18, 1878." The oath was supposed to have gone to Peck, to be signed and sworn to; but could it reach Peck on the day that Miner says he wrote the date in Washington and sent it to be sworn to? These oaths were put in the Post-Office Department. They were brought here, and Miner, when on the stand, had to admit that, from looking at the oath, the figures and letters for the number of men and animals must have been written in at a time different from the time when he wrote the body of the oath. Every one of those oaths had been written here by Miner, and there was no dispute about it; and on every proposal where Peck's name was signed John R. Miner wrote the proposal and signed Peck's name to it.

In the matter of increases—I do not want to follow them all the way through, but I want to give you those that took place within a short space of time. From the 22d of April, 1879, to the 2d of August of that year there were seventeen increases made by Thomas J. Brady. On the 22d of April, 1879, he made one increase; on the 24th another, and the 29th another. On the 1st and on the 9th of May each he made an increase. On the 3d, on the 12th, 24th, 26th, and 27th of June he made each day an increase, with this exception, that on the 26th of June he made increases upon two routes. On the 8th of July he made increases upon two routes; on the 10th of July he made increases upon two routes, and on the 23d of July an increase upon one route. And on the 2d of August he made an increase upon one route.

Gentlemen, the fiscal year begins, as I told you, on the 1st day of July. These increases were made to begin about the 1st of July. In the months of June and July there were eleven increases. At the time that other people were seeking recreation and rest at the seashore and elsewhere Thomas J. Brady was here in Washington. Would they have you to believe that Brady was stopping here in Washington, in the heat of this city, remaining here from a simple sense of his duty, and with a desire to serve the public, at the time that his associates, his chief and others, were away, and when he himself ought to have been away, because that is the time allowed to him in which to seek rest and recreation? He was here; and I suppose the gentlemen on the other side will ask you to believe that he was here from a sincere desire to do his duty to the people and to his superiors. But I say, as the records show, Thomas J. Brady remained here with the people who were acting with him, when the other people in his office were away, in order that he might the more safely carry on the business of robbing the public Treasury. And I guarantee you he never made an order and trusted to the good faith of Dorsey or of Vaile to pay him in years afterward. He exacted his toll in advance. He says, "I did not take any money." But did he take any checks or drafts? He was not asked that, nor did he say, "I did not take any post office drafts," such as you have seen before you. He was here, and he remained here to reap from his co-conspirators the benefit and advantage that he was to receive from making the orders that were made upon the dates that I have specified.

The COURT. Mr. Ker, would you rather conclude before taking a recess?

Mr. KER. I cannot conclude before the recess, but I will finish very shortly after the recess.

The COURT. Then we will take a recess.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the court took the usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KER. If your honor please, with regard to the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, No. 35015, I find on page 4718, just below the middle of the page, this statement:

Brady gave them a weekly service, and brought the time down to ten hours.

It should have been:

Brady gave them a daily service, or six trips a week, and brought the time down to ten hours.

It is a slight inaccuracy, but even in that respect I would like to have it corrected.

The COURT. Yes, it was six trips a week.

Mr. KER. Gentlemen, I desire in a short way to analyze the acts that have been performed, and the result of the work of Mr. Brady, backed by the petitions and backed by the oaths that I have shown you. I will take the statement of the defendants, which statement, of course, we do not admit, but on the contrary deny. In the division, or so-called division, of the routes Vaile received six of the routes mentioned in the indictment. I find that the original pay upon the six routes that he claims to have received was $15,980. Five of these routes started at one trip a week and one of them started at two. Brady, by his orders for increase of trips alone, gave upon these routes $55,340.91. He brought two up to seven trips, two up to six trips, and two up to three trips. The amount that Brady allowed for expedition was $140,588.76. Add together the amount at which these routes were started, $15,980, the amount for trips, $55,340.91, and for expedition, $140,588.76, and the total amount of pay that Vaile received each year upon these routes, starting at the low figure I have given you, will be found to be $211,909.67. These figures are indisputable, because they are taken from testimony on the stand and taken from the records themselves. We are unable to tell you, in three instances, what the profit was, but upon the balance of them, as I have taken it from the record, the profit is shown to have been $37,336.91. As I say, that is not all. I have given you as much as I can find.

Stephen W. Dorsey took eleven routes. Of these eleven routes, eight were increased to seven trips and three to three trips. The original contract price at which they were let was $21,381. Brady allowed for trips alone $81,488.56. He allowed for expedition $151,625.57. Now, if we add the original cost, $21,381 and the trips, $81,488.56, and the expedition, $151,625.57, we find that, by Mr. Brady's generosity to Mr. Dorsey, Dorsey received each year $254,495.13. I have endeavored to obtain the profits that Dorsey received from these routes. I have not been able to obtain the profits from all of them, but such as I have I will give you. I find from the subcontracts on file that Mr. Dorsey's total profit was $104,714.42 every year. All that he had to pay out of that sum was for the expense of writing letters, Rerdell's salary, John W. Dorsey's salary, and Steele's salary.

By putting the routes together I find this state of facts (and I want you to bear in mind, gentlemen, that in my estimate there are two routes excluded entirely, Saguache and Lake City and Ouray and Los Pinos; they are not taken into this calculation at all): The original trips cost, on the entire service, excluding the two routes I have named, $37,361. Brady allowed for trips alone $136,829.47. He allowed for expedition alone $292,214.33. Adding together the amount allowed for trips and the amount allowed for expedition with the original pay, we find the total amount paid for service on these routes was $466,404.80 each year. We find that the total profit derived by these people on these routes, as far as we have been able to ascertain it, was $142,051.33 each year. What the whole amount was I cannot say, but the figures I have given you are taken from the record and are absolutely correct. Now, think of this, gentlemen! Think of the increase that Brady made, from the paltry sum of $37,361 up to $466,404.80, based upon old contracts, and with nothing at all to guide him but the oaths I have shown you backed by the petitions I have shown you!

I submit to you, gentlemen, there can be no claim of honesty in such a transaction as that. The whole amount of money that these people received during the contract term amounted to over $900,000, when it should have been a little over ninety thousand dollars.

You know the money that the Government receives from the offices on these routes is what is called "productiveness." Congress had in mind the revenue when it said "having due regard to productiveness." Let me give you a statement of the productiveness, that you may compare it with the orders made by Brady, and see how far he obeyed the laws that Congress made to guide him. Including the two routes, Saguache to Lake City and Ouray to Los Pinos, that I omitted from my other statement, we find that the original contract price was $41,135, and that the increases made by Brady brought the amount up to $448,670.90. In 1879 the entire revenue received, counting the railroad offices and those supplied from every source whatever, was $35,516.61, gross; the net revenue, throwing off the railroad towns, was $9,636.04. In 1880 the entire revenue, counting every office upon the routes, was $46,375.53; throwing off the railroad offices, the entire revenue was $12,307.24. In 1881 the entire revenue, counting every office, was $56,713.04; but excluding the railroad offices, the entire revenue was $10,807.26. There it is, gentlemen. The Government received $10,807.26 from the offices on these star routes, and Brady brought the pay up to $448,670.90. There is a statement from figures that I say are absolutely correct. You will find that when these routes were started, originally at $41,135, the revenues were $35,516.61—a very close connection between the revenue and the contract price. Of course, the mail had to be carried anyway. But when the revenues in 1881 were only $10,807.26, where was the excuse, where was the necessity, where was the reason, to grant an increase of trips, and to expedite the routes, and bring the pay of these contractors up to the enormous figure of $448,670.90—nearly half a million of dollars to carry ten thousand dollars' worth of mail?

The main question in this case, gentlemen, is: Was there a conspiracy? Was there an agreement between these people? When I started out I told you that it would be an impossibility for anybody to bring witnesses upon the stand who would say, "I heard them say that they were going to do it." You can judge from the actions of people, or by what these people told others. That is the only way you can tell what was in their minds and what they contemplated. We claim that there was an agreement between these people to have these routes increased and expedited without that expedition being needed and required. We claim that there was a secret agreement and bargain between these people to take these routes at low figures and to raise them up, through Brady's influence, to a large figure, without necessity, without reason, without warrant, and without cause; and by means of the expedition and increase of trips to bring contracts that were modest before up to an immense sum, and thereby take money from the public Treasury; money that should not have been paid out. I have gone over this case, and I have shown you, by the papers and the testimony, that the Government's claim has been made out, beyond a doubt. I have called to your attention the conversations between John W. Dorsey and different people; the statements of Miner, the statements of Vaile, the statements of Stephen W. Dorsey, and the statement of Thomas J. Brady made to John A. Walsh. From those statements, some made before expedition was granted and before the trips were increased, you can find nothing else than that it was running in their minds that the object was to have more trips and expedition and thereby to secure the money that we claim they started out to procure. It is true we have not been able to show, by anybody, that money was actually paid to Thomas J. Brady. It would be impossible for us to conceive or for you to conceive that these defendants would take the stand and admit the acts that we charge against them. When men band themselves together to commit an offense against the law and to rob the United States Treasury they are not expected to take the witness-stand and admit that fact. But witnesses have given their testimony, and John

A. Walsh has told you that Thomas J. Brady, in another similar transaction, said to him, "You remember the Price drafts," and that he "received 20 per cent. upon the increases that he made and 50 per cent. of all the remissions that he made." Gentlemen, John A. Walsh got down from that witness-stand without one word of cross-examination. His testimony was allowed to stand unchallenged, and without any attempt whatever to impeach it. With the exception of the contradiction, or attempt at contradiction, made by Thomas J. Brady when he equivocated in his statement of his money transactions with John A. Walsh, there is no contradiction of Walsh's testimony.

Were these defendants banded together? Did they divide off and take separate courses, and never reunite? Have I not shown you papers Miner gave upon the routes that Stephen W. Dorsey took and used to the very end of the contract term? Have I not shown you papers that belonged to the routes of John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck used and reused upon the routes that Vaile and Miner took? Were they not leagued and colleagued together, Stephen W. Dorsey altering and changing the figures in and upon routes that went to Vaile and Miner, Stephen W. Dorsey writing in words to the oaths that went into the Post-Office Department, and that Thomas J. Brady said he based his orders for expedition upon? If there is any doubt about that, if there can be any doubt about it, gentlemen, I can only recall you to one solitary instance, without wearying you any further, and I challenge the gentlemen on the opposite side to contradict it in one point. On the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt are acts which I will explain to you, that you may see if they do not point to guilt, with the finger of accuracy, about which there can be no mistake whatever. It was a route taken by John M. Peck, and the original pay was $2,888. The length of the route was two hundred and forty-three miles and there was only one trip a week upon it. The route began at Canyon City; that was on The Dalles and Baker City route, as I have explained to you, and therefore supplied from another source; it went on down through the country until it came to Camp Harney, a military camp, passed through the diminutive village of Alvord, where there was a revenue of $3 a year, and on down to Camp McDermitt, that also received mail from another source. During the entire distance of that route, two hundred and forty-three miles, there was no office to yield a dollar of revenue to the United States but Camp Harney and the miserable village of Alvord. Upon that route Miner wrote the proposal, Rerdell filled in the amount, and Stephen W. Dorsey filled in one word and signed Peck's name. There is no dispute about that. There you have Miner, Rerdell, and Stephen W. Dorsey together. Do you remember that I handed you the altered affidavit, dated the 18th of September, 1878, sworn to by Peck, and Miner wrote the body of it? Do you remember that it was put in together with the proposal on the 23d of December, 1878? Do you remember that on the 23d day of December, 1878, Thomas J. Brady made an order to increase the trips and reduce the time, and allowed for the same $18,612, when there never had been a mail carried over the route, when there never had been a letter carried over the route, and when the entire revenue upon that route, as shown by the jacket before him, was only $213? Do you remember afterwards that Vaile filed his subcontract? Do you remember that in July, 1879, Brady ordered an increase of trips and brought the service up to seven trips a week, allowing for the service $28,666.66? Do you remember that immediately after that Camp Harney was taken off the route and there was no office between Camp McDermitt on the one end and Canyon City on the other but the little village of Alvord that I have mentioned? You remember all that? Brady brought the contract price, starting at $2,888, up to the sum of $50,166.66. Vaile, with his subcontract on file, drew the money, and John R. Miner drew the money, and their profit on that route was $30,166.66. Do you call that an honest transaction? Does not that one route stamp indelibly upon your minds and upon your memories the fact that if Thomas J. Brady had been an honest Second Assistant Postmaster-General he would have regarded the interests of the United States, and would not have made an order giving $50,166.66 to carry the mail across that route, with only the village of Alvord upon it, and the entire revenue coming from the route being $120.32? One hundred and twenty dollars and thirty-two cents was the revenue, $50,166.66 was the pay, while Vaile and Miner received a profit of $30,166.66 every year. Was Brady honest? Could he have been honest? He was the man who held the key to the public Treasury. He was the man who was placed there to stand on guard between the people who would dare to make a raid upon the Treasury and the Treasury itself. He was the representative of the people. Like the vidette before the picket-guard, he was the man upon whom the public Treasury depended for safety and security. If the vidette proved a traitor, his own comrades would shoot him down like a dog in his tracks, as he deserved. Without Thomas J. Brady nothing could have been done by these conspirators. Does he give you an explanation of his action? He does. I will read it to you. It is the last piece of evidence I will read, and I read it because it is his own testimony, sworn to on the stand, and he must stand or fall by it. It is on page 3480:

Q. Do you know whether the number of orders for expedition made by you was greater or less than those made by your predecessors during the same length of time?

A. I do.

Q. Was it greater or less?—A. Greater.

Q. How much greater?—A. I cannot say.

Q. Was it twice as great, or five times as great, or ten times as great?—A. I can't say. I never made any comparison.

Q. Do you not know that you made more than ten times as many orders as Mr. Routt and Mr. Tyner, your predecessors, during a corresponding period in office?—A. I may have done so. I thought myself a ten times better Second Assistant than they were.

Q. Do you not know as a fact that you made more than twenty times as many orders as those predecessors of yours during the corresponding period?—A. As I say, I never made a comparison, and I don't know. There was very little expediting done under Mr. Tyner or Mr. Jewell, very little. It was not the Jewellian policy to build up the star service or to give much service to people dependent upon steamboat service.

Q. How was it as to Mr. Routt?—A. I don't remember anything about Mr. Routt's administration. I do not know that I have ever even looked up the number he might have expedited.

Q. Do you know whether your orders for expedition were not only more numerous than those of your predecessors, but were made for larger amounts?—A. I presume so. They were much better orders than those of my predecessors.

Q. You stated that Congress approved your course in expending money prior to the Congressional investigation. By what act did Congress so approve it?—A. They gave us the money to continue the service just as we had expedited and increased it.

Q. Did they approve it in any other way than by passing an act making an appropriation of money?—A. They adopted my suggestion to limit expedition to 50 per cent.

Q. Did they approve it in any other way than by passing an act appropriating money?—A. As I say, they adopted that suggestion of mine in addition.

Q. Did they approve it in any other way than by appropriating money?—A. That was a sufficient approbation, giving me the money to continue the service.

That was a sufficient approbation! All that he cared for, all that he desired, was to get the money. There he tells you that Mr. Jewell did not pursue the policy he pursued; that Mr. Routt did not pursue the policy that Brady pursued. And you saw by his letter that there were $3,000,000 covered into the public Treasury of unexpended money, and that he was asking Congress to give him $2,000,000 of that to carry out the policy of Brady. And when did that policy start? I have shown you that it began in 1878. It began when Vaile came into the combination and made the terms with Brady. Miner says that "Vaile was close to Brady." There is where Brady's policy began, and it continued on until he was removed from his office.

Now, gentlemen, did Brady get any of the money? He started in the internal revenue service at a salary of $1,500 or $2,000 a year. In 1876 he was made Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and I think the law specifies his salary to be $3,500. In 1880 you find him with three thousand shares of Chattanooga stock, worth $240,000, with other stock, with four or five newspapers, and living like a prince in Washington. Starting from the internal revenue service with a salary of $3,500 as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he comes into a princely fortune—a beautiful example for the youth of our country who wish to take to politics for a living.

But this is not a question of politics, gentlemen. It is a question of solemn duty. You have been selected to try this case. It is one that is surrounded by extreme difficulty. You have to remember the facts and circumstances, and you have to put them together. But you have a harder duty than even that. With unlimited wealth at their command, with friends flocking around like buzzards to feed upon the carcass, the wealth of Dorsey and Brady and Vaile is a fair object for every man who would take from them their ill-gotten gains. They are surrounded by a class of people who are anxious to wring from them the money they obtained from the Government. These people, with the money of Brady and Dorsey and Vaile in their pockets, are flying around through the community. People who are friends of yours, people who know you and who presume upon the friendship that they suppose exists between you, may be induced to make improper advances to you. Here, before his honor in open court, is the place where you are to get the testimony that is to guide you. If the polluted hand, coming from the other side, is stretched out to you, do not touch it. If the voice in supposed friendship is raised to advise or guide you in your judgment, push that friend aside. Such friendship, such advice as that, is contaminating, and you should never allow it.

We have had in the prosecution of this case a set of men the like of whom have never been on trial in this country. The history of the case, the action, the proceedings in it, are the subject of news to spread throughout the world. It goes upon the telegraph to every nation that has a government. It is published wherever there is a newspaper. Your institutions, yourselves, your city, and your Government are on trial in the eyes of the people of foreign lands. But still you have nothing to do with that. You have to take the testimony that was given here, and that alone. You have to act as men should act who are placed in a high position, with the eyes of the people whom you represent centered upon you.

Stand up like men, fearlessly and faithfully, and assist the Government in the effort it is now making to bring these guilty men to punishment. There never has been a case in which the prosecuting officers have had so many difficulties to encounter. There never has been a case in which honest jurors, desirous of doing their duty, have had so many difficulties to encounter, to keep their minds from being impregnated with that which should not be there. But I ask you now, on behalf of the Government and the people that I have the honor to represent, to stand manfully and be with us in this fight, for we are engaged against one of the wealthiest, one of the most powerful and defiant rings that has ever engaged in so successfully robbing the public Treasury; and, gentlemen, when your verdict comes to be given, I know that hereafter, when you look upon it, you can say in your own minds, in your own consciences, I did my duty faithfully and as a man.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Merrick, shall I now bring up that matter about the route from Baker City to Bridge Creek?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, although I wanted to put it off until Mr. Bliss should be present. I do not suppose it makes any material odds. Mr. Wilson has called my attention to the route from Baker City to Bridge Creek, as to the route being cut off at Mitchell. It looks to me, from the map I have examined, as if Mitchell was on both routes, and that the line running between Bridge Creek and Mitchell, according to the original arrangement for the routes, ran over both by the Bridge Creek route and by The Dalles and Baker City. I am willing to make any correction or let it stand for the present. Mr. Bliss will be here on Monday, and he knows more about the details than I do. That fact appears from an order that is not in evidence at all, but which Mr. Wilson has got from the department and which seems to show it:

Embrace Mitchell on this route next after Bridge Creek from May 10, 1879, without increase in pay or distance.

That is the route from The Dalles to Baker City; it is on that route. This, although not in evidence, seems to show the fact, and I am perfectly willing that that fact should be admitted to the jury. That is the only error committed by Mr. Ker in his whole argument, which has been one of the ablest I have ever listened to in my life in the opening of a case, and that error has been shown by proof not in the case.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; it was in the case before. I had a letter from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no point in it; let it go.

The COURT. I have seen that order, and I have seen the post-office map which shows the same thing. I am satisfied that the remarks of Mr. Ker in regard to cutting off that part of the route—fourteen miles I think——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Fourteen miles.

The COURT. [Continuing.]—were based upon a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. MERRICK. It was not upon a misapprehension of the facts as then in evidence. However, I think the fact is as Mr. Wilson states it, and therefore I admit it gladly, cheerfully.

The COURT. There was no evidence that I remember——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] He said he did not see where it had gone.

The COURT. There was no evidence to show that when that fourteen miles was cut off between Mitchell and Bridge Creek it was put on another route.

Mr. MERRICK. None at all.

The COURT. And in his remarks to the jury upon that point Mr. Ker assumed that it was left out in the air, and there was no reason for it, except a conjecture on his part. But it is all right; the misapprehension should be corrected now.

Mr. WILSON. I want to make one further correction. Your honor is not exactly right in saying that there is no evidence on that subject, because the Government did put in the statement here which did show that Mitchell was on The Dalles and Baker City route.

Mr. MERRICK. What statement was that?

Mr. WILSON. I will give you the page.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no statement.

Mr. WILSON. But it is not necessary to take up time, because it is all conceded now.

Mr. MERRICK. It is conceded now.

The COURT. It was a natural misapprehension on the part of Mr. Ker, under the circumstances, because there was no distinct proof in regard to it.

Mr. MERRICK. None at all.

The COURT. The map might have been given in evidence, and it would have shown it upon the face of the map; but there was no evidence distinctly upon that point.

Mr. WILSON. It grew out of the error in the map that the Government brought here and submitted. It made a map that was not correct.

The COURT. They showed a map showing this route.

Mr. WILSON. Exactly, but—

The COURT. [Interposing.] But they did not show the large map.

Mr. MERRICK. Not at all. If Brother Wilson insists upon it, here is the advertisement which puts Mitchell upon the route which Mr. Wilson speaks of, and did not put it upon the other at all.

The COURT. It was on this route originally, and it was subsequently put off.

Mr. MERRICK. By this order which ought to have been in and was not in, and was not before Mr. Ker at all.

The COURT. There is no ground, I think, to charge Mr. Ker with any intentional misrepresentation.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; I do not charge that. I only interrupted him at the time in order that it might be corrected.

The COURT. It was a mistake he was likely to fall into in the absence of evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. The only one in seven days.

Mr. WILSON. We will show you about that before we get through.

Mr. HENKLE. We have had six days and a half of a very able presentation of the case on behalf of the Government. I do not exactly agree with my Brother Merrick that it has been in all instances without error, except the one which has just been corrected; and I am not exactly prepared to state, although it has been very ably presented, that it was, in all instances, exactly fair.

The COURT. Your time for showing that will come hereafter.

Mr. HENKLE. But I rise now, by the peremptory direction of my clients, to propose on their behalf—and I do not speak for any of the other counsel or any of the other defendants in the case—to submit the cause to the jury under the instructions of the court. I make this proposition to the counsel for the Government.

The COURT. You represent whom?

Mr. HENKLE. Vaile and Miner.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course the Government has no objection to Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner submitting their case.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to submit mine.

Mr. MERRICK. The Government has no objection to all the defendants submitting their case if they want to.

The COURT. We have Brady and Miner and Vaile now; that is three out of five.

Mr. WILSON. I only say that on condition that there is no further argument for the Government.

Mr. MERRICK. I have nothing to do with the management of their case, your honor.

Mr. HENKLE. Of course, my proposition is subject to the condition that there shall be no further argument on the part of the Government. So far as my clients are concerned I am willing that the case shall go to the jury on this very able argument that has been presented on behalf of the Government.

The COURT. Who speaks for the other defendants?

Mr. HENKLE. I do not undertake to speak for anybody except my clients and myself. Judge Wilson has spoken for his client.

The COURT. Nobody has spoken for either of the Dorseys.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Ingersoll has not been here for several days, your honor, and I have not conferred with him upon the subject. So far as I am personally concerned, my judgment would be in conformity with that of the gentlemen who have made known their views to the court. I will make it my duty to talk with Mr. Ingersoll, if it be worth while; but if the Government will not accept the offer, there is an end of it.

Mr. MERRICK. The Government says nothing until an offer is made. We have nothing to do with the management of their case.

The COURT. I cannot regard the offer as complete until it is made by the counsel for all the defendants.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have only stated the reason why I am unable now to act. But I will confer with Mr. Ingersoll between now and the meeting of the court on Monday morning. I presume nobody will go on to-day.

The COURT. No, I presume not.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Bliss is to follow, I presume, if there is any further argument for the prosecution, but I believe he is not in town. So there will be no further argument to-day.

The COURT. We will hear further in regard to it probably on Monday morning. Adjourn the court until Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until Monday morning, April 30, 1883, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, I would like to have the proceedings suspended until Colonel Ingersoll gets here. I expect him every moment.

Mr. HENKLE. Is it understood that the Government declines our proposition to submit the case?

Mr. MERRICK. I have not had any proposition made to me.

The COURT. Your proposition was not entertained by the court, because it was an incomplete one.

Mr. HENKLE. Then I ask your honor to suspend until Colonel Ingersoll gets in. I understand he is willing to submit the case.

Mr. MERRICK. I take it for granted that the more the case is discussed the more disadvantageous it is to the defendants.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Merrick, that is a flight of the imagination of which the court will not take any notice.

Mr. HENKLE. [To Mr. Merrick.] You have had seven days of discussion on your side already.

The COURT. The court is here to entertain any proposition that counsel may choose to make, of course.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly; any proposition that is a proposition for the decision of the court.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Propositions that are for the decision of counsel are propositions that can be as well made quietly out of court.

The COURT. The court of course is not informed as to what Mr. Ingersoll may be prepared to offer. We will wait three or four minutes.

[Mr. Ingersoll entered.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not know that the court was waiting for me. So far as both the Dorseys are concerned we are willing to submit the case, provided the Government will submit its case.

The COURT. The Government will say whether or not it accepts the proposition.

Mr. MERRICK. The Government has not yet completed its opening, your honor.

The COURT. That is enough on the subject.

Argument of

HON. GEORGE BLISS

to the jury on behalf of the Government.

May it please the court, gentlemen of the jury, the able and extended argument of Mr. Ker has rendered it unnecessary, if not improper, for me to inflict upon you a very lengthy address. At the same time, in the distribution which has been made between counsel of the analysis of the evidence, it was arranged that the laying before you of all the details of the evidence, the gathering together of the evidence as it bore upon each route, preceded by a statement of the evidence in general terms as to the dramatis personæ in this tragedy should be assigned to him, and that he should lay out, so to speak, the strands of the rope which we think this evidence discloses, and that it should be reserved for me in the opening to endeavor to twist those strands up into the rope and to show you the collocation of the evidence and the inferences which must necessarily follow from it. That is the end to which I propose now to address myself.

In the first place, gentlemen, however, I desire to call your attention to the fact that the statements of our witnesses as to the routes, the nature of the country, the number of men and animals actually used at the time expedition was ordered, the number of men and animals that were in fact used after expedition went into effect, the amount of mail matter, and the manner in which the mails were carried, are absolutely uncontradicted. They have not sought by a single witness from any region of the country to contradict in any way the testimony we have placed before you upon any of these subjects. They knew from the former trial precisely what would be the nature of our testimony in this respect. They had here sitting by them during a considerable portion of the trial one or more of the parties whom the evidence has shown to you would be important witnesses on their side if they could contradict the statements of our witnesses. They have had here Mr. Williamson and others, but they have not attempted to place one of them on the stand. They have therefore accepted conclusively and in the strongest manner possible the evidence of our witnesses as to the subjects to which I have referred. I shall therefore assume in what I have to say that their statements must necessarily be accepted by you as absolutely correct. From that preliminary what necessarily follows? It follows in the first place that the affidavits made by these defendants, or some of them, and accepted by Brady as the sole basis upon which he acted in granting expedition and in taking large sums of money from the Treasury, are absolutely and unequivocally false. They are false in the statement of the existing fact as to the number of men and horses necessary to run the several routes on the speed and for the number of trips they were then being run, and they are false in their statement as to the number that would be necessary to run the routes upon the time to which they proposed to have them expedited. That was a natural result, I may say in passing, from the fact that those affidavits were made solely by parties interested, and that they were made by parties who never had been upon the routes, save in a single instance. There is a single affidavit made by one not a defendant here who had been upon the route. The others were made by parties who had not been upon the routes, and with a single exception by parties who, according to the admission of the defendants and to the admission of their counsel in this case, were absolutely ignorant of all matters connected with the mail service. It was natural, therefore, that they should misstate the facts. It was not natural that they should fly directly in the face of facts known to them and misstate those facts to the extent which they did unless they were doing it intentionally. Moreover the statements of the amount of mail matter going over the routes, and which was to be carried in consideration of the payment of these enormous sums, are, as I have said, absolutely uncontradicted. It must be accepted by you that these expeditions were made for the carrying of mails which were absurdly small, so small that on one route in a period of nineteen days out of thirty-five days not a single letter went over the route either way; yet the amount paid for expedition in carrying the mail upon that route was somewhere about $52,000. It must be accepted as conclusively established that expedition was ordered when the mails as expedited made no connection with any place beyond their termini, and when, therefore, nothing was gained except merely as to the local post-offices, there being sometimes only a single intermediate office on the route. Connections were disregarded, and nothing was gained in that respect. It must be accepted also that in every little order that could be made and in every little way in which the Government could be swindled the order was made and the Government was swindled. Animas City, Brighton, and all those places were put upon routes, and an additional sum of money was paid out of the Treasury for so doing, when in fact there was no addition of distance of travel. On the Saguache and Barnum route there was a large sum of money taken from the Treasury by a gross error, blunder, or something, I cannot say what, in the calculation of the amount which the affidavit shows the Government ought to pay. That error never was corrected until these gentlemen went out of their influence in connection with the Post-Office Department and the present régime came into office. It must be accepted also that from the beginning to the end of this case you will find no evidence of any error having been made in favor of the Government. I think you will go through the evidence in vain to find a single case where an error has been made in favor of the Government. It is always against the Government. Moreover, in no single case was the remonstrance of a postmaster or the remonstrance of a citizen along the route regarded in any respect so long and so far as it came in conflict with the interests of these defendants. We were excluded by the ruling of the court from offering to you the remonstrances made after orders had been granted; but there are before you, and I shall call your attention to some of them, numerous remonstrances of postmasters and others, entitled to weight, made before the orders were granted, representing a condition of facts which would render the granting of those orders absolutely improper. To those remonstrances no attention whatever was paid. You will remember that it even went so far that when Postmaster-General James came into office and saw upon the journal an order dated on the 8th of March, 1881, by which there was a very large increase of trips and a very large increased amount of money to go from the Treasury upon the route from Rawlins to White River, that although he signed the journal as he was required fairly and honorably and legally to do, because the journal has to be a correct statement of the operations of that day, yet that he at once directed that the order should be revoked. The order never was revoked by Brady, but remained unrevoked for five or six months' until accidentally it was discovered in connection with the investigation which resulted in this indictment. It was not revoked, although Mr. Brady admittedly had some conversation with Mr. James upon the subject, in which he showed he knew of that order. Mr. Brady undertakes to fix the time when that conversation took place at a different date from that fixed by Mr. James. At any rate it was a conversation as to that order, and it was a conversation as to the policy of economy which that order foreshadowed. The order made by Brady remained unrevoked for five or six months, although the Postmaster-General, his superior officer, had directed it to be revoked. All these things you may call carelessness or something worse, but there is this remarkable fact, that they are all against the Government. The Government was never once considered.

There is another thing, gentlemen, that you ought to remember in this case, and that is the withholding by these defendants of documentary evidence admittedly in their possession. I think the court, when it comes its turn to lay down the law to you, will instruct you that if a defendant withholds evidence admittedly in his possession it is not only your right but your duty in all doubtful cases to draw from that fact of the withholding of the evidence the conclusive inference that the books or documents withheld would show facts unfavorable to the person withholding them. During this trial we have demanded books and papers constantly and repeatedly. We have been told as we went along that we should get enough of them. Mr. Davidge told us we should have enough of the stub-books. Gentlemen, we have not been able to get anything on the subject. We were told that we should have enough of the letter-books. We have not been able to get anything on that subject. I have here a memorandum of things which we have asked for and which we have not got. I ought to say in passing that when I speak of books you will remember I am not now speaking of the books which Rerdell kept, and of which Dorsey says he never heard. I am speaking of the books which they admittedly had in their possession. I am speaking of the books which they have shown by their own witnesses on the stand are in their possession and had been consulted by the witnesses just previously to going on the stand. I am not sure but what one of those books was identified as having been in court during this trial. I am speaking of those books, the letter-books, the stub books, and every thing of that sort. I am not speaking at present of those books which Mr. Rerdell referred to as kept by himself and which Dorsey found it convenient to deny. They told us that their reason for not producing these books was that they did not want us to go rambling all over their books and to examine into private matters which had no relation to this case. Gentlemen, during the progress of this trial the court has said once (upon page 2281, if I mistake not) that we would not have the right, because a book was produced, to go rambling over the whole book. We would only have the right to go to the particular page and the particular point as to which we had asked for the production of the book. There we would be obliged to stop. The excuse therefore that they would not produce these books, because they did not want us to look into matters which did not concern this trial, is simply a sham, and they knew it to be a sham. Gentlemen, one fact shows how conclusively it is a sham. Is it trying to pry into anybody's business; is it trying to examine into anybody's secrets, unless they are writing to people whose names they are ashamed to have known, to ask to be allowed to see an index to a letter-book? We asked to be allowed to see the index to the letter-book in order to find a particular letter. They refused to produce that index and refused to allow us to see it, simply because they knew as a fact, I ask you to infer, that that index, if produced, would show that in a missing page of that letter-book there had been a letter written to a gentleman the substance of which we produced here by the recollection of a party who had read it. If that index had not shown that that letter was there, addressed to Mr. Bosler, would not that index have been produced and made accessible, to say the least? And, gentlemen, it will not do to say, as one of the counsel did, that there was no evidence that the letter-books were indexed, because Mr. Gibbs, the clerk at the Ebbitt House, swore upon the stand that he made indexes for those letter-books. Therefore no excuse of that kind will answer. Gentlemen, where are these papers that we asked them to produce? Where is the letter written on the 8th of February, 1881, to Perkins, at White River, asking him to get up petitions and to see that he got the petitions here before the 4th of March, 1881, before General Garfield's administration came into power, and when General Brady would be in danger of going out of office, if he was not certain to do so. This was to lead to an increase of some twenty or thirty thousand dollars upon that route. Where is the press copy of that letter, proved to have been written and the original proved to have been destroyed? Where is that press copy which they claim to have had here in court at the last trial? Why have they not dared to produce it here now? Where is the letter of Peck to Dorsey at the outset of the mail-contracting business in which Dorsey was asked to bring Boone or some other man into the business? Where is the power of attorney that Miner gave to Moore to go West and put the service on and which Moore says he delivered up to Miner, and which they have not dared to produce? Where are Rerdell's accounts which admittedly came into their possession? Why have they not dared to produce them? Where is the letter from Clendenning, the honest postmaster, whom Mr. Dorsey thought he owned because he put him into office, and whom he thought he could compel or induce to violate the law by certifying to bonds in which the bidder's name had not been inserted? Where are all these papers? There are others that do not occur to me. The papers have been shown to be in their possession, and some of them are admitted by them still to be in their possession, including of course the stubs of the check-books. When upon the stand they did not deny that they still had them in their possession. I think the court will instruct you that it is your duty in all those cases where any of those papers can have any bearing upon the evidence before you, if there is the least doubt in your minds, and if there is anything left to be settled, that you will infer that the evidence which those books and those papers would have furnished must necessarily have been evidence to confirm the position of the prosecution and evidence to upset the position of the defense.

I suppose there is no impropriety in my mentioning in passing that in the exercise of a legal right, a right which the court holds they have, they succeeded in excluding from you documentary evidence which we desired to produce, and which we think would have been valuable here; for instance, the telegrams of Dorsey to Rerdell after the meeting at the Albemarle Hotel in New York, and some other evidence upon that subject. I find no fault with the ruling of the court or with the objection of the defendants, but simply call your attention to the exclusion of the evidence I have referred to, and also of the evidence as to whether Mr. Rerdell was at Mr. Dorsey's office at the time Mr. Torrey says he was not there, and the exclusion of the confirmatory evidence by Mr. Rerdell's brother as to the contents of the letter which Dorsey wrote to Rerdell on the day after the interview at the Albermarle Hotel.

But again, gentlemen, they had it in their power on important disputed points to call witnesses who are in their interest, acting with them, their friends, their associates, and their partners who shared in the plunder that came from the Treasury by virtue of these orders. They did not call them. James W. Bosler sat here in court. We called him to prove the loss of certain papers as necessary before putting in secondary evidence. Bosler sat here in court day after day. He was proved before you to be a man to whom Dorsey says he turned over his whole mail business in the spring of 1880, proved before you beyond all question to have been the party (disinterested if you choose, but certainly not interested in behalf of the Government) who could have told you just what the truth was as to the making not only of the affidavit by Rerdell in June, 1881, but as to the truth of the making of the affidavit in July, 1882. He could have told you whether Mr. Rerdell's statement on that subject was correct, or whether Mr. Dorsey's statement was correct. Mr. Bosler was the friend, the associate, and partner of these parties, and yet they did not dare to put him on the stand. So we ask you, gentlemen, to infer from that fact that they knew if he had been put on the stand they would have been in danger, at least unless he could have fenced with the truth as some of them have done. If he could not have fenced with the truth as they did—and I doubt it—there would have been danger of his showing that their statements under oath on the stand were not correct. They did not choose to put him on the stand. It was not our business to put him there. He was the man who shared in the profits of this business. He was their associate and their friend. It was not in common sense or in common decency our business to put him on the stand. They chose not to put him on the stand. They chose not to subject him to the criticism of our cross-examination. Gentlemen, if they had done that the book which Mr. Dorsey used to settle with Mr. Bosler, as he himself swore, the book which he undertook one day on the stand to say was his book and in his possession, and had been taken to his house at a certain time and remained there, would have come out, and you would have seen the entries there and what there was in that book; who was paid the money; how they were paid, and how consistent the answers were with the story that they told on the stand. But Mr. Dorsey came back the next morning, after having learned or remembered the fact that I had had a glimpse at that book, not in his possession, but in the possession of Mr. Bosler after he said he had got it, and testified that it had gone back to Mr. Bosler and that it was Mr. Bosler's book and not his. We were told as to Mr. Bosler, counsel told us more than once in court here, and told you, that we should have a chance to question Mr. Bosler on the stand, and yet they did not dare to produce him here. [In reply to remarks by counsel for defense in an undertone.] On the Government's attachment, yes; but he is more attached to the defendants than to the Government. We found where he was in hiding and in whose company he was.

The COURT. Gentlemen, do not interrupt.

Mr. BLISS. I think they had better not interrupt, but if they do, I propose to reply to them.

The COURT. I am not finding fault with you for replying. I am finding fault with them for their interruptions.

Mr. BLISS. As to Mr. Bosler, I want to refer you to the passage in which they promised we should have the pleasure of a legal interview with him. If I mistake not it is on page 3947:

Mr. INGERSOLL. You will have a chance to ask Mr. Bosler about it. Perhaps he can give you some of the details.

We had no chance to ask him. They took care that we should not have a chance to ask him about it. It could not have been, gentlemen of the jury, because they were not willing to trust his testimony, because Colonel Ingersoll, in his opening, told you in speaking of Bosler, on page 430:

Just as soon as he could make the arrangement he went to a gentleman living in Pennsylvania by the name of James W. Bosler. Who is Bosler? He is a man well acquainted with the business of contracting with the Government. He has been in that business for years and years. He is a man of ample fortune, excellent reputation, considered by his friends and neighbors to be a gentleman and an honest man.

That is the man described by Colonel Ingersoll, their associate and friend and partner, whom they did not dare to put on the stand.

Then again, gentlemen, when Mr. Moore was on the stand there was a great show of an intention to contradict him. On his cross-examination he was asked: Did you not tell Mr. Pelham so and so? Did you not on the 23d of January say so and so to Mr. Pelham? Did you not on the 24th of January tell Mr. Pelham so and so? And, then, they went on from that to Mr. Betts, and they asked him if he did not tell Mr. Betts so and so. Oh, they were going to contradict him in the most flagrant manner. But Mr. Moore, learning of the fact and being compelled to return to a sick and dying family in Oregon, came into court, waived all the privilege he had for closing Mr. Pelham's mouth on the ground that it was a privileged statement from client to counsel, and gave full permission to tell everything he knew. They finally put Mr. Betts on the stand, and asked Mr. Betts two or three questions which were clearly inadmissible, because they were seeking to contradict Moore upon collateral matters, and there they stopped. They did not call Mr. Pelham and seek to contradict Moore, as they claimed they would, upon matters which would have been admissible if Pelham could have so testified. I will not stop to go over those questions—I have a reference to them—but they were forced to take Betts. As if you would believe Betts as against Moore! They were forced to ask Betts inadmissible questions, and then he disappeared. Pelham never appeared.

And Moore stands before you, therefore, so far as all this testimony is concerned, wholly and absolutely uncontradicted.

Gentlemen, there is another thing I wish preliminarily to call your attention to, and that is this: the letter, on page 4150, which Mr. John W. Dorsey wrote on the 9th day of December, four days after this trial began, in which he threatened Mr. Rerdell that if he testified upon this trial or aided the Government he would have him indicted for forgery. Rerdell had told him that he wanted an immediate trial. Dorsey said that he did not believe it.

What I have to say to you I will say frankly and with the kindest feelings, and, as I believe, for your good as well as that of others—

The Christian gentleman who could make two contradictory affidavits on the same day is interesting himself in the good of Mr. Rerdell as well as that of others.—

And that is: If I know of your doing anything which I may have reason to think is intentional to injure the defendants in the coming star-route trial, I will prosecute you for forgery and another crime which I will not mention now.

It will remain with you whether any one but you and I ever know of this, and I hope you will not make the occasion for it to go any further, but if you do you may be sure I will do as I say, if possible, and I can put my hand right on the acts, day and date.

Yours truly,

J. W. DORSEY.

That is a letter written by him after this trial commenced, in the endeavor to prevent Rerdell from aiding the Government. He knew that Rerdell possessed important evidence, and for the purpose of preventing him from giving that testimony to the Government from being made available Mr. John Dorsey deliberately states that he knows of a crime which has been committed (forgery); and he will make the bargain with Mr. Rerdell that by his silence he, John W. Dorsey, will compound a felony. There is the proposition John W. Dorsey makes here in the endeavor to prevent your getting the knowledge of this evidence. And Mr. Rerdell is so badly frightened by this statement of Mr. Dorsey's that he quietly hands the letter over to the Government, when the Government signifies its willingness to accept him as a witness, and he goes upon the stand and gives his testimony. We claim, gentlemen, from that transaction—and we think the court will direct you that it is the law—that when a defendant on trial seeks to suppress or prevent the obtaining of evidence there is to be derived from that a very strong inference against his innocence and in favor of his guilt, and a very strong inference that the testimony which he is trying to keep away he knows will be damning to him.

Another preliminary fact that I ask you to bear in mind is this: The burden which the defendants are under in urging, necessarily if their position is to be maintained, that a long series of witnesses in behalf of the Government have come upon the stand here and committed perjury deliberately, openly, and willfully, and have done it without any inducement, without any reason in the world apparently, except the pleasure of committing perjury. They want you to believe that Pennell, a contractor from Dakota; that McLellan, Cabell—mule-whackers I think Mr. Dorsey called them—Lambert, Swift, and all those men came here and deliberately lied. Not one of them, but they all came here and deliberately lied.

They want you to believe that Mr. Moore came here and lied. He was brought here under a subpoena from the presence of his sick family; brought here certainly very unwillingly on his part, and they would have you believe that he deliberately lied as to what Miner and Stephen W. Dorsey had told him.

They want you to believe that John A. Walsh, whom they did not cross-examine, and who is not to be put out of the case by a sneer from a gentleman who sneers at everything that everybody else respects—they want you to believe that John A. Walsh came here and deliberately committed perjury. And the only evidence they have of that is that he has a suit pending against Brady because, as he alleges, Mr. Brady owes him $20,000 or $30,000 for money borrowed from him under circumstances that almost amounted to compulsion. Because Mr. Walsh has such a suit pending against Brady, therefore they want you to believe that Mr. Walsh committed perjury on that stand—a man whom they did not dare to cross-examine, I was going to say, probably because they had had some experience in that way.

Then there is Boone. They handle him delicately. Boone does not lie. Boone is mistaken. Boone swears to facts diametrically opposite to what they say. Boone swears to the same things that Moore swears to in many instances. Moore is a liar; Boone is mistaken. That is the delicate way in which they treat him. Gentlemen, of course we do not know why they treat Boone so delicately, but it is absolutely consistent, to say the least, that that treatment of Boone should be in consequence of the fact that Boone is the fortunate possessor of information with reference to them, not pertinent here, which it might be uncomfortable to have come before the public.

One other thing preliminarily I desire to state, and that is this: That since Mr. Rerdell went on the stand they have confined themselves almost exclusively to attacking him. They have not put themselves in the position of defending themselves. They have not looked to the testimony we have given in the case; they have left that substantially unimpugned, and they have gone to work to attack him. Everything has turned upon the attacks upon Rerdell. And yet bear in mind—if I may refer to it—that at the last trial, where the Government certainly had a case that the jury thought was worthy of something else besides a sneer, Mr. Rerdell sat with them and was defended by the same counsel who are now sneering at him. And they are trying to persuade you, apparently, that if in some way they can break down Rerdell, then they have disposed of the Government's case. Before I get through I think I will show you how absurd that idea is.

Bearing all these preliminary things in mind, let us come down to the case. I do not desire to here go over the laws bearing upon the Post Office Department, but I will simply recall to your attention the fact that the laws applying to the Post-office Department require publicity, advertising. The awarding of contracts to the lowest bidder and all the different contingencies are subject to the law requiring publicity. That is the system of law provided for in all details. The failure of a bidder who has been accepted to take a contract is provided for by an arrangement for temporary service and new advertising. The failure of a man who has entered into a contract to enter upon the service is provided for in the same way. All those things are carefully guarded by the statutes in reference to the Post-Office Department which require publicity. This gives every man an opportunity to compete, and the award must be given to the lowest bidder. That is the theory of the law. The Supreme Court of the United States, in 3 Otto, says (see page 228 of the record), in a case with the significant title of Garfield vs. The United States:

The object of the statute was to secure notice of the intended post routes, of the service required, and the manner of its performance, that bidders might compete, that favoritism should be prevented, and that efficiency and economy in the service should be obtained.

Now, gentlemen, if those laws had been followed, instead of this secret resort to this by-play, if it can be called a play, under which these contractors were awarded privately large sums for increase of service and expedition, can there be any question that the result would have been exactly in accordance with that decision of the Supreme Court; that is, that the bidders could have competed, that favoritism would have been prevented, and that efficiency and economy in the service would have been obtained? And was not the result obtained in these cases precisely the opposite of that in all respects?

I have upon my memorandum various references to the laws, but I will not go over them. They all look to advertising, publicity, competition, and award to the lowest bidder.

For the purpose of providing for any possible injury to the service that may occur from any unforeseen contingency there is a statutory provision about which you have all heard so much, and which I will not read again. It has reference to increase of trips and speed. As to this, Mr. Chandler in his opening address said that Mr. Brady followed the practice and the precedents of the department. Brady says he did not. Brady says that he despised the Jewellian policy and the practice and precedents of the department, and that he went on upon a scheme of his own. I leave that difference to be settled between Brady and his counsel, but I think, in view of the evidence in this case, that the client was in the right.

The regulation provides, as you will remember, that there must be an affidavit. I think I had better refer to the regulation for a moment, because it will be necessary to call your attention to some details connected with it. Section 620 of the Postal Laws and Regulations is as follows:

When it becomes necessary to increase the speed on any route, the contractor will be required to state, under oath, the number of horses and men required to perform the service according to the contract schedule and the number required to perform it with the proposed increase of speed.

It says "according to the contract schedule." The contract schedule, is, of course, the rate of speed, and the time is also substantially involved. They are required to state the number of men and horses required to perform the service according to the contract schedule. If it is one trip, the requirement is a statement of the number of men and horses required to perform the service according to the contract schedule for one trip and in the time specified in the contract. And they are required to state the number of men and horses it will take with the proposed increase of speed. Does that mean that the contractor's statement is to be accepted as absolutely correct; that it is to be taken without any inquiry; that the party interested is practically to say how much money shall come out of the Treasury? I think hardly anybody will accept that view. And yet, if I can correctly understand the proposition announced in Mr. Chandler's opening, he seems to have adopted somewhat that view and to wish you somewhat to adopt it. It is sufficient for me to say that I do not care to spend a moment upon that view. I think the court will instruct you that that would be an utterly illegal regulation. It means, gentlemen, simply this: that the contractor is to swear, first, to one fact, how many men and horses are necessary on the present schedule; and, secondly, to his opinion of what will be necessary upon the proposed schedule. One is a fact; the other is simply an opinion. But he must do both of those carefully and conscientiously, and when he has done them the affidavit is to be accepted by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as a piece of evidence in the case upon which he is to make up his own mind as to the amount which will be allowed in case he orders expedition and increase, being governed by the proportion between the number of men and horses actually used and the number of men and horses that are thought to be needed on the proposed schedule.

I have used the terms "men and horses," because the regulation says "men and horses." But the statute under which the regulation is framed uses the words "stock and carriers," limiting the men apparently to carriers. Upon that I shall have something to say hereafter.

But, at any rate, gentlemen, you will see that the statute simply provides a limit; that it does not say that the amount allowed shall be governed by any affidavit. The idea of an affidavit does not enter into the question. It is the fact. Section 619 of the Postal Laws and Regulations is:

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail, unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary. (R. S., Sec. 3961.)

Now I shall show you cases here where the affidavits alleged that additional men and carriers would be necessary, but where, in fact, they were not at all. Will anybody claim that because a contractor can swear that additional men and carriers will be necessary when they are not, therefore the statute allows payment to him? The statute says:

And in such case—

Where additional stock and carriers are necessary—

the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.—Ib.

"Shall bear no greater proportion." That is the limit beyond which no Second Assistant Postmaster-General can legally go—not the one which he must adopt and follow up. That is not the question whether the contractor says more men and carriers are needed, but it is a question of fact whether more men and carriers were needed. That is the question which is to govern. Of course the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is liable to mistake, but if he makes up his mind honestly upon that basis he will not be held responsible for any mistake. But as to that, if any Second Assistant Postmaster-General will simply exercise the precaution that a prudent man uses in his own business there cannot be any room for trouble.

This statute I said it was claimed covered not only carriers but that it embraced also everybody apparently who ever had anything to do with carrying the mail. The stock-tenders, the people who hauled in the grain, and everything of that sort have been at one time and another brought into this case by the counsel on the other side, under a claim that they were to be considered in this question. That is a question for the court, and the court will undoubtedly instruct you, as it has twice at least during the pendency of the trial expressed off-hand its views upon that subject. I do not now want to stop to refer to it, but simply call your attention to it. Can "stock and carriers" include stock-tenders and hostlers? Are stock-tenders stock? It seems to me absurd that there can be any question as to what that statute means.

The application, under this statute, of the old "rule of three" carries us back to our school days, when we labored and perspired over the arithmetic. I want to call your attention to one or two results which will come from a very slight deviation in amounts. Take, for instance, a case where the amount allowed is $2,000 a year, and where they are actually using five men and ten horses. Suppose that upon an increase they used fifteen men and thirty horses. That would carry the allowance from about $2,000 up to about $4,000, legally. But suppose they cheat on one branch of the equation, and instead of what they are really using, five men and ten horses, they put it down only four men and eight horses, understating the amount actually in use. If I mistake not a mere understatement of two men and two horses in the affidavit, if the order is made upon the affidavit, would carry the allowance from about $4,000 up to about $7,500 a year. Suppose they overstate the other branch of the equation, and instead of making it fifteen men and thirty horses they carry it up to twenty-five men and fifty horses. If I mistake not, in that case the result would be that there would be taken from the Treasury, instead of $4,000, somewhere about $10,000. I cannot be very much in error in that respect. Therefore, gentlemen, you see what results follow under this rule of three from a little understatement of the number of men and horses actually in use, or a little overstatement of the men and horses that will be needed. And when you combine the two, making an understatement of one and an overstatement of the other, though both changes may be very small, the results to the Government become very large. Then if, as I shall show you in some of these cases I think, the change is large, not only from the number actually being used, but from the number which it turned out would be used, the result is to take from the Treasury these very large sums with which we have been dealing here.

That was the rule as to expedition which I have referred prior to the statute of April 7, 1880, the time when Mr. Brady was whitewashed by Congress, as has been said. But from that time on there was superimposed upon this rule another one, which forbade the granting of expedition in excess of 50 per cent. of the original contract price. As to that there has been some discussion before you in the course of Mr. Ker's remarks, and I do not now propose to refer to it further than simply to suggest to you that if the construction which the other side contend for is applicable to that law as to the orders which Mr. Brady made after the law went into effect, then Mr. Brady's orders, if not an utter violation of law, were a bald evasion of it.

Now, gentlemen, having this system in mind, how did Mr. Brady go to work to apply the law, or what he called the law, when he undertook to grant expedition to these favorite contractors? By his own admissions upon the stand—and I call your attention to those admissions as significant; significant because they were the admissions to which he was compelled by the facts to resort in order to protect himself, as he seems to think, from the inference which any other view of the facts would necessarily carry with them (that of direct and personal corruption)—Mr. Brady was compelled to say on the stand that he made no inquiry whatever as to the truth of any of the statements in the affidavits; that he accepted them as absolutely conclusive; that he assumed that these contractors were honest men; not seeming to consider the fact that an honest man, even if he could not be mistaken as to the number of men or carriers then being used, might be biased by his interest, would almost inevitably be biased by his interest, in his statement of the number that were likely to be used on the proposed schedule. He said he accepted them as conclusive, because he believed the contractors were honest men; that he did not inquire whether any of the men who made the affidavits knew anything on the subject or not; that he did not care whether they did; that he did not know whether any of them had ever been on the routes as to which they were swearing; that he did not test any of their affidavits to see whether they were true or not, either by inquiries outside or by taking and applying a few figures to the affidavits themselves; that he did not undertake to see to what results the affidavits led; and that the only information he got came from the parties interested. That is Mr. Brady's unblushing statement as to the course that he, as a public officer, took in making an order which resulted in taking from the Treasury hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. Could any competent, honest officer pursue such a system? Would any man who had held a position make an admission of that kind upon the stand unless he was forced to do so by the facts that were gathered around him in the case? He said also that he treated them as entitled to the amount which their affidavits called for. He said that they, not he, held the key to the Treasury door; that they were entitled to the amount which they called for. Does any man do business for himself in that way? Do you believe that any public officer ever did his public business in that way, unless he was influenced by some motives other than the public good; unless he was influenced by motives of personal advantage? I do not believe you can for one moment think it possible that any officer could have honestly gone on in that way. And just consider, gentlemen, Mr. Brady says that he did business in that way; that he assumed that the persons who made the affidavits were honest men; that he did not care whether they knew what they were talking about or not. They could go on and make their affidavits, and he was to register their decrees, which would take these sums from the Treasury.

But when we come to the contractors, we find Mr. John W. Dorsey giving his ideas. He is a gentleman who would make two affidavits on the same day with entirely different statements, and then account for them by a bald lie—a lie as bad and as easily detected as the lie in the affidavit itself. He gave you his theory about making the affidavit. He says:

My understanding about it generally was that it was one of the regulations of the department that the contractor should make the affidavit on what he thought was the necessary number of men and animals; that is, when they were to have expedition on the route; but if the department thought the estimate was too high, that they would make their own estimate as a basis for the increase of pay.

I understood it was the regulation of the department that the contractor was to make an affidavit of what he thought was necessary as to the additional number of men and animals on the expedition of a route, and if the department thought his estimate was too high they were entitled to fix the basis upon which to make the increase, and if the contractor was not satisfied with that he could decline to take it, and the contract would go back to the Government and they could relet it; so that I never could see how anybody could do anything to get advantage of the Government in any way.

You may commit perjury, bald perjury, gentlemen, but Mr. Brady was the honest man whose duty it was to prevent that perjury from injuring the Government, and the question whether it was right to commit perjury was to be judged entirely by the fact whether the perjury succeeded!

I supposed they had a rule of their own. That was my idea of it.

The COURT. Your idea then was that it did not make much matter about the affidavit.

The WITNESS. I thought a man must come pretty near to it—whatever he thought was right. That was my idea about it, but at the same time I did not claim to be an expert in the business at all.

No, you remember he did not claim to be an expert. He told either Boone or Moore, I forget which, that his brother brought him down here on business which he did not understand. So there is Mr. John W. Dorsey's idea of an affidavit. An affidavit was a thing that he was to make and "come pretty near to it." It is coming pretty near to the truth. But he was going to be prevented from inflicting any injury upon the Government—his own wishes and the law were entirely out of the question—because there was an honest Second Assistant Postmaster-General who was to judge whether the affidavits were true, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General assumed that they were honest men who made the affidavits, and he would not go to work to find out whether they were or not. Was there ever a worse confidence game in the world than this? I think before I get through I shall make considerable progress towards satisfying you that this story is not and cannot be true; that Brady and John W. Dorsey, both, one and all, understood what all this affidavit business was, just as Brady said he understood what the business of the petitions was. It was simply a cover, an excuse, something with which to hoodwink the public, if there should ever be an inquiry upon the subject.

Mr. Miner was a witness before the Congressional committee, and he was asked here if he did not swear so and so before the committee, and he stated that he could not exactly tell whether he did, but substantially it came to this: that he swore to an affidavit for one hundred and fifty men—one man to every two miles—upon the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route; that that was a running estimate. But Brady said: "We won't take that; that is going a little too deep; you must come down a little," and he cut him down a little money. But he did not cut him down so low as he would have been cut down by another affidavit which the same Miner had made relating to the same facts, and which other affidavit has disappeared from the files of the department, though the evidence of its existence and what it contained could not be taken away, and we placed it before you.

And, gentlemen, in this connection Mr. Dorsey says that he thought when a contractor had made his estimate, and Mr. Brady should cut him down, if he cut in too deep the contractor could throw up his contract. Have you heard of any of these contractors ever throwing up their contracts? Have you ever heard of Brady cutting too deep, no matter how big a slice he cut into the Treasury cake?

Brady says that he made these increases in this way and upon these principles, if I may call them principles—at any rate, these guides. But, in point of fact, gentlemen, Mr. Brady's theory does not work, because he did not work it out. He did not live up to the theory that he made upon the stand in the vain effort to shield himself. Mr. Chandler told you, in his opening, that the regulations of the department were absolutely binding upon Mr. Brady; that they were the law; that he could not violate those regulations without subjecting himself to punishment. And yet that regulation which says in so many words that he shall have the oath of the contractor Mr. Brady did not pay any attention to whatever, and he is compelled on the witness-stand here to admit that he did not. Mr. Chandler would have you believe that Mr. Brady in all that he did was bound with the bonds of the law, and that he could not break the law because he was bound to obey the regulations. And yet that regulation required him to have the oath of the contractor, and there is no pretense that in four or five of the cases here he had the oath of the contractor.

Mr. Brady says, after I had shoved a few of these affidavits in his face where he had taken the oaths of persons not contractors, at page 3431 :

Q. At times did you take the affidavit of the subcontractor?—A. Certainly we did, and I would do it now.

I have no doubt he would if he could get another chance at the Treasury.

If the subcontractor was actually performing a service and was subcontractor at the full amount of pay, why not take his affidavit?

The conclusive answer is this : the regulation says you shall take the contractor. The affidavits he took were not even those of the men who were performing the service ; there is no pretense that they were. They were from men who he admits himself knew nothing whatever about the postal service, and the very men who, on the stand, themselves admit that they knew nothing about it.

And yet, gentlemen, he took the oath of the subcontractor upon the White River route. And there I may as well call your attention, in passing, to an interesting little occurrence, which may not have impressed itself upon your minds in all its force. That is the route where there was sent out to the subcontractor, Perkins, an affidavit to be sworn to in blank, which was duly sworn to in blank and which came back here. It was then filled up and found its way to the department. It is the affidavit referred to upon the jacket in that case as being the affidavit of the subcontractor. The order is recited as being made upon the subcontractor's oath, and that could have been only the affidavit of Mr. Perkins. But the counsel on the other side were very confident that I was wrong, and they were very confident that I was somehow or other withholding papers from them ; and, therefore, Mr. Wilson, I think it was, undertook to say in the course of the case that that affidavit was not used, but another affidavit which found its way into the department, an affidavit made by John W. Dorsey, was in point of fact the affidavit that was used in the case. Incidentally Mr. Brady came to our assistance. I called Mr. Brady's attention to a communication which he had made to Congress on the 19th of March, 1880. Having been called upon by Congress to transmit copies of the affidavits of subcontractors upon which orders were made, he transmitted a copy of this affidavit of Perkins, with his statement that it was the affidavit upon which that increase was made. That is in this record, upon page 3524. From that time out it certainly did not lie in the mouth of Mr. Brady or his counsel to deny that on the White River route he took the oath of the subcontractor, Perkins.

On the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, beyond all question Mr. Brady admittedly took the oath of Mr. Vaile, the subcontractor, though Mr. Brewer, the careful clerk in charge, was so astonished by the fact that he should take a subcontractor's oath in the face of the statute or the regulation (which Mr. Chandler tells you, and I think properly, has the binding effect of a statute) that he should take the contractor's oath, that he not only called Mr. Brady's attention to the fact, but, determined to have his own record right, he put among the papers in the case his own memorandum that he called Mr. Brady's attention to the fact that it was the subcontractor's oath. And that memorandum we found when we came to enter upon the examination of the case.

He took Mr. Vaile's oath as subcontractor. It is true Mr. Vaile was the subcontractor for the whole amount, and yet he told you upon the stand here that he had never been upon the route, and knew nothing about it, except from what information he had derived and the judgment he had formed from his general knowledge as a mail contractor. In that respect he had the advantage over any of the other affiants in this case, because he did know something about the mail business. But unfortunately in this instance Mr. Vaile had had experience sufficient to know something about the business, and therefore the affidavit comes in his way as convicting him of a deliberate misstatement, for the affidavit is so grossly inconsistent with the facts that no man experienced in the mail business could honestly have made any such affidavit. But for present purposes it is sufficient for me to call your attention to the fact that on that route Mr. Vaile's oath was taken.

On the route from Saguache to Barnum the oath of somebody described as a carrier was taken.

And, as if that was not enough, on the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn John W. Dorsey's oath was taken. John W. Dorsey not only was not contractor, he was not subcontractor. He had no earthly relation to that route, And yet Brady took two affidavits on that route from him on the same day. I suppose he had a sort of idea that to take two affidavits from somebody who had nothing to do with the route would be almost as good as one affidavit from the contractor. At any rate, he took those affidavits from a man who he knew was not either contractor or subcontractor. The very jacket upon which he made the order for expedition based upon that affidavit showed that he was not subcontractor. He put his own signature directly upon that paper which showed, a few lines above, that the man whose affidavit he accepted as subcontractor was neither contractor nor subcontractor, nor had anything whatever to do with the route. I shall have occasion to call your attention later on to those affidavits and some singular facts which they disclose. But it is sufficient to say now that there are two affidavits upon the subject, both sworn to by John W. Dorsey upon the same day, up in Vermont, and both false, and both the affidavits of a man who was neither subcontractor nor contractor.

It is perhaps just as well to call your attention here—so that I may not have occasion to refer to it again—to Mr. John W. Dorsey's statement as to how he came to make two inconsistent affidavits. We may as well know as we go along a little of the character of this man. These two affidavits were dated, I believe, on the 21st of April, 1879, and both sworn to before the same clerk of the court in Vermont. They were filed here, I think, respectively, on the 6th and 8th of May, 1879. The latter one, filed on the 8th of May, was accompanied by a request to withdraw the first, in consequence of a clerical error that it contained, and yet there are not two figures in the two affidavits alike. John W. Dorsey says that the way he came to make those two affidavits on the same day was this: that Rerdell sent him from Washington those two affidavits; that he got one by the morning mail; that he filled that up and swore to it, using all the expedition possible, and got it off by the 11 o'clock mail that forenoon; that in the noon mail he got another letter from Rerdell telling him that the first affidavit was all wrong; that he must swear to another affidavit, and inclosing the affidavit; that he went down to the clerk of the court and swore to it again, and he sent that affidavit off by the night mail. And yet we proved to you beyond all question that Rerdell was not in Washington at that time; that he had not been in Washington for days before, and was not in Washington for days afterwards; that he was in Nebraska and Colorado; we proved him to have been there by the hotel-keepers on the stand, by his signature on the hotel registers, and by his own testimony. There was no escape whatever from it, and Mr. John W. Dorsey's theory as to why he signed those two affidavits on the same day disappeared before the plain truth of these three hotel-keepers from the Western country that these gentlemen are so anxious to develop, and John W. Dorsey stood before you as a liar upon the stand.

Not only that, but John W. Dorsey undertook to say that he relied upon Mr. Rerdell for information as to whether he was subcontractor upon that route. Whether that information was conveyed through Dorsey to Brady in that way I cannot say. But the story was from beginning to end a lie. John W. Dorsey was not subcontractor. Brady knew he was not subcontractor. The paper upon which Brady made the order showed that he was not subcontractor, because when there is a subcontractor his name appears upon the jacket.

And yet, those two inconsistent affidavits being before Brady, he chose to accept one of them. When there was in his possession the evidence that this man, John W. Dorsey, had sworn to two contradictory affidavits on the same day—two affidavits which stated very different numbers of men and horses then actually being used and the number required under the proposed schedule—he still chose to believe that the contractor was an honest man, and he accepted the one or the other of the affidavits of John W. Dorsey as the basis upon which he ordered expedition.

Somebody said while the case was going on, in the course of some of the by-play, of which we have had so much, "Why, the proportion is the same." Gentlemen, the proportion was not the same in any sense in which Brady was then treating the question. The question was how much truth was there in the affidavit. The truth was an absolute fact, as to how many men and horses were necessary. Both affidavits could not be true; both of them could be false. And yet one or the other of those affidavits was accepted by Brady as true, and upon that he made an order for expedition.

Now, upon route 38140, Trinidad to Madison, Mr. John W. Dorsey, although he was not subcontractor, in like manner made an affidavit which was accepted by Brady. I think I am not wrong in that.

Mr. KER. You are right.

Mr. BLISS. And not only that, gentlemen, of these affidavits, besides the two contradictory affidavits upon the Greenhorn route, we find that upon the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City Mr. John W. Dorsey in like manner made two contradictory affidavits. They were not made on the same day. One affidavit was made with the idea of a reduction to eighty hours, the other upon the idea of a reduction of fifty hours. The greed of the contractors had increased between the time that the first affidavit was made and the time the second affidavit was made, and they were going for a reduction of fifty hours. In one branch of the affidavit it states the fact that the number then being used was not necessarily the same. It was the number, as the regulation says, necessary upon the contract schedule. That did not vary, whether the affidavit was made the 1st of January or the 1st of February. And yet Mr. John W. Dorsey swore to two affidavits containing two entirely different statements as to facts, and Mr. Brady still accepted the affidavits of John W. Dorsey. On the principle that the contractor was always honest he accepted his affidavit, and upon that ordered large amounts taken from the Treasury.

You will bear in mind as to these double affidavits that, as I said, the question is not the proportion. The question is whether the mere existence of those double affidavits did not give to Brady conclusive notice that the man who could make those contradictory affidavits was not a reliable witness, and that his affidavit could not be relied upon as the sole basis which he was to accept in deciding how much money should be taken from the Treasury.

On the Tongue River route we find the same condition of things, only we find some variations. It is always pleasant, as we go along, to see the monotony a little varied. On the Tongue River route Mr. Miner, on the 30th of September, 1878, swore to an affidavit which was made the basis of taking over $30,000 a year out of the Treasury, in which he stated the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail three times a week as twelve men and thirteen animals, and the number necessary to carry the mail on a reduced schedule of sixty-five hours as one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. Now, incidentally in passing, it may be just as well for me to call your attention to a fact which is not of very great importance, but which I will mention. The regulations say :

The oath shall state the number of horses and men required to perform the service according to the contract schedule.

The contract schedule on that route was one trip a week in eighty-four hours. This oath on its face relates to three trips a week, and as it is claimed by the other side it relates to one hundred and eight hours, that being the time they allege which had been fixed. If that is so, the affidavit does not correspond to the regulations, and it is not the only one that does not. But I say this merely in passing. The affidavit stated the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on a reduced schedule of sixty-five hours as one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. The route was three hundred and three miles long. It took a man and an animal for every mile of that route to carry it in sixty-five hours, but twelve men and thirteen animals to carry it the same number of trips in one hundred and eight hours, or in eighty-four hours, taking the schedule time. Upon that affidavit Mr. Brady made an order, which by the jacket is dated the 4th of October, 1878, but the order did not go into effect until the end of December. That is on page 2139. First comes the ordinary heading that you have so often heard read, and then it recites :

Hon. J. P. Kidder, ex-Mayor Charles of Sioux City, postmaster Bismarck, president Northern Pacific Railroad, clerk district court, attorneys, Hon. M. Maginnis, citizens of Bismarck and Miles City, Gen. N. A. Miles, ask for three-times-a-week service and expedited schedule. Present schedule, three and a half days—

Which does not look much like one hundred and eight hours, by the way—proposed, sixty-five hours. Contractor furnished sworn statement that twelve men and thirteen animals are required for tri-weekly on present schedule.

That is the indorsement upon the jacket. But Mr. Miner had, it seems, made another affidavit which, as I have told you, has disappeared. It is referred to upon another jacket which was made up for Mr. Brady, but which Mr. Brady did not sign. It is inclosed in the same jacket which he did sign. That jacket refers to another oath of Mr. Miner's, and states :

The contractor furnishes sworn statement that for service three times a week on present schedule 11 men and 12 animals are required—

The first affidavit stated that twelve men and thirteen animals were required. There was a little cheat there, but only a little—but 37 men and 73 animals will be required on the 65-hour schedule.

The first affidavit called for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals on a sixty-five-hour schedule. The jacket was made up by Brewer, and Brewer swore on the stand that when he made it up this affidavit of Miner was there giving the reduced number. If he had made the allowance on that affidavit he could, at the outside, have given for expedition $26,884. But Brady did not choose to take that affidavit. He apparently made way with the original affidavit, but apparently did not notice the record that was left behind it. He took the second affidavit of John R. Miner for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals, and upon that he allowed $28,000, something over a thousand dollars in excess of the outside amount he could have allowed on the other affidavit of Miner, and then he plumed himself in his order and plumed himself on the stand here upon the fact that he allowed less than pro rata. Miner told you on the stand that that affidavit had not anything to do with the matter, because the department allowed less than that, and that the affidavit did not fix the amount in any manner. Yet all this time in the very jacket which Brady increased making this excessive allowance, which he wants you to believe was a small allowance, there was contained the evidence that Miner had filed another affidavit which was utterly inconsistent with it, and would have taken from the Treasury very much less money. This jacket is worth noticing in another respect. I read the jacket to you as it began simply to show you that at the time this missing affidavit was made the same papers were in the department on which Brady finally operated. The jacket referring to the missing affidavit says:

Hon. J. P. Kidder, ex-Mayor Charles of Sioux City, postmaster Bismarck, president Northern Pacific Railroad, clerk district court, attorneys, Hon. M. Maginnis, referring to personal interview of himself and General Miles last winter, citizens of Miles City, Gen. N. A. Miles, citizens of Bismarck, ask for tri-weekly service.

The first jacket I read did not say anything about citizens of Bismarck, but all the rest will be found in it. Brady chose to take the affidavit which gave the excessive amount. He chose to believe, with the evidence before him, that, although Miner had made those two inconsistent affidavits, Miner was an honest man, and that his affidavit was an affidavit that was to be taken and accepted as true, although in this case the evidence was before him that the affidavit which is now missing and which was apparently the one first made out would have taken less money from the Treasury than did the one upon which he acted. And then, too, he thought the affidavit of a contractor was to be accepted, because the contractor was presumed to be honest.

I called your attention as I went along to the double affidavits on the White River route. The affidavit of Perkins, the subcontractor, states one set of numbers, and the affidavit of Dorsey, the contractor, states another. All I can say about that is that Brady says he took the affidavit of the subcontractor. That I have shown you conclusively. It was the subcontractor who was performing the service. John W. Dorsey made the affidavit, which they claim was taken up in Vermont, as I recollect it. I think it is one of the same lot that was hatched out and put upon Rerdell at the time when Rerdell was not here, but I will not be positive about that. That was a case where, with two contradictory affidavits before him, Brady chose to take one. Brady was asked whether he made any examination or test of these affidavits. He said he did not. I think I can satisfy you in a very few moments that he really did not make any test of them, and that if he was going to propound any such theory as he propounded here, he was a wise man in not making a test. He must have assumed, too, that neither you nor counsel would have the wisdom to make a little examination of these affidavits. I will ask you to bear with me for a few moments while I test some of them.

On the route from Pueblo to Rosita the number of trips was seven, which was not increased. The oath said that on the existing schedule of fifteen hours the number of men and animals was two men and six animals, making a total of eight; and on the schedule of ten hours there would be needed six men and eighteen animals, making a total of twenty-four. The distance over that route was forty-nine miles. Going over it once a day each way made ninety-eight miles of travel that the horses and men had to do on that route. If the forty-nine miles were done in fifteen hours they would be done at the rate of three and twenty-six one-hundredths miles an hour. If done in ten hours they would be done at the rate of four and nine-tenths miles an hour. Testing the affidavit we find that six animals were necessary on the then existing schedule and that those six animals had to travel a total of ninety-six miles in a day. That would give them an average of sixteen and one-third miles each of travel provided they drove single teams. Taking the statement of the oath as to the number of horses then necessary, each horse would then travel in going over the route in fifteen hours sixteen and one-third miles in a day. I do not think you will consider that an excessive distance. But when you take the same oath, which states that to go in ten hours would require eighteen horses, the result is that a horse from that time on would only travel five and four-ninths miles in a day. The horses to go over that route in fifteen hours would travel, on an average, sixteen and one-third miles a day; but if they were to go over it in ten hours they could only travel five and four-ninths miles a day. That is less than Stephen W. Dorsey, in his indignant letter to Joseph, tells him an ordinary horse walks in Colorado, as I recollect it, in an hour. An increase of speed from three and twenty-six one-hundredths miles an hour to four and nine-tenths an hour reduces the capacity of a horse from sixteen and one-third miles to five and four-ninths miles a day. The result is that each horse on a schedule of fifteen hours would travel at the average rate of speed five hours a day, and each horse on the proposed rate of speed would travel one and one-ninth hours a day. In twenty-four hours each horse would be used a little over one hour. That is a route on which Mr. Brady made the order for increase. I shall show you that the order for increase put the principal portion of the money into the pockets of the contractors who were sitting here in Washington, and gave little or none to the men who were actually doing the work on the road.

The route from Pueblo to Greenhorn was advertised as from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, and it was advertised as thirty-five miles. Subsequently the route was extended to Pueblo, and twelve miles were added on paper to the route. The distance was not increased. The distance from Pueblo to Greenhorn, as appears by the papers in the case, is stated as being only thirty-two or thirty-three miles, which is less than the advertised distance from Saint Charles to Greenhorn. However that may be, if you take the advertised distance, when they extended the route from Saint Charles to Pueblo Mr. Brady added four hours to the time for that supposititious extension of distance. The result was that when the oath came to be made it was sworn that for three trips a week in sixteen hours' time there would be required one man and one animal, making a total of two; but for three trips a week on seven hours' time there would be required two men and four animals, making six. In the same way, assuming the distance to be thirty-two miles, as stated, the aggregate amount of travel over that route, three trips a week, going backward and forward, would be one hundred and ninety-two miles, which, on the affidavit specifying one man and one animal, would make the animal travel twenty-seven and forty-three one-hundredths miles a day. I think they did not understate the number of men and animals in that branch of the affidavit. When they came to the other branch of the affidavit their horses would have to travel only six and eighty-five one-hundredths miles a day. The speed before expedition was about two miles an hour. Afterwards it was something over four.

On the route from Toquerville to Adairville the oath says that to make seven trips a week in sixty hours it will require three men and six animals, making a total of nine, and to make seven trips a week in thirty-three hours it will require five men and eighteen animals, making a total of twenty-three. Just see to what results that leads. The route was one hundred and thirty-two miles long and the schedule time sixty hours, which made two and two-tenths miles an hour before expedition. After expedition, reducing the time to thirty-three hours, it became four miles an hour. On seven trips a week there was each day two hundred and sixty-four miles of travel upon that route. The route was one hundred and thirty-two miles long, and there was a round trip made each day. The six horses which they said were all that were necessary on the original schedule would have to travel forty-five miles a day. I am giving you these horses on the basis simply of single teams. When we take the increased number of horses each horse would then have to travel only fourteen and two-thirds miles a day. The oath was made with the idea of extending the trips to seven. The order that Brady made did not give them seven trips. The route was only increased to six. If the oath had been followed out and the order made for seven trips we should have had this absurd result: There must have been by those horses and those men sixty hours of daily travel each way; that is to say there must have been one hundred and twenty hours of daily travel by those five men and eighteen horses, and the result would have been that each man and horse would have had to travel eighty-eight miles in a day and they would have had to travel, at that rate of speed, forty hour in every twenty-four. The affidavit leads to that precise absurdity. There is no escape from it. Mr. Brady accepted these affidavits and did not look into them to see what they provided for on their face, or perhaps I ought to say a little under their face. He should have scratched them skin-deep to see what there was under their face. He did not have them examined or examine them himself, but he accepted them as the work of honest men because the men were contractors. I do not think because a man is a contractor he is necessarily dishonest or necessarily honest. Brady seems to have assumed that because he was a contractor, swearing to a matter which directly concerned his own interest, he was necessarily honest, and therefore his statement was to be accepted as true; and not only that he was necessarily honest, but that his judgment was necessarily good.

There are other routes here which led to very similar results.

Mr. WILSON. Before going into another route, had we not better take our recess?

Mr. BLISS. I am perfectly willing.

The COURT. We will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The COURT. [At 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.] You observe, gentlemen of the jury, that the recesses are a little longer than they have been. I have made them so because counsel who are making an extended argument need more time than during the introduction of the evidence. Probably the jurors need more time, too.

The FOREMAN [Mr. Crane]. You will not censure us, then, if we stay away an hour.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, it occurred to me during the recess that I had omitted to call your attention to a single matter, which I think of sufficient importance to be referred to before I go on. In speaking of the fact of the failure to produce witnesses as a matter which should be taken into consideration by you, I failed to call your attention to one point which I have on my brief, and that is this: You will remember how much time was taken and how much earnestness was exhibited by the gentlemen on the other side in their endeavor to get before you the statement of Mr. Belford on the theory of attempting to account for something that Mr. Rerdell said in his testimony about J. B. B., and for the purpose of showing that his statement was not correct. You will remember, too, how completely in the end that statement of Rerdell's was sustained. You may not remember that the gentlemen on the other side were quite earnest at one time to get in some questions about a memorandum that Mr. Rerdell was alleged to have shown to Mr. James and to Mr. MacVeagh in which there was stated to be some allegation in connection with Mr. Tyner, the former First Assistant Postmaster-General and some statement in connection with Mr. Turner. There was great earnestness to put it in at that time, and, properly, it was excluded by the court. But did you notice, gentlemen, any earnestness at all on the part of the gentlemen to produce before you one of the persons named in the pencil memorandum which Rerdell produced and which Rerdell stated that he received from Dorsey, and one portion of which is admittedly in the handwriting of Dorsey? That memorandum contained certain initials and contained certain names. Among others, it contained the name of a gentleman whose name is upon the petitions on an Oregon route, I think the route from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt. You will find his name swarming on the papers as recommending increase. I refer to Mr. J. H. Mitchell, an ex-Senator from Oregon. This memorandum which was produced by Mr. Rerdell contained a statement that certain things were to be charged to certain people. There was an account to be opened with certain people, and among others J. H. Mitchell is named there. Mr. Mitchell was in court here. Did you perceive any earnestness on their part—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing]. Is there any evidence of that?

Mr. BLISS. Of what?

Mr. HENKLE. That Mr. Mitchell was here in court.

Mr. BLISS. The subpoena of this court shows it.

Mr. HENKLE. That he was in court?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. There was no sum to be charged to Mitchell.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. J. H. Mitchell's name appeared upon the memorandum.

Mr. CARPENTER. There was to be no charge.

Mr. BLISS. I do not know what there was to be, but Mr. J. H. Mitchell's name was to be entered upon that book, according to the memorandum which Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey gave to Mr. Rerdell in his own handwriting. The name of J. H. Mitchell was to be put upon the book for something. It was not, I submit, to be put there for ornamental purposes solely. We have had no earnestness on their part to produce Mr. J. H. Mitchell here and to ask him whether that was a false statement as to him. We had them running off with regard to J. B. B. and assuming that that was J. B. Belford, but we had nothing about J. H. Mitchell. Now, gentlemen, do not understand me as saying that I suppose there was any improper payment to Mr. Mitchell. I have no right to assume anything of that kind. The question whether Mr. J. H. Mitchell's name was to be placed upon Mr. Dorsey's book, according to a memorandum which Mr. Dorsey gave Rerdell, was a pertinent question. I say nothing as to whether it was a proper thing or an improper thing. Mr. Mitchell may have been employed, as he had a right to be employed, and that account may have been for that purpose. But if that memorandum was not a correct memorandum given by Stephen W. Dorsey they would have put Mr. J. H. Mitchell on the stand that Mr. Mitchell might have sworn he never received any money from Stephen W. Dorsey; that he never received a cent from him in any way. If that had been done the inference would have been strengthened for you to believe that the memorandum was manufactured for the occasion. So I submit that the failure to call Mr. Mitchell is a matter which you should take into consideration when you retire to deliberate upon this case.

Now to resume the calculations with regard to these affidavits which I was considering just before recess. Let us look to see what results followed the affidavit of Mr. Miner, the affidavit which Mr. Brady acted upon in making his order on the Tongue River route. The affidavit was made for an eighty-four-hour schedule and not for a one-hundred-and-eight-hour schedule, as I noticed when I came to read the jacket. The jacket recites that it is three and a half days. It had escaped my recollection before. The affidavit was made on the basis of eighty-four hours three times a week, and he said it would take twelve men and thirteen animals, making a total of twenty-five; and for three trips a week on a sixty-five-hour schedule one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. The regulation that I read to you said it should be upon the contract schedule. If the contract schedule is followed, then it would be a schedule of eighty-four hours and one trip a week. But the affidavit is apparently based upon three trips a week. These affidavits, I may say in passing, are inconsistent constantly in that respect. Sometimes the affidavit is made where there is only one trip a week, stating the number of men and animals required for one trip a week on the then rate of speed, which I apprehend is the proper way. Sometimes it is made on the then rate of speed, but the number of trips which they propose to have is given. Sometimes it is made upon the then rate of speed but for a greater number of trips than are finally ordered. There are all those discrepancies in the affidavits. It is impossible for me to say what they always ought to be. I can simply say that they are the affidavits that Mr. Brady accepted and that these defendants under a regulation which provided that the affidavit should relate to the contract schedule. The actual length of the route was three hundred and three miles. On an eighty-four-hour schedule the average rate of speed would be about three miles an hour, or a little more than three miles an hour. On the proposed rate of speed they carried it up about a mile an hour, making it a little more than four miles an hour. At three trips there would have been eighteen hundred and eighteen miles of travel over that route every week, which would have given two hundred and sixty miles, in round numbers, of travel every day. That would have involved for their thirteen horses a travel a very little under twenty miles a day each; nineteen and ninety-seven one-hundredths a day if they traveled with a single team. If they traveled with double teams, as the evidence shows they did, a portion of the time certainly, each horse would have had to travel about forty miles a day. On Mr. Miner's affidavit on a schedule of sixty-five hours, each horse would have had to travel only one and seventy-three one-hundredths miles each day. With the number that he stated on the then existing schedule each horse would have had to travel twenty miles a day. With the horses as he stated, upon the schedule proposed, each horse would have had to travel one and seven-tenths miles a day. Does not that consideration alone show you that if Mr. Brady had made any examination of this affidavit he must have seen that it led to an absurdity to say that it was necessary in going over that route to have such a number of horses that each horse would only have to travel one and seven-tenths miles a day? You could not make a horse walk so slow as that by any possibility. On the existing schedule, the number of horses being given, the average rate of speed that the affidavit disclosed would have required each horse to be going five and five-tenths hours in each day. On the schedule that Mr. Miner named each horse would have had to travel twenty-two minutes in a day—only twenty-two minutes in a day! Assuming that they traveled at the rate of speed which the affidavit discloses, and assuming that they had the number of horses that Mr. Miner said were necessary, each one of those horses would have had to travel only twenty-two minutes in a day, assuming that they went in single harness; or in double harness, forty-four minutes a day.

On the route from The Dalles to Baker City the schedule was one hundred and twenty hours. The length of the route was two hundred and seventy-five miles. The oath does not say how many trips a week there were in either branch of it. It says the number necessary is so many on a schedule of so much, and the number necessary is so many on a schedule of so much. The offer accompanying the affidavit, however, is an offer to make three trips a week. The contract schedule and the trips actually being made were two trips a week. If we assume that the affidavit proceeded upon the basis of two trips a week, and it could not have been less than that, because the then number of trips that they were making was two, over a route two hundred and seventy-five miles long, passing back and forth twice in a week, the distance would be eleven hundred miles of travel each week—or one hundred and fifty-seven and fourteen one-hundredths miles in a day. The evidence shows that on that route they always traveled with double teams. Taking the number of animals that they said were necessary on the then existing schedule the result is that each animal would travel thirty-one and four-tenths miles in a day. But if you take the number of animals that the oath says would be needed for the reduced schedule the result would be that each animal would travel only four and seven-tenths miles a day. Each one of these horses going over that route, to carry the mail at the rate of speed called for in that affidavit, would be required to travel in a day only four and seven-tenths miles. There is in that case another thing that should be called to your attention. It is this: It is true upon some of the other routes, but it does not appear with the same prominence as upon this, that before expedition the time was one hundred and twenty hours, and the carriers traveled only in the day-time. They traveled five days of twelve hours each, making an actual travel of sixty hours, and laid over the rest of the time, which consumed the whole of the one hundred and twenty hours on the route. After expedition they ran both day and night. In point of fact, before expedition there was sixty hours of intermittent travel, intermittent in the sense of lying over nights. After expedition there was seventy-two hours of continuous travel, for they traveled day and night. And yet to change from sixty hours of intermittent travel to seventy-two hours of continuous travel reduced the capacity of a horse from thirty-one miles a day to four miles a day. These are figures which are deduced from the affidavits, and which are the subject of mere arithmetical calculation which anybody can make. They are a little difficult of course for anybody to carry in his head, and therefore I cannot expect you to bear the details with you to the jury-room. At the same time I think that they are facts which should to some extent find a lodgment in your mind, as showing you, as they ought to have shown Brady, that his theory of accepting the affidavits of contractors because they were honest men simply, and making no investigation, but simply making the order based upon the affidavits, was a theory not only obviously false and unbusinesslike in its effect, but that he had before him the means of seeing that it led to these absurd results. You will bear in mind that Mr. Brady said that occasionally he took a pencil and did a little figuring. Precisely what the figuring was I do not know. The probability is that he figured Brady's percentage.

On the route from Julian to Colton the distance was one hundred and twenty miles, and the schedule fifty-two hours. According to the oath, to make three trips in fifty-two hours one way and fifty-four hours the other, it took four men and five animals, making nine. But to reduce that fifty-four hours to thirty-six hours it took nine men and eighteen animals, making twenty-seven. Before expedition the speed was two and twenty-two one-hundredths miles an hour. After expedition, the oath being on the basis of thirty-six hours, it was three and twenty-three one-hundredths miles an hour. On that route you will remember Brady made an expedition to twenty-six hours in the face of all the papers, and that made of course an increase of speed to something over four and six-tenths miles an hour. Three trips a week involved seven hundred and twenty miles of weekly travel over the route, and that was equivalent to one hundred and three miles a day. That involved for the horses, before expedition, a travel of twenty and six-tenths miles a day. After expedition the horses only had to travel five and seven-tenths miles a day.

On the route from Redding to Alturas the oath does not state the number of trips. The contract was for two trips. It was increased to three trips before July 1, 1878, which was before the service commenced. I suppose the oath to be intended to relate to the then existing three trips, although it does not state the number of trips. Assuming it to be three trips we get ten hundred and seventy-four miles of weekly travel, or one hundred and fifty-three and one half miles a day, which would give for each horse something less than twenty miles of travel a day. After expedition, according to the oath, each horse would have to travel only eight and a half miles a day.

I have some other memoranda of the same nature upon other routes, but I will not stop to read them now. I have read what I have, gentlemen, as I said, for the purpose of showing you that Mr. Brady had before him the means of ascertaining how absurd the claims of these affiants proved themselves to be. I think what I have shown you will satisfy you that Mr. Miner came very near to the truth when, out in Denver, he told Mr. Moore that the defendants were "all good affidavit makers." They were good affidavit makers, looking out solely to their own interests. They were good affidavit makers to make affidavits thin enough and transparent enough to deceive nobody except those who wanted to be deceived; and yet good enough affidavit makers to make affidavits upon which Mr. Brady promptly made orders which took from the Treasury hundreds of thousands of dollars.

What could have governed Mr. Brady in these acts other than corruption, as we say? Mr. Brady told you incidentally what sometimes governed him. He is entitled to a reference to that statement. On page 3405 the question came up as to Mr. Saunders:

Q. That being so, should a Senator or Representative ask an increase of you, say, upon this route, which you did not grant, what would govern you with reference to it?—A. Possibly he might not have been sufficiently earnest in the matter, or possibly he might have wanted too much done. We might have done some things he wanted done and not others. We could not give every man all he asked.

Nobody except a favored contractor, of course.

We had to distribute these little things.

Q. You had to distribute the plums. Therefore, when Senator Saunders came in and apparently sought an increase to six trips on this route, can you tell us why it was not granted?—A. I cannot. Possibly we were not in an increasing mood that day.

Q. Then you governed your increases by the moods that you were in on given days, did you?—A. Well, I am somewhat given to moods, and some days might be more liberal than other days.

Q. You think that may have been the reason why you did not make that increase?—A. I say it may have been. I do not know anything about it. I do not remember anything about it.

Q. If Senator Saunders made more than one application for that increase and did not get it, do you mean to say that it was because you remained in the same mood all the time?—A. I say I do not remember anything about it.

Q. But you know that at times you were governed by your mood?—A. Sometimes; yes, sir.

Q. It was principally the imperative mood, was it not?—A. Well, I was rather imperative, I confess, in a good many things.

That is the avowal of a public officer on the stand, a man who was charged with high public duties. He states to you that the question whether or not he should grant a request in connection with the mail service was governed by the fact whether he was in an increasing mood that day. He asks you to believe that he, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, was governed in his action by moods. Gentlemen, it seems to me that is asking you to believe more than anybody in his senses would believe, unless he was driven to the wall by the surrounding circumstances. The late Mr. Greeley once said about a gentleman less distinguished than Mr. Brady that nobody ever took A B for a fool whatever they might say of him as a knave. I do not think anybody ever took Thomas J. Brady for a fool.

But Mr. Brady tells us also that he was looking at the matter having the interests of the contractors in view. That probably is a good deal nearer the truth than most of what he has said. He tells you that he was trying to help the contractors. He states on page 3397, referring to the Tongue River route, that when the question came up of making an increase there he did not confine his increase to trips, and he tells why. A good deal of parade was made of the fact that General Miles recommended an increase upon the Tongue River route. You may look in vain, gentlemen, either in the evidence or among the papers on file—and of course the papers on file are the ones by which Mr. Brady was governed—for one word from Nelson A. Miles in favor of expedition on that route. He asked for increase of trips. He did not ask for expedition. General Sherman, in transmitting the petition, did not ask for expedition. He asked solely for an increase of trips. It is not the only route, as I shall have occasion to show you, where papers on file recommending increase of trips have been used as a basis for orders not only increasing the trips, but increasing the speed. With reference to the Tongue River route Mr. Brady said, on page 3397 :

But how to increase it by simply adding trips to it at the ridiculous figure at which it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling-block. No contractor could even do the once-a-week service really across there at that price. They had probably bid upon it blindly, like a good many contractors, lumping the whole service, bidding so many dollars a mile, as is the common practice among contractors.

Then he goes on to say that the contractor, having made his contract and having, as he said, a bad contract, out of consideration for him he did not confine himself simply to increasing the trips, but he also increased the speed. He repeated that, I think, at another stage of the case. I read from page 3452, in connection with the same route :

You stated with reference to the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route :

“But how to increase it by simply adding trips to it at the ridiculous figure at which it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling-block. No contractor could even do the once-a-week service really across there at that price. They had probably bid upon it blindly, like a good many contractors, lumping the whole service, bidding so many dollars a mile, as is the common practice among contractors.

“It was very evident that it could not be increased to three-times-a-week service and make an efficient service simply for three times what they had bid for once a week.”

Then you went on to state that you ordered expedition. Now I ask you in what way that tended to make an efficient service?—A. It tended to make a more efficient service, as a matter of course, to make it three times a week.

If the contractor was losing a thousand dollars on one trip a week he would add two trips so that the contractor would lose $3,000.

It tended as a matter of course to make it a much more efficient service to make it a fast service, and that could not be done with any regard for the rights or safety of the contractor at the price, as I have said before, that they had originally bid for the contract.

Q. Then you considered that you were not to hold the contractors to the original terms of their contracts, but you were to make changes which should benefit them, did you?—A. I answered that before by saying that we would prefer to help the contractors to crushing them.

Mr. BLISS. I will ask for a direct answer to my question.

THE COURT. Is that not a direct answer?

There it stopped. In other words, he was looking not to the interests of the Government, but to the interests of the contractors, to whom he allowed larger sums than the service could readily have been obtained for. He was trying to help them without regard to the question of the lowest rate at which the Government could have obtained the service.

Let me say right here that Mr. Brady, when he was upon the stand, promulgated the idea that he was governed by some theory of his own in these expeditions, and was going to pay about $30 a mile for the service. I shall have occasion to show you that this was a theory which he did not follow out. When I asked Mr. Brady the question whether he was not on the stand before a committee of Congress with reference to the whole business of expedition, he said he was. I asked him if he did not know that during his entire examination, extending over days, in which he was accounting for all his acts in connection with expedition, he never lisped a word of this theory of $30 a mile, and he was compelled to admit that he could not say that he did. Here was a man in 1880, while this thing was going on, before a Congressional committee, and being called upon to account for his acts and the way in which he had ordered expedition upon many of these various routes, he then gave various reasons, but he cannot say that he ever lisped at that time a single word about his theory of $30 a mile. I do not believe that any human being ever heard of it until he stated it on the stand either on his direct examination or his cross-examination. However, that is a system the law does not recognize. The law says the expedition shall not be in excess of a certain amount. Mr. Brady said he thought $30 a mile was a proper rate for service and he would go by that. Yet you have heard, by a letter in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey to Mr. Joseph, that the average rate for mail service on star routes is only $5 a mile. The whole thing about $30 a mile is a sham and a fraud gotten up for the occasion, and should be dismissed like any passing whim of the moment.

Of course it is clear that Mr. Brady when he was making these orders for the benefit of the favored contractors could not make them without some pretense, some excuse, something to cover up the nakedness of his acts. Therefore, of course, there had to be papers. He was obliged to have some regard for appearances. He could not, for instance, order remissions in certain cases. The department never remitted for lost trips. If a contractor failed to make a trip he lost the price of the trip. He could not, under ordinary circumstances, remit for trips lost. The contractor must lose that money. That was an old and well-established rule of the service known to everybody. As is shown by papers put in by the other side, the contractors undertook to get remissions for lost trips, and Mr. Lake, whom Brady eulogized on the stand, put in a memorandum saying that he wanted to call attention to the fact that the contractors had had remissions for everything but lost trips, and were now seeking to get remissions for lost trips. In those cases where his attention was called to it upon the papers in that way Mr. Brady did not, perhaps, save in a single case, make a remission for lost trips. That is a thing he could not afford to do and keep up appearances, it was so clearly against the rules long established in the department. He had to be careful about appearances, particularly after the investigation in the spring of 1880, when public attention had been so fully attracted to the files in the Post-Office Department. He could not grant expedition without at least some kind of a paper giving some tangible evidence of its necessity. But he could give expedition on papers which were practically fraudulent, fraudulent in asking for expedition where there was no need of it; and he could make excessive allowances for expedition where there was an appearance of need. I think I have satisfied you that he did both of these things.

Now, let me call your attention to another one of Mr. Brady's theories, and show you how he was a victim of theories not followed out. He told you that he would have made every star route a daily route. That was his theory which he would have carried out if his career had not been prematurely cut short. He would have gone on and put daily service upon every star route in the country if the Treasury had held out. Yet when the question came before him for practical action, what do we find? We find that he did not make the service daily. He went on taking his basis from these false affidavits which put large profits into the pockets of the contractors, and made orders for expedition and a less number of trips, running up the cost greatly in excess of the price of daily service. He spent money, as you all know, lavishly, so lavishly that, having made an estimate in December of the amount needed for the next fiscal year, before six months of the time had passed, he was obliged to go to Congress and ask an appropriation of a couple of million—a little couple of million—over and above what he had estimated for, the fact being that he had made these orders right and left, and put this money into the pockets of these contractors until the money was all gone. Then he went to Congress, and then he got the $1,100,000 of the $2,000,000 he asked for, and then he got that touching vote of confidence which he appealed to on the stand providing that nothing in the act of Congress should be construed as granting immunity to any officer of the Government for anything he had done, and forbidding him for the balance of the year to make any expedition for more than 50 per cent. of the original contract price. He got all that, as it seems, entirely upon his merits; but somehow or other Mr. Walsh was appealed to to pay money for a little corruption fund to enable that legislation to be gotten through Congress.

What did Brady do towards carrying out his theory of putting daily service upon all the star routes? On the Kearney and Kent route there was one trip at a cost to the Government of $868 by the contract. One trip over seventy-five miles of the route to Loup City would have cost only $561.20. Brady could have had six trips a week on that route for $3,367. Instead of doing that he made it three times a week over seventy-five miles upon an expedited schedule, and the service cost $4,302.65, or $935 more than would have been necessary to have placed daily service upon the route. And yet Mr. Brady's theory was that he intended to put daily service on every star route.

On the route from Rawlins to White River one trip cost $1,700. Six trips would have cost $10,200. He could have put on six trips for that price. Instead of doing so he added two trips and reduced the time, and he spent in so doing $13,606.25. He could have given his favorite daily service upon that route which led to nowhere but to a military post, to which a daily mail was of more importance than mere speed, and have saved $3,406; but he did not do so.

On the route from Saint Charles to Greenhorn two trips cost $548. He could have put on six trips for $1,644. Instead of doing that he added a single trip, making two trips, and reduced the speed, spending $3,945 in so doing, which was $2,301 more than was necessary to have given six trips a week. He did that upon an affidavit which I shall show you directly was so thoroughly false that the number of men and horses required on the increased speed was not changed one particle. Not only the same number of horses, but the same identical animals jogged over that route year in and year out, after as well as before expedition. Mr. Brady not only abandoned his theory of daily service and spent $2,300 more than would be necessary to have given daily service, but in point of fact the question of expedition there was almost entirely this: The route having terminated at Saint Charles, he added a fictitious twelve miles to the distance, and for that fictitious twelve miles added four hours to the time, although the distance after the twelve miles was added was less than the advertised distance. He added four hours to the time, and then it was necessary to get expedition in order to get rid of that four hours, and therefore he went on and paid the sum of $3,945. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that that was an addition of four hours, which was absolutely and entirely fictitious; fictitious by the very report of his special agent of the Post-Office Department, Mr. Adams, which report he had before him; fictitious by the reports of the postmasters; fictitious beyond all dispute. There is no question of papers that he never saw, or anything of that kind. He knew the distance to be fictitious, and yet disregarded that knowledge. Under the terms of the law and the contract, when he extended the route from Saint Charles to Pueblo he was probably compelled to allow for the extended distance, though that was really a fraud upon the Government. But there was plausibility in that. There was no necessity, however, for extending the time, nor was there any necessity when he came to grant expedition to count in that extended time. He says himself that he exercised his discretion on the various routes, when it became necessary so to do, and allowed less than pro rata. When he was called upon to make the order on this Saint Charles and Greenhorn route he should have said, "I will not give you pro rata for the fictitious distance on this route. I will bring you down. I will bring you down to a reasonable amount." He did not do that. He went on and abandoned his theory of daily service and put in the pocket of the contractor for expedition $3,945.60, making a total upon that route of something like fifty-two or fifty-three hundred dollars, although there never was on that route a subcontractor who received over $840. That is the undisputed evidence in this case. This mail was carried during the entire contract term of four years for $840. Mr. Brady made an order for expedition carrying the amount up to some $4,500, and of that amount all but $840 went into the pockets of these gentlemen sitting in Washington, so far as Mr. Brady did not take out his toll as he went along.

On the route from Trinidad to Madison one trip cost $3,286. He could have had six trips for $2,068. Instead of that he spent $4,290 in giving expedition. There, again, there was some fraudulent business in connection with the expedition. He could have saved $2,220 of that amount if he had given daily trips and no expedition. But the necessity of expedition came from this state of affairs: Senator Teller and others having petitioned that Raton be put upon another route, Brady made the order putting Raton on this route and claimed to add in consequence about twenty-eight miles to the distance. In point of fact the schedules in his own office showed that he only added twenty-three miles. There was a cheat of five miles there. Having added the twenty-eight miles he then proceeded to allow six and three-quarters additional hours for performing the service, running the time up to nineteen and three-quarters hours. Having got it up in that way he gave expedition on the theory that they wanted to get over the route in the daytime. He paid $4,290 for putting it back to twelve hours when the original schedule was only thirteen hours. The only excuse and the only necessity was that he chose to put Raton on this route at an alleged increase of twenty-three miles when it was really only fifteen miles, although the petitioners desired that Raton should be put on a route connecting with the railroad in the valley in which it was. The nearest post-office was not more than twelve miles off, and the line of the railroad not more than six.

On the route from Garland to Parrott City, which we have come to speak of as the Ojo Caliente route, one trip cost $1,467.78, and six trips could have been had for $8,800. Instead of giving those six trips Mr. Brady, abandoning again his theory of a daily service, made one trip into three, with an increased rate of speed. As I shall have occasion to call your attention to it a little later on, the postmasters on the route told him that the rate of speed was impracticable, and it was in fact never made. Instead of adding on six trips at a cost of $8,800, he ordered three trips and expedition and paid $13,400. He could have given them six trips and saved $4,626 for some other route. You will bear in mind that he stated on the stand that there was a considerable number of postal routes established by act of Congress upon which he did not put any service because he had not the money. And yet here he was abandoning his theory of a daily service and wasting money in this way for the benefit of these favored contractors.

On the route from Mineral Park to Pioche one trip cost $2,982. He could have got six trips for $17,892. Instead of that he spent $19,300 in adding two trips with expedition. On the route from Julian to Colton one trip cost $1,565. He could have got six trips for $9,400. Instead of doing that he spent $14,000 in giving two trips, which was $4,700 more than what would have been the cost of six trips. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek he could have got six trips for $6,652.89 less than he spent for adding two trips, making three in all. He spent for adding trips and expedition $21,460.89. He could have got six trips for $14,880. On the route from The Dalles to Baker City he could have got six trips for $24,800. He got one trip additional, and paid for the service $31,000. On the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt he could have got six trips for $17,328. He added two trips and paid $18,600 for the service. On the route from Julian to Colton he could have got six trips for $7,128. He added two trips and paid $8,910 for the service. On the route from Redding to Alturas he could have got six trips for $17,964. When I say he could have got it I mean taking his favorite rule of pro rata and multiplying the amount allowed for one trip by the number of trips proposed. Instead of doing that he paid $35,928. On the route from Pueblo to Rosita he could have got six trips without expedition for $2,328. Instead of that he gave them six trips with expedition, and spent in so doing $8,148.

You see, therefore, gentlemen, that he did not follow out his theory about giving daily service to every star route in the country. He was lumping the service up on some favored routes in the hands of some favored contractors, and I shall show you plainly, I think, that he was doing it not even for the benefit of the men who were performing the service, but for the benefit of the men who were sitting here in Washington, and had no direct connection with the performance of the service.

Then, again, Mr. Brady disregarded the law with regard to productiveness. He does not pretend really to have paid much attention to the law which says that service shall be performed with due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, productiveness being the only circumstance specified in the statute. Mr. Brady is compelled to give the testimony which I will read, on page 3392:

Q. In making these orders for increase and expedition referred to in this indictment what regard had you for productiveness in connection with other circumstances; what weight did you give to that matter?—A. The other circumstances always had more influence with us than productiveness.

Then, further along, he says, on page 3402:

Q. Did you consider revenue then?—A. We did to a certain extent in the older States, where things were fixed and towns were built up and fenced in, but not always in the new countries. The other circumstances would operate there much more largely.

Q. Do you mean to say you did not consider the revenue at all?—A. I mean to say just what I have said, that in the older States the question of revenue was something to be considered. In the newer countries and territories, and throughout the South largely, where the service was being built up after the war, the question of revenue figured very lightly.

Q. Did you consider it in every case?—A. I cannot say that we did.

Then he was asked, on page 3420, with reference to the Tres Alamos and Clifton route to which I have just referred, if upon that route he considered the question of productiveness, and he answered, "I presume not." Those are his declarations, and the results would go to show, as it seems to me that he was correct in those statements. For instance, let me call your attention to a few figures. On the route from Bismarck to Tongue River the original contract price was $2,350. Brady ran it up to $70,000, making an increase of $67,650. Bismarck was the chief place, as you all understand, at the end of the railroad, and was the center of a large business derived from other sources. And yet including the entire mails over that route the revenue for the year 1879 was only $3,000, for the year 1880 $5,000, and then in the year 1881, under the fostering influence of expedition it fell off to $3,900. That included Bismarck. The intermediate offices varied from $710 to $1,414 in their contribution to this amount. But however that may be, there was an aggregate of only $3,000. The largest sum during that period was $5,100 for any one year, and yet Mr. Brady added to the original contract price $67,000 for that service.

On the route from Garland to Parrott City Mr. Brady added $28,598 a year. The revenues of all the offices on that route were only $402.26. In the year when the addition was made they ran up to $935, and then increased after the development of Durango to $3,800.

On the route from Mineral Park to Pioche Mr. Brady added some $49,000 to the service. The aggregate of all the offices upon that route was about $761. And the year after he made his increase the receipts fell off some $200.

On the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton Mr. Brady added over $26,000, and yet the aggregate of all the offices was only $403.

On the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt Brady added $47,278, and yet the aggregate income, the highest amount of income from all the offices, was only $681. It ran up the following year to $1,370, and then ran down again to $935. He carried the amount up to something over $50,000 upon that route, and that route, I call your attention to it, is the route upon which Mr. Vaile swore upon the stand that there was a profit of over $20,000 in two months.

From Julian to Colton the highest income of any year was the year before Mr. Brady commenced to operate, $524. Mr. Brady ran up the allowance to the contractor from $1,188 to $7,722.

On the route from Redding to Alturas the receipts of all the offices, including Redding, which was a terminal office and connected with a number of other routes, was only $2,600, and Mr. Brady added to the sum allowed upon that route nearly $36,000.

Now, that was having regard for productiveness with a vengeance. The fact is that upon these routes where the aggregate income was only $41,654.44 for the year ending June 30, 1879, Mr. Brady added $433,287.23 to the contract price. He multiplied that sum by more than ten times. The contract price was $41,135, the productiveness was $41,654. Mr. Brady made the Government pay $433,287.23, and of that $433,287.23, $213,184 25 was for expedition. Just about half of it was for expedition. Take these figures in your minds, if you can, gentlemen. With reference to those figures, gentlemen, I ought to say that it is possible that, from the fact of a route being taken down and put up in price, there may be in one or two cases some error in my calculation. But if there is any such error it can only be a comparatively small portion of the sum. I think I have allowed for all errors. I bore it in mind in making up the calculation, and I think I have allowed for it in the figures I have given you.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, that these revenues were before Mr. Brady or within his control. On many of the routes the very jackets upon which he makes the orders state the amount of productiveness. On others they do not, but it was always a matter within his control and of which he could have had knowledge. But Mr. Brady says himself that he paid very little attention, and in two cases he says he paid no attention, to the matter of productiveness.

But it has been said here in the progress of the case that this matter of productiveness is deceptive. It has been said, and it is true, that the productiveness means the amount of stamps canceled at a given office, and that while taking the country at large the aggregate of stamps canceled will show the amount of productiveness, yet at a given office it may be deceptive. We go further than that, and we say that there may be ordinarily more matter going out from one of these western offices and coming East, so far as it is an office communicating with the East, than there is coming into that office. That has been the claim. If that is true, then the statement of the productiveness shows a larger aggregate than it should, because it is the stamps that are canceled at the office that sends them out.

Let us see what the facts are in some other respects. And you will bear in mind, gentlemen, that so far, in everything I have said, I have confined myself to what appears of record. I have not even gone into what appears contradicted in the testimony anywhere. I have confined myself to what is proved by Mr. Brady's own admissions or to what is proved by the records of the Post-Office Department and of the contract office over which he presided. I am confining myself for the moment to that class of evidence. It is said, as I say, that this matter of productiveness is deceptive. Let us see. Mr. Brady had before him in his office the mail bills. It has been made a claim of virtue on his part that Brady established these mail bills. He had them before him. He was in the habit of examining them more or less, because you will remember that on the route from Mineral Park to Pioche he cut off, on the 22d of January, 1879, I think it was, $49,000 of increase, because he said the mail bills showed that there was very little business. But he promptly put it on again on the 28th of January, on the ground, apparently, that he was doing, as he says, some injustice to the contractors by cutting it off. I shall have occasion to refer to that more particularly hereafter. But that indorsement is now referred to solely as showing that Mr. Brady did consult the mail bills. Now what do we find on that route?

On the Mineral Park to Pioche route we have upon this trial, put in by us and put in by them, a considerable number of mail bills. I have made a little abstract of those we originally put in, and this is what they show: They are for the thirty-nine days from the 16th day of November to the 24th of December, 1879. In nineteen of the thirty-nine days from Mineral Park there started absolutely nothing but the mail bills—no letter, no postal card, nothing. In twelve of the thirty-nine days there started one letter, and that letter is specified as going to an intermediate point. On three days there started two letters; one day three letters; on one day four letters; and on one day the gigantic number of five letters. The following day, for fear of exhausting the mail contractor, there started only one postal card. On another day there started a postal card and letter. And on still another day there started a postal card and a mail register. That was the condition of things leaving Mineral Park.

For the same period, at Pioche, the other end of the route, on seven days nothing arrived, six of them being days when there arrived nothing but mail bills, the days when nothing left Mineral Park. There did something leave Mineral Park, but it got spilled out on the way and did not arrive at Pioche. On one day there arrived at Pioche twelve letters. All of those letters are specified as being from Saint Thomas, a way point. I asked Mr. Brady about these matters when he was on the stand, and his excuse was that he wanted to make this a grand through route, and therefore, after having taken off $49,000, on the 22d of January, he put it up on the 28th because he thought it would be a grand through route and he would help it along. Twelve letters arrived at Pioche, all of them being letters from Saint Thomas. On six days there arrived four letters on each day, all of them from way points. On six days there arrived one letter; on four days there arrived three letters; on two days six letters; on three days two letters; on one day ten letters; on one day nine letters, and on another eight. You will perceive that the mail leaving Mineral Park picked up on the way, as a general thing, before it got to Pioche some additional letters, so that more arrived at Pioche ordinarily than left Mineral Park.

The result of that is, gentlemen, that during the thirty-nine days there left Mineral Park in all twenty-nine letters, three cards one register, and one newspaper—thirty-four pieces in all. And there arrived at Pioche one hundred and twenty-six letters, seven cards, four packages, and seven registers—making a total of one hundred and forty-four pieces, all coming over that route, leaving Mineral Park and arriving at Pioche. And in all, during the whole thirty-nine days there were one hundred and seventy-eight pieces of postal matter of some kind passed over the route both ways.

The other mail bills put in by the defendants I have not analyzed to the same extent, but I find this: That there left Pioche in January, 1880, in five days, sixty letters, and there arrived at Mineral Park during the same five days thirty letters; that there left Mineral Park in three days in January, 1880, three letters and one card. In March, 1880, there left Mineral Park in three days eight letters and a register. In September, 1880, the mail got up, and the result was that in four days there left Mineral Park fifteen letters.

Now, gentlemen, there is the record which was before Mr. Brady of all there was of mail matter upon that route. And yet that route is one which Mr. Brady ran up to over $50,000; and his attention being called to the mail bills he put it down from the increase he had made. The original sum was $1,100, I think; that he could not cut off. And so great was his indignation at what had been perpetrated upon him in causing him to make this increase that, in cutting it down again he actually violated the law and refused to give the contractor one month's extra pay. But on the 29th of January following, only seven days afterwards, his indignation had evaporated, and he put back $22,000 of that $49,000 that had been cut off, on the ground that this was a great through mail. He told you on the stand that he was working to make it a great through mail. It was a great through mail, but it was a mail that was intended to go "through" the Treasury, and that was all the "through" there was about it.

For carrying those letters I have specified to you Mr. Brady paid $14.25 for each letter. From Eugene to Mitchell we have got the mail bills here in evidence for ninety-two days, being from July, 1880, to March 8, 1881—nine months. The mail traveled, I think, twice a week. If we assume that the letters sent from one end of the route and the letters received at the other end were different letters, there were carried over that route during those ninety-two days forty-eight hundred and thirty-six letters, being an average of fifty-two and one-half letters a day. For carrying those letters Mr. Brady ran up the original contract price from $2,468 to $21,460.89 a year. In other words, for carrying an average of fifty-two and a half letters each day he paid $58.79 per day, and paid for each letter $1.13. The total revenues of that route were only $761.39 for the largest year during the term, and they ran down from $761.39 the next year, when there was only $597, under the fostering influence of expedition. The mail bills told Brady all this, and they told him also that this allowance was utterly unjustifiable on this route, and they told him a great deal more than this on other routes.

On Tongue River he ran it up to $50,000 as late as May, 1880, and there went over that route only two way-pouches, as they are described in the mail bills, every day, and he paid for that $70,000, the original sum having been $2,350. That is the route in reference to which he said it would not have been just to the contractor to make him live up to his contract.

On the route from Garland to Parrott City, as it was originally let, though we have come to speak of it as the Ojo Caliente route, the mail bills show that in 1879 there was sent over the route one bag each day. I shall have occasion directly to call your attention to some of these routes, but I am now confining myself to the record evidence which was before Brady, because I want to show to you that Brady made these orders in an unjustifiable manner and under circumstances that can leave in your minds no doubt that he was influenced by motives other than those that ought to influence an honest public officer, and that he made those orders at the instigation and for the benefit of these other defendants, who reaped the profit from them. On that Ojo Caliente route, as I have said, the mail bills show one bag a day each way over the route. But from December, 1880, for two or three months, we find that there was a considerable increase. And if you bear in mind the evidence in the letters of Mr. Joseph and the oral evidence on the stand, you will remember that it was stated that during those months the route from Silverton to Parrott, which was a northern route, communicating with the east, was blocked, and the whole matter from the Silverton route was thrown down into this route, so that for three months the mail bills show an increase. After that it fell off, but the increased mail matter on the Ojo Caliente route was used as an argument for making expedition on that route, and then they turned around and not only counted the increased mail matter which was furnished from that blocked-up route, but they counted the same petitions. The same petitions were in several cases used for the orders for increase and expedition on both routes, the same reasons being given in both cases.

The mail bills on the Silverton route showed that Mr. Brady ran up the service from $745 to $14,900, and yet, as I have said, it was one bag a day passing over that route each day, and the aggregate income of the offices at the time the original order was made was $402.26.

On the Rawlins and White River route (confining myself still to what the mail bills show) in January and February, 1880, the very time when Mr. Brady was running it up to seven-times-a-week service, and after an order in March in which Mr. James told him to countermand it, the mail bills show that there passed over the route a brass-lock pouch and an iron-lock pouch. And yet Mr. Brady ran that service up from $1,700 a year to $13,706.25, and then added a further sum of $18,275, and made, therefore, a total of $31,981.25. And he did that on a route which led nowhere.

There was some attempt made to mislead here by the idea that these orders were made in consequence of the military being in there on account of the Ute outbreak. Why, gentlemen, the first order was made six or eight months before the Ute outbreak was thought of, and the last order was made more than a year after the military had been chiefly withdrawn because the Utes were entirely subdued. Those orders, then, could not have justified Brady's action in any way on account of the military service. They brought General Sherman here to testify, but when you come to test it by dates you find that the first order was six or eight months before the Ute outbreak, and the last was a year after the military had been withdrawn because the Ute outbreak was entirely over.

And I will say here, in passing, that it cropped out that at the last letting, commencing in July last year, the contractor was glad to get this route for $7,000, upon which Brady had paid a total of $31,981.25, and said that it was a very pretty route to run for $7,000.

The total revenue upon the route, including Rawlins, which was on the railroad and had large service from other places, was $1,255, and the revenue from the other offices was $79.89.

These mail bills also show, on the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, the number of letters that were sent each way. The postmasters up there made a mistake in regard to the purpose of these mail bills. The mail bills were in fact gotten up not to show how many papers and how many letters were sent, but to show how many bags were sent, and to identify the fact if a bag started from Rawlins on a given day or hour when that precise bag arrived at the other end, White River. There was no idea of identifying the number of letters in the bags. But it never occurred to the postmasters out on these routes that anybody in Washington could think there was more than one bag. They thought it was the number of letters and papers that was wanted, and so they counted the letters and stated the number in the mail bills. That is the way we found the number on the route from Mineral Park to Pioche. The postmaster at Sioux Falls also fell into that error. But he pretty soon found that it was such fatiguing business to count them all that he abandoned it. But the mail bills gave us one little tell-tale fact, and that is, that the mail starting from Vermillion on a certain day had only ten letters. Remember, Vermillion was the point from which most of the mail started. That is beyond question, because it was on the railroad. The mail leaving Vermillion contained only ten letters on that day. And yet Brady added to that route some $4,000. It was a small route, I think the original amount was something over $3,000, and he carried it to something over $6,000, and he did it in the face of the mail bills.

The mail bills also told him that from Saguache to Barnum, in November and December, 1879, and January, 1880, there went over that route, each way, a bag, and yet the original pay of $3,426, at which the contract was let, was run up by Brady to $23,431.12. Upon that route I ought to say that there was a short time when the number of letters increased, but it very soon fell off again, so far as the mail bills show.

These, gentlemen, are the routes which I have specified, and are the routes upon which, so far as I know, except one, any mail bills are in evidence in this case. There is still one other route upon which there are some mail bills in evidence, I think the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek; but, if so, I have mislaid my reference to it. Some of the mail bills were put in by the other side. But no matter by whom they were put in, they are undoubtedly correct, and some of them are shown to have met Brady's eye. All of them were accessible to him on the question of the authority upon which he could make an increase. Of course it was his duty to inform himself, and he cannot say, as he did say on the stand, that he had no means of finding anything except by sending out to the other offices, because here was a matter right where he could have put his hand upon it, and these mail bills would have told the whole story.

Brady acted also upon certain other papers, and those are the petitions, letters, and applications of Members of Congress and Senators. As to these Mr. Brady has some original views that he stated on the stand, and more truthful, if less original, than those that he propounded to Mr. Walsh. On page 3390 he is asked about some altered petitions, and he says :

Q. What, if anything, do you know as to the manner in which petitions were gotten up and by whom they were gotten up?—A. I know nothing about that whatever. I regarded a petition as of value because of the indorsement given to it, as a rule, by the Member of Congress or Senator. If they indorsed them that was a guarantee to me. If they sent them up, that was a guarantee to me. The recommendation of a member of Congress was of more importance to me than the recommendation or hasty report of a special agent, or anything of that kind. I thought the member of Congress knew the needs of his people better than anybody else. At least, it was his duty to know them.

Now, I think the court will be apt to tell you that the question of expediting or increasing mail service is not constitutionally within the ordinary duties of a member of Congress. But Mr. Brady says that they knew all about it. They represented a great people, and, therefore, he was governed by members of Congress and not by the petitions, apparently.

But Mr. Ingersoll has a little different view. On page 3235, we were informed, with a magnificent outburst :

Now, what I say is that no officer of this Government can afford to disregard the petitions of the people. Whether they are wise or foolish, whether they are extravagant or economical, whether they are honest or dishonest, the people are the masters of this republic.

The COURT. Who are the people?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The people who signed these petitions.

Bear in mind how the signatures to some of these petitions appeared.

The COURT. Ah!

Mr. INGERSOLL. They are among the people, and each name there is entitled to as much respect as though it stood for the President of the United States. That is my idea of a republic.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No man can be raised above me or above my rights in this country by holding any office, and no man can be put below me because I am elevated to office. Officers are only servants of the sovereign people. And when we rise above petition we rise above this Government and above our Constitution.

And yet Mr. Chandler undertook to tell you that because Mr. Brady was an officer he rose above being tried by you. His idea was that he must be tried by impeachment, by the Senate and by members of Congress in whom Mr. Brady placed so much confidence. But he was too lofty to be tried by you as the representatives of the people:

The COURT. I want now to understand whether you say that the petition which you now hold in your hand was before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General before he made the order in question.

And then the matter is gone into further, and the court says:

This thing of calling a town meeting of half a dozen people or a hundred people who sign a petition, and then calling it the voice of the people——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] This is the voice of these people.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And they weigh as much as any other same number of people.

Brady says that the question with him about petitions from the people was the question as to whether they had the indorsement of a Member of Congress or a Senator. It was not the goodness of the maker of the paper that Mr. Brady was relying upon, but Mr. Brady looked to the indorser of the paper. There is a little discrepancy between Mr. Chandler and Mr. Brady here which is not for me, certainly, gentlemen, to reconcile. Either theory, I suggest, is tolerably absurd.

But Mr. Brady could not afford to be consistent even in that respect. He told you that he looked to the member of Congress, and yet when it came to the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, where the member of Congress, Mr. Bennett, wanted an extension, he refused to give it, and when asked to explain why, he said that Bennett had suggested that he cut down this Vermillion and Sioux Falls route and thereby save money enough to give him the extension he wanted, but that he told him that he had put up the route for Mr. Kidder, the former Delegate, and he was not going to put it down for Mr. Bennett, who succeeded Mr. Kidder. Mr. Bennett having been elected by the great people that Colonel Ingersoll talks about subsequent to Mr. Kidder's term, Mr. Bennett's views were not entitled to any consideration from Mr. Brady, because he took his orders from the representative of some time ago, to wit, Mr. Kidder. And yet this same gentleman, Mr. Kidder, is the same Delegate who appears before you, gentlemen, at the end of June, 1878, as certifying that the route from Bismarck to Fort Keogh was an utterly unnecessary route, and practically asking that it be abolished, because he indorses such a petition, brings it to the department, and says he thinks it is so, although he is not entirely well informed, and yet two months afterwards insisting upon it that there must be added $35,000 in the way of expedition. That is the Delegate whose views Mr. Brady preferred to follow rather than those of the subsequent Delegate, who was a later representative of the people, and whose authority was therefore of considerable more weight, according to his theory of what was to be done in such cases.

Mr. Brady's ideas about these members of Congress is followed up in some other statements. He seems to think it is necessary to carry out the proverb of speaking well of the bridge that carried him over. These same members of Congress whom he was gratifying by these increases were in Congress when he got that magnificent vote of approval to which he appealed, and therefore he considered that he must do what they wanted. Now let us see again what he says as to these members of Congress and petitioners, at page 3404:

Q. Did you consider the fact that, excluding the terminal offices, the entire revenues of all the other offices upon that route were, at the time of the increase and expedition, only $227.48?—A. I do not know that I did. The probability is that the principal consideration acting upon my mind in that matter was the fact that it was a new country, and Senator Saunders and Mr. Valentine wanted it done very badly.

Mr. Valentine did not ask anything on that route. There is no evidence anywhere that Mr. Valentine ever requested anything of that kind. Mr. Saunders does nothing, so far as that order is concerned, except to indorse the petition, which was a petition for increase of service, and which contained nothing about expedition except the words "and thirteen hours," interlined, as the evidence before you shows, by Mr. Miner, and I think I shall be able to satisfy you that it was interlined after Mr. Saunders put his name upon that petition. He simply transmitted it without recommendation, and that was all the recommendation there was about it.

But about this business of Members of Congress and Senators, let us see what Mr. Brady did in other respects. On the route from Rawlins to White River, Senator Teller recommended one kind of increase and Mr. Brady made another. When I suggested that he explain that, he said :

It seems, as I see by these papers, that the strict letter of their recommendation was not followed.

He was following Members of Congress and Senators entirely. In the same way, on page 3415, Mr. Teller recommended that Raton be connected with the route leading over to Pulaski, which led to the west. Instead of doing that, and while it could have been put on for an expense not exceeding $150 to $200, as the evidence shows, Mr. Brady wrenched it around to the Trinidad and Madison route, and put Raton on that at an eventual cost to the Government of $2,300 to $2,400.

On the route from Silverton to Parrott City Mr. Brady still did not see how he could oblige the Senators. But you will find, gentlemen, that in every case where he fails to oblige the Senator or Member of Congress it is a case in which, if he had obliged the Senator or Member of Congress, he would have saved money for the Government and have taken money out of the pockets of the contractors. He could not oblige Senators under any such circumstances. For instance, Mr. Brady had run this route from Silverton to Parrott City down from thirty-seven hours to fifteen. He just made a fictitious addition of Animas City to it on the ground that Animas City added twelve miles, when the records of his own office showed him that Animas City had always been on the route, and his distance circulars contained the name of Animas City right along. Having added this fictitious distance of twelve miles, he put an addition to the time for that fictitious distance, and then he proceeded to expedite it from thirty-seven down to fifteen hours. Now, that route is one which you will remember crosses what is known out there as the Continental Divide—the backbone of the continent. It crosses it some ten thousand feet above the level of the sea. He put it out, reduced it to fifteen hours, and paid the contractor therefor $10,549.50.

After struggling through the winter, Mr. Steineger, who was here on the stand, the contractor, says there was sent here a petition from the people out there at Silverton, and which was forwarded by Senator Hill of Colorado. Senator Hill says, at page 1857 :

[United States Senate Chamber.]

DENVER, COLO., November 8, 1880.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

DEAR SIR: I inclose a petition of the citizens of Silverton to the effect that the time from Silverton to Parrott City on route 38156 may be extended from fifteen to twenty-four hours from November 15 till April 15.

This petition is signed by nearly every business man in Silverton, and by many in La Plata County.

There is something from Mr. Brady's people and Colonel Ingersoll's people. Senator Hill then continues:

It is consistent with what many of them stated to me on the occasion of my recent visit to that part of the State. It is based upon the fact that it is nearly impossible to get the mail through when the snow is deep, and much of the time absolutely impossible to get it through in fifteen hours.

Steiniger, the contractor, paid last winter for carrying the mail over eight or ten miles of the route on snow-shoes during portions of the time all that he received for the whole route.

* * * * *

In my opinion the request contained in the inclosed petition is a reasonable one.

And that petition is one asking for that precise reduction. Mr. Brady did not make it. The petition asks for the extension of the time absolutely, without any question, but Senator Hill in his letter says that the people would be pleased if it could be extended without any decrease of compensation, and that was all the reason that Mr. Brady gave why he did not comply with that petition and extend the time from fifteen to twenty-four hours. He says that is the reason.

But you will remember, gentlemen, that upon the Eugene City route Mr. Brady found means to make an open-and-shut schedule, a longer schedule in winter and a shorter one in summer. He put it from sixty to forty hours, and he said as that averaged fifty for the whole year it would balance up. With reference to this letter the first thing suggested in the mind of either the witness or the counsel, I do not remember which, was that he could not extend the time beyond the contract time. He said that could not be done, and therefore it could not be granted. But unfortunately, gentlemen, the contract time in this case was thirty-six hours, and the request was only—Brady having put it down to fifteen hours—to carry it up to twenty-five hours, and Mr. Brady did not do it, and yet he had behind him the Senator from Colorado, and he had behind him the people of Colonel Ingersoll. And yet Mr. Brady did not see how he could possibly do it. Why? Because it would take some money out of the pockets of the contractor. You will bear in mind that on that route Mr. Steiniger was performing the service at about $9,000, and Mr. John W. Dorsey was drawing between $15,000 and $16,000. Mr. Steiniger was performing the service, bearing all the fines and all the losses, as he swore he did, and which it appears incidentally amounted to considerable, and he was doing all that for $9,000, while the pay of the contractor was about $16,000. If Brady had complied with the request it would have taken something out of the pay of the contractor, and therefore Mr. Brady disregarded the request of all those people.

On the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route I call your attention to one matter, as I have the reference now before me, as throwing light upon Brady's inconsistency and upon his action. At page 1907 there appears a petition of all the postmasters asking that the time on that route be extended to sixteen hours. The route had originally been advertised as fifty miles, whereas, in point of fact, it was seventy-five miles long. It was let at fourteen hours for fifty miles. Brady reduced it to ten hours for seventy miles. Vaile told you on the stand that that reduction was entirely wrong; that the speed was too great; that nobody could make it; that his experience as a mail-man showed that, because there were some nine or ten post-offices on the route, and at each post-office they had to stop seven minutes. There were eleven postmasters upon the route, and every postmaster made a request that the time be extended to sixteen hours. The original time had been fourteen hours, and it was reduced to ten. That petition was indorsed, as I said, by Mr. Bennett. Mr. Brady directed Mr. Brewer to write to Judge Bennett that it could not be done. Mr. Brewer wrote, as he says, and Mr. Brady signed the letter, which he wants you to believe he did not know anything about. That letter is at page 1939 :

15TH DECEMBER, 1879.

Hon. G. G. BENNETT,
House of Representatives :

SIR: You are informed that your communication relative to extension of time on route 35015, Dakota, signed by P. M., Vermillion, and others, has been received and filed. No such action can be taken, as it would change the terms of the existing contract and be an injustice to the other bidders at the letting of the route.

Assume that he could not extend the time to sixteen hours. But certainly he could have extended the time to fourteen hours, though it would have cost the contractor something. He could have said, and any honest officer would have fairly said when asked to do something, "According to my construction of my authority that is altogether too much. All the postmasters recommend the change to extend it to sixteen hours. I cannot extend it to sixteen hours, but I can extend it to fourteen hours, and I will do it." But Brady replies that it would be doing an injustice to other bidders. What regard did he have for other bidders on the Redding and Alturas route? Mr. Major asked that the service should be increased before the 1st of July, 1878, and it was increased without any opportunity for anybody to bid or do anything about it. What regard did he have for any bidder on any other route you ever heard of? Was there ever any regard for other bidders? Was there any regard for the Treasury? Was there any regard except for the favorite contractors? And yet this Mr. Bennett, this member of Congress, belonging to a class ordinarily entitled to so much deference, makes a request, but Brady does not grant it because he says it would be injustice to other bidders. Upon the stand, when asked something about it, he says, at page 3396 :

Q. Please state to the jury what it is.—A. Judge Kidder, who was then Delegate in Congress from Dakota, lived at Vermillion, and was very anxious to have a daily mail line to that place. I presume he thought, like most members of Congress, that it would be a benefit to him if he could give his own neighbors a daily mail. He was very anxious for me to get him up a daily mail to his town. I tried to do it. The contractors kicked against it—because they said they were losing money on the number of trips they were then performing, and to make it daily would only make them lose so much more.

Vaile, Miner & Co. kicked against it, he said—

I will show you directly how much they paid to the subcontractors, and then how much they were losing.

Accordingly, we conjured up some plan to help them through. For this purpose of obliging Judge Kidder, and as a matter of course the people out there, we expedited the route in order to help the contractor a little. That was one of the principles we went upon in that department while I was there—

I think it was, only it was not to help the contractors a little— to help a contractor rather than to compel him to lose money, if we could. We would rather help a contractor any time than to press him.

And incidentally, I presume, rather help themselves.

Therefore we got up the service in the way it was gotten up; it was increased and expedited. Subsequently Judge Kidder went out of Congress. Mr. Bennett came in as his successor, and wanted the same thing done some other where. I told him there was no money to do it with. He suggested that we cut down this Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, and save enough money on that to do what he wanted done. I told Judge Bennett that I was not doing business that way—

He was not cutting down, that is very certain—that I had put up that route for Judge Kidder, and I proposed it should stay just where I had put it; that if I could do what he wanted done I would do it subsequently, but that I would not cut down one service in order to put up another.

Now, that is Mr. Brady on the stand. How does it come that Mr. Brady in his letter to Judge Bennett says that he would not do it because it would be an injustice to other bidders? Was Mr. Kidder a bidder? Is there any evidence of that sort? Of course there is not. And yet Mr. Brady says that he did it in that way. I commend this to your consideration, gentlemen, not only as bearing upon this particular case, but as bearing upon the ideas which Mr. Brady avowed guided him in the postal service. Subsequently, at page 3458, I called his attention to this statement:

Q. Did you consider that it was your duty as Second Assistant Postmaster-General to put up the service for an individual?—A. I sometimes tried to accommodate my friends in that way.

Q. Under the contract, if expedition is ordered, the contractor has a right to throw up his contract; did you ever know such a case while you were Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. I do not remember any. Contractors were very well treated while I was Second Assistant.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; I judge so.

Now, there is Mr. Brady's statement of the way in which he regarded Members of Congress and Senators. It shows you just what principles governed him in his action.

Your honor, it is 4 o'clock, and I am just about to pass to another subject.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. I have had no opportunity, gentlemen of the jury, to examine the report of my remarks of yesterday, but I am conscious that I made one or two errors, or failed to make myself properly understood in one or two respects, and therefore I desire to refer again to those matters. In speaking of the question of the results which might follow from a slight change in stating the number of men and horses upon a given route by putting the fact too low or by putting the future too high I made my illustration in a general way, although I had figures on my memorandum. It occurred to me while speaking that perhaps my figures were erroneous, and I preferred to verify them. I will now again call your attention to the subject. Suppose an affidavit to state for the number of men and horses then actually in use five and ten, making a total of fifteen, and that the number that would be used on the proposed schedule would be ten and thirty, making a total of forty. The result would be if the original pay was $2,000 that there would be an increase on that affidavit up to $3,300. Now, if they understated only in the number actually used by three, leaving the same statement of the number that were likely to be used, the correct figure of $3,300 would be carried up instead to $4,166. If, on the other hand, they misstated in the figures that were likely to be used but correctly stated the figures that were used, misstating in the first instance by an addition of twenty in the aggregate, that would carry the total pay from what it should be, $3,300, to $6,000. If they made a misstatement in both branches of the equation by understating to the extent of only two the number that were actually used, and overstating to the extent of the proportion given the number that would be used, that would carry the amount of $3,300 up to $7,500 which would be taken from the Treasury. I merely call your attention to this matter as showing how important a slight error or a slight misstatement in either branch of the affidavit may be.

With regard to the order that I referred to as made on the White River route, I perhaps did not make myself understood when I claimed that it was made upon the oath of the subcontractor, Perkins. I intended to claim that the jacket showed that it was made on the oath of the subcontractor, and that Mr. Brady, in transmitting to Congress the statement of the fact, transmitted the oath of Perkins, the subcontractor, as that which was used. But I think I failed to suggest that it would probably be found that Mr. Brady was wrong both in the statement on the jacket and in the statement to Congress; and that in fact he did not take as the basis of the order he made the figures contained in the subcontractor's statement, but took the figures contained in the subsequent statement of Mr. Dorsey. While he recited that he took the figures from one statement he did, in fact, probably take them from the other.

I also perhaps ought to call your attention to the fact that I may have been misapprehended in my statement as to the regulations bearing upon the oath. I called your attention to the form of the regulations, and then I suggested that, so far as the regulations were concerned, the regulations called for the statement of a fact, to wit, the existing number of men and animals; and then called for a statement of opinion, to wit, the number that would be used:

When it becomes necessary to increase the speed, the contractor will be required to state under oath the number of horses and men required to perform the service according to the contract schedule and the number required to perform it with the proposed increase of schedule.

I was correct in my statement of the regulation, but I failed to supplement it, I think, by the suggestion that the statute under which that regulation was made does not look to any question of that kind directly, but it says distinctly that the Government shall not pay any additional sum unless the employment of additional men and horses is rendered necessary. The contractor may have sworn that additional men and horses would be rendered necessary, and he may in that case have deceived the Second Assistant Postmaster-General into making the order with that idea. But if it was true that the contractor had misstated the fact, and therefore there never had been any authority to pay more money for the increase of speed, because it did not require additional men and horses, although the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had been deceived by the misstatement of the affidavit, when that fact appeared, the right, without criminality, to continue to pay from the Treasury under an order which he had been deceived into making of course ceased to exist. In other words, the statute looks to the fact. What were the number of men and horses actually in use when the oath was made? What are the number of men and horses that will be required on the proposed increase of speed? And although the Second Assistant Postmaster-General may by negligence or in some other way make an order assuming that there would be more men and horses required in the future than turn out to be actually required, whenever the fact appears that there has been an excess, then the order should be corrected if it is to conform to the statute, because the statute says he shall not pay for any increase of speed unless additional stock and carriers are required.

Now, gentlemen, when I closed last evening I was referring, if I remember right, to the subject of petitions, and I had called your attention to the fact of who the people were, and I had called your attention to the fact that Mr. Brady disregarded the members of Congress upon various routes. But independently of that, gentlemen, and independently of the signers of the petitions, I now desire to call your attention briefly to the kind of petitions which Mr. Brady used as the basis of his action. I will take in the first place the route from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt. We find there a series of petitions which are very suggestive. I will call your attention first to the petition known as 29 H. The body of that petition is admittedly in Mr. Miner's handwriting. It is the petition which upon one sheet contains six names, before the other sheets are pasted on, and the other sheets are on an entirely different kind of paper. The names are E. Hall, postmaster; James Robinson, James F. Cleaver, D. M. Clifford, Max. Metscham, and W. C. Allred. Those six names, we claim broadly, and distinctly, were written there by John R. Miner. Mr. Boone swears that they are in Miner's handwriting. Mr. Henkle, one morning, you will remember, placed Mr. Waugh on the stand with great flourish. Mr. Waugh was shown the paper. He said he had been familiar with Mr. Miner's handwriting for a great many years. He was then asked, with considerable triumph, whether that was Mr. Miner's writing, and he said it was. I can imagine, gentlemen, a little interview between Mr. Waugh and Mr. Henkle afterwards, in which, being remonstrated with for having deceived him, the witness might perhaps have suggested to him, "Why, I thought that was the kind of testimony you wanted me to give." It appears by the testimony of Mr. Miner's own witnesses and by the testimony of Mr. Boone that Miner wrote those six names upon that petition. They are the first names upon the petition. Mr. Miner, when he was examined upon that subject, was a little tender-footed. He could not quite say whether he wrote those six names or whether he did not write the names. On the whole I think he was a little inclined to believe that he did not write them. He was very confident he never wrote any other names on any other petition, but the fact of having written names upon this petition did not apparently make a sufficient impression on his mind to lead him to remember. He could not tell you whether he had signed it or not, definitely, but if he did it he never did it again. Subsequently, on cross-examination (I can not for the moment turn to the page), when Mr. Miner was asked to make an explanation upon that subject, he undertook to give some kind of an explanation. It is worth our while to consider that explanation. I think I can state it. I will not stop to look it up.

Mr. HENKLE. It was in his examination-in-chief.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; in his explanation on cross-examination.

Mr. MERRICK. He said it looked like his, and he could not tell; that some of his friends said it was and some said it was not.

Mr. BLISS. And then he went on and said that all those names were upon petitions which were on file on this route, and therefore wanted you to infer that he put those names on there for some proper reason. He went on to give his explanation by stating that they were names upon other petitions, and that he had put them there, if he put them there, because they were upon other petitions which he had taken the pains to copy. Then he went on and undertook to account for his reason for doing it, and to tell how it was that these names came at the top, and all these other names came in afterwards, and this was done by him not in Oregon, but right here in Washington, and the petition placed with other petitions sent from Oregon and filed in the Post-Office Department. When Miner undertook to explain why it must have been done, if he did it at all, he found himself in difficulty, and the court could not resist interrupting him by saying that it could not understand how that explained it, but it was a matter for the jury. I submit to you that you will not be able to understand how that explained it. It still remains a matter for the jury. I think it will be a matter which the jury will dispose of very quickly. As to the fact of these names being already upon other petitions, that is only interesting as going to confirm the view which we take and which will not be seriously denied, that Miner wrote these six names there, because an examination of the names upon the other petitions—I will not stop now to call your attention to them—will show that the handwriting of the names on the other petitions which have been sworn to by witnesses on the stand as being in the handwriting of the men respectively are entirely different from those upon this petition. The fact is, gentlemen, beyond all question in my opinion, and I think you will arrive at that conclusion yourselves, that Mr. Miner, having this string of names on petitions coming from somewhere, we do not know where, for, if I recollect right, these names it appears affirmatively were not recognized by witnesses from that region—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] On the contrary, it appears that they were recognized.

Mr. BLISS. I will not say whether that is so or not.

Mr. HENKLE. Your witnesses picked out a number of names of people living there.

Mr. BLISS. Allow me to say that I am going to talk now and will not be interrupted.

Mr. HENKLE. Then you must not misstate the testimony.

Mr. BLISS. I have not misstated anything. I have only given my impressions. My impressions are still that it appeared affirmatively that none of these names were known in that region.

The COURT. Counsel have a right to interrupt for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension of testimony.

Mr. BLISS. Undoubtedly. If Mr. Henkle will point out where it is so testified and call attention to it, I will yield my recollection to his. I will not yield my recollection and will not quietly submit to being interrupted unless I am met by the record.

Mr. HENKLE. I have said all I desire to say. You can go on.

Mr. BLISS. What I desire to say is this: That beyond all question I think you will come to the conclusion that Mr. Miner, having in his office here that list of names attached to some paper which petitioned for something different from what was asked for upon that route, wrote the heading to that petition and placed those six names there, forging the name of Mr. Hall, the postmaster, for Mr. Hall on the stand swore he did not sign it, and forging the other names, and then pasting on this lot of names which he had belonging to some other petition for some other purpose, either upon this route or upon another route, and put it into the department, giving Mr. Brady that paper as the basis on which he was to act. You will bear in mind in connection with this petition what Mr. Moore said Mr. Miner told him and the instructions Moore said Miner gave him about manufacturing petitions.

But, gentlemen, let us look at another petition upon this route. I have here the petition marked 20 H. It is a petition also undoubtedly in the handwriting of Mr. Miner. You see the petition comes down to the bottom of the page and then you must turn over. In some way or other, and for some purpose or other, which I do not pretend to understand, I call your attention to the obvious fact that something has been clipped off at the bottom of the sheet. It looks to me very much as if the same thing had been done there. This sheet is not the full length. It looks to me as if, having that list of names prepared for some other purpose, and intended for some other purpose, Mr. Miner had gone on and executed some of the same handiwork in this case as in the other, and had written upon that side of the paper that petition, that side being blank, and then made all the names do service upon that petition.

Beyond all question something has been clipped off at the bottom of the sheet, and this has been put in as a petition upon that route. To show that that is not an entirely unwarranted assumption let me call your attention to another petition which I have here, where just the same thing has apparently been done. There is another petition, all in the handwriting of Miner. In the same way the sheet has been shortened from the ordinary size of the legal-cap sheet. In the same way it terminates at the bottom. In this case there is an address at the bottom, which is unusual, and then when we turn over we see that in the same way there has been something clipped off. The petition goes down on that side of the paper [indicating], with all of the names there. This petition is not upon the same route. It is a petition marked 106 A, and is upon the Kearney and Kent route. I now call your attention, gentlemen, to the petition 14 H, which is upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route. 14 H is a genuine petition, but the evidence is by Mr. Boone, and I think others, that the words and figures ninety-six were inserted by Mr. Miner. Mr. Miner says it is not so. We also have the petition 15 H, which was altered in the same way, "ninety-six" both in words and figures having obviously been put in over an erasure, just as was done in the petition 14 H. I will not trouble you to look at the papers. I assert that anybody holding them to the light will see beyond all question that this writing was done over erasures. That is the record on one single route of John R. Miner. It is the record of John R. Miner's handiwork, as we say, in connection with the petitions upon the route from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that there is also upon that route the petition which contains the names of inhabitants of Utah. Those names were placed upon the petition as asking for service on the route from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt, being a distance of, certainly, six or eight hundred miles further west, and I do not know how much further south. The inhabitants of Southern Utah could hardly have been interested in the mail service out there upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route in Oregon. I will not stop to direct your attention in detail to the petition. Those names, in like manner, were all of them upon three separate sheets which were inserted in the middle of a petition. It was a petition with some genuine names at the top and then on three or four separate sheets were the names of Utah men, and then came other names which I think were those of people in the locality, although I am not sure about that. That is the class of petitions we find. Now, let us take up some petitions on the route from The Dalles to Baker City. The first is a petition drawn entirely in Mr. Miner's handwriting. You see it ends directly at the bottom of the sheet. Moreover, I think you will see from the way in which it is creased and folded that that side of the paper [indicating] was originally the outside, and not the inside as now. Then when we turn over we find the names coming right down, with these other sheets pasted on; but we find this very significant fact, as conclusive that there has been something cut off and that the paper has been tampered with, that not only has the sheet been shortened, but there is the tail of a long letter coming down from the portion of the sheet which has been cut off, and we find also that the first name has obviously been written up at the very top of the sheet which there has been something cut off from. I think, gentlemen, in view of what I have said and the suggestions I have made to you as to the other matters, that you cannot have much question that this has been done with some intention to deceive. The names were on hand beyond all question. This petition has been written on the back, and there was something there that did not suit their purpose, and, therefore, it had to be cut off, and in cutting it off they left the tail of the long letter. That tail proved a tell-tale. On that route, when we come to an honest petition, we then find the genuine signature of Mr. Hall, the postmaster. I will not stop now to call your attention to it, but it is so different from the signature upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt petition, where it was placed, that it would be conclusive even if we had not Mr. Hall's statement of the forgery that was committed.

Gentlemen, let us take another series of petitions upon which Mr. Brady acted. These that I will show to you are the only petitions which he had recommending the increase he made, except, I think, a letter from General Fremont. There may possibly have been a letter from somebody else, but, if so, it does not occur to me. One of these two petitions which I read is on the route from Pioche to Mineral Park, and the other is on the route from Mineral Park to Ehrenberg, one being from the north of Mineral Park and the other to the south.

Mr. HENKLE. Will you be kind enough to give us the numbers of those petitions.

Mr. BLISS. They are 17 K and 18 K.

This order, 17 K, reads:

We, the undersigned, citizens furnished mail by the U. S. mail, on route No. 40104—

The figure "4" is obviously written over an erasure; it has been altered from some other figure that was there. Then the word "Pioche" at the end of the line has been obviously written over an erasure. At the beginning of the next line the "Nev.," for Nevada, has also been written over an erasure.

to Mineral Park, in Arizona Territory, wish to have more frequent mails, and would respectfully request that the service on this route be increased to—

And now the following words, all of them, are obviously written over an erasure—three trips on a schedule of sixty hours instead of eighty-four hours.

All the operative words and figures in that petition have been altered. The description of the route, 40104, has been altered; the terminus, Pioche, has been altered; the amount to which they wish trips increased has been altered; the schedule to which they wish it increased has been altered. And if you will notice the signatures you will see that they have substantially all been signed by the same two or three different people. There appear here, at the beginning, six names, which I think you will consider were written by the same person. On the back side are eleven, also in the same handwriting; and then below that are five more, also in the same handwriting. I think that petition has been shown to you before, and its alteration is beyond all question.

Then upon the route from Mineral Park to Ehrenberg we have precisely the same condition of things:

We, the undersigned, citizens furnished mail by the U. S. mail, on route 40105—

The “5” is written over an erasure—

from Ehrenberg—

Ehrenberg is written over an erasure—

to Mineral Park in Arizona Territory, would recommend and request that said service be expedited so as to have the running time from Ehrenberg—

Ehrenberg written over an erasure—to Mineral Park only forty-eight hours—

Both the “forty” and the “eight” are written over an erasure—in lieu of sixty—

The “sixty” is substituted for eighty—hours, the present running time.

All the operative words there are written over erasures, and every one of them is altered. The signatures to this petition (18 K) are identical with the signatures to the other petition (17 K)—the same handwriting, the same names, though in one or two cases the order of the names upon the petition is changed.

Now, as to these two petitions Boone swears that the interlineations in one were in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell, and that the interlineations in the other were made in the handwriting of John R. Miner. And when Mr. Miner was on the stand he admitted his handwriting in the word Ehrenberg in one of the petitions. There is, therefore, no question that these are both altered petitions, altered by these defendants—for, bear in mind, gentlemen, that Rerdell is a defendant just as much as Miner is, except that he has confessed himself guilty in full, while Mr. Miner has admitted himself guilty only by the petty admissions that he has been compelled to make on the stand. One of these petitions was altered by one of the defendants and the other altered by another of the defendants. I shall have occasion, I think, to show you under what circumstances, as Mr. Rerdell stated, this alteration was made by him. The signatures to the two petitions are identical.

And that is not all. The evidence is absolutely conclusive, both from Mr. Wright and from Mr. Krider, that the signers of these petitions did not live on or near these routes; that they did not, in fact, get their mail upon these routes to which the petitions are made to apply; that they lived away down some eighty or ninety miles south, at or near a place called Signal; and the postmaster at Mineral Park said that he saw the letters that went through his office, and he never knew of any letters going through on that route to Signal, and he did not believe there ever did.

That is the kind of petitions upon which Mr. Brady acted. That is the kind of petitions which Mr. Miner and these other defendants submitted to Mr. Brady for his action. And that is the kind of petition, gentlemen, upon which Mr. Brady ran up the contract from somewhere about $2,000, I think, to something over $52,000. He did that in two bites, it is true. He made two orders in connection with that—first, increasing it up to $22,000, and then up to $52,000. One of these orders was made absolutely and exclusively upon the petitions, and possibly upon a letter of General Fremont, and it seems to me that there is a letter from his favorite Delegate in Congress out there. But those are all there are, and upon those some $20,000 or $30,000 was taken out of the Treasury.

As to the subsequent order perhaps I may just as well call your attention to it right here, as finishing up in that connection. The other order, gentlemen, taking between $20,000 and $30,000 from the Treasury, was made upon this single letter which I hold in my hand. It is a letter from Sidney Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad. On that letter Mr. Brady made an order taking between $20,000 and $30,000 out of the Treasury. And you will bear in mind, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady, on the stand, opposed railroads; he had nothing to do with the railroads; he was looking out for the general star-route service. And yet Mr. Sidney Dillon writes him a letter of this kind, stating that—

The Utah Southern Railroad will in a short time be completed to Frisco. From that point to Pioche, Nev., there is already established daily mail service, which will be rapidly taken up by our advancing railroad. From Pioche to Prescott—

As he calls it—

there is running a tri-weekly mail service on slow schedule. * * * I therefore respectfully ask that the service between Pioche and Prescott be increased to daily, thus giving us a continuous daily service from the Union Pacific Railroad to Southern Pacific Railroad at Maricopa Wells.

Mr. Brady gets that letter and he promptly does what I have failed to find upon any other papers in this case. He turns it over to Turner, and says:

TURNER: Make up case Pioche to Mineral Park.

BRADY.

He is going to have that attended to at once; there should be no delay about that. And he is the gentleman who did not believe in railroads; he did not act in behalf of railroads; he is the gentleman who acted in favor of the star routes.

But it so happens, gentlemen—and I now refer to 32 T—that when the president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, Mr. Frederick Billings, wrote him that he wanted an increase of service on the Bismarck and Tongue River route, this opponent of railroads, this favorer of star routes, turns over that letter and indorses upon it in his own handwriting:

BREWER: Increase Bismarck to Tongue River, as requested within, to six times a week.

BRADY.

Make the order to commence as quickly as contractor can put on the increased service. B.

He was going to have no delay there, but expedition squarely. And this is done on the petition of another railroad president.

Put that, gentlemen, if your please, in connection with one other fact to which I call your attention, and that is that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey stated that when he wanted passes to send out any of his men over the road, and he had not a convenient pass of his brother's, he applied to Mr. Sidney Dillon or to Mr. Jay Gould—and Mr. Jay Gould also appears on one of the petitions on the Mineral Park route—and got passes from them. Of course it was “scratch my back and I’ll tickle your elbow.” “I will put up your service if you will give me passes; I will give you expedition and increase of service if you will give me the requisite share in the proceeds.” That is the kind of petition and the kind of letters upon which Mr. Brady acted upon that route.

As to this question of the alteration of petitions signed by parties who had no earthly interest, you remember the petition—I will not stop to get it out and go over it—on The Dalles and Baker City route that was signed by a lot of persons who appear as soldiers—corporals and privates of a company—who were not known at all in that region. They certified, I think, that they were citizens of that region—at any rate they connected themselves with it either as citizens or by stating that they got their mail on that route, and I think they stated that they were citizens, and yet nobody ever heard or knew anything of any such soldiers there in any way. They were connected with a regiment of which there was no evidence that it was ever there, and the parties who were here from that region knew nothing about them. McBean, Schultz, Fisk, and all those men whose names were on that petition, were familiar with that region there, had been deputy sheriffs and the like, and knew all the people there, saw these names and said: “We do not know any of these people; we do not recognize them as having ever lived there, or anything of the kind.” And that is the kind of petitions which were placed before Mr. Brady by the other defendants, and which were accepted by him as sufficient authority for taking these large sums out of the Treasury.

The Kearney to Kent route I will not take up your time by going over in detail again. But there is only a single paper on record which asks for expedition on that route. That petition bears the indorsement of Senator Saunders, dated on the 6th of February; the date of filing does not appear. We showed you by the men who signed the petition, by men who forwarded it, that it was sent here to John R. Miner without the only words that are now in it which would justify any expedition at all. The words “schedule thirteen hours” are inserted at the end of the line where there is a little blank space, originally left at the end of a paragraph. The original petition was sent there in Miner’s handwriting, but an inkstand got upset on it and the parties out there rewrote it, and, having got it signed, they sent it to Miner without any request in it for expedition. Somehow or other, subsequent to that time they gave the petition to Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Saunders indorsed it on the 6th of February. The words “schedule thirteen hours” in the petition are in an entirely different handwriting from the body of it, and are sworn to as being in the handwriting of John R. Miner. And, gentlemen, I shall have occasion to call your attention in another connection to one singular fact which I think will carry conviction to your minds, and that is, that the petition bearing Senator Saunders’s indorsement of the 6th of February being the only paper that said either thirteen hours or expedition, the date of the affidavit for that expedition—it being sworn to in New Mexico, I think—will be conclusive to your minds, brought in connection with another thing. I do not go into the details of it now, because I shall have to go over it in another connection, but I think it will be absolutely conclusive that those words “thirteen hours” were, as all the evidence showed, put in after the petition was signed; were, as all the witnesses say, put in after the petition was traced into John R. Miner’s hands.

They got so much in the way of altering petitions that Mr. Rerdell being told by Stephen W. Dorsey, upon this route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, to go to work and alter the petitions, inserted the words "and faster time" just in the same way as the words were inserted in the Kearney petition, at the end of a paragraph where the line had ended. He inserted "and faster schedule," "on quicker time," though there was not any necessity for doing that, because if they had gone further down, after some argument in the petition, to the request for expedition, they would have seen that there was no necessity for that little forgery up there. Yet it was done from force of habit, I suppose, and from the feeling that it was well to keep their hands in.

So, in the same way, upon the petition on the route from Toquerville to Adairville. Here is a petition where the word "seven" and the figure 7 are obviously written over an erasure. Mr. Johnson, who drew that petition, states that those words were not written by him and were not there when the petition was signed. They were signing for a daily route, undoubtedly, but they regarded a daily as six times a week, because the petition specified that they were to connect with a route upon which, as Mr. Johnson stated upon the stand, there was six-times-a-week service. From force of habit in altering petitions, or rather because they did not want any ambiguity in it, Miner, I think it was—at any rate some of these defendants—altered that and put in the word "seven."

You will notice, gentlemen, that hitherto I have not called your attention to anything except record evidence or uncontradicted evidence. I have not gone into the great number of contradictions, and I have only gone incidentally into the oral evidence at all. I have confined myself to the papers which these defendants placed on file, to papers which Mr. Brady had before him when he made his orders. But simply, as bearing upon the question of this petition business and the ease with which they were gotten up, I call your attention to petitions upon the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, put in by the defendants. They are all in the same form, I think all in the same handwriting, so far as the bodies of the petitions are concerned; they were gotten up for signers, and they were signed. But the person who got them up left some blanks which he was not competent to fill, and the petition, as it was drawn up by him, read in this way:

It has already become a very important route, passing through the best part of the Territory. It carries the mail to—offices, and affords the benefits of mail communication to more than —— families.

And then there was room left to put in the number—

All the petitions submitted at that time, being 82 R, 83 R, 84 R, 85 R, and 86 R, are in that precise form. The petitioners have all signed them, leaving all the blanks unfilled. And somehow or other these defendants have been guilty of an oversight in not filling them. But they got here, so that they appear here as requesting service upon the route, stating that it supplies "—— offices and carries mail to more than —— families."

As for this business of petitions, gentlemen, without going into the details, I think your memories will agree with me that the record is full of facts showing that the petitions were gotten up by these contractors themselves; that they instigated their getting up; that they did it as of their own motion; and that those petitions were not the free-will desires, under ordinary circumstances, of the people in the community whence they came, but were the sought requests of the contractors. Of course they had a right to go and get people to sign. Mr. Dorsey was right when he said that there was an undoubted right of petition, and if your verdict shall be such as I trust it will be Mr. Dorsey may at some future time desire to exercise the right of petition himself. But however that may be, the petitions were gotten up through these defendants. Mr. Rerdell swears to Dorsey's directions to him in that regard. We produce Mr. Dorsey's directions to Mr. Joseph, requesting him to get up petitions. The letter has been read to you, in which Dorsey tells him that he has written General Hatch, and very soon General Hatch's letter appears on the record as showing the same thing. He had written to Mr. Barnes, the district attorney at Santa Fé, and Mr. Barnes pretty soon appears as petitioning for almost everything on the Ojo Caliente route, with which probably he had some connection, and on the Tres Alamos and Clifton, with which he was entirely disconnected. Mr. Barnes was United States district attorney out there, and Mr. Dorsey writes to him, and he promptly gets an answer. These petitions were gotten up at the instigation of these contractors. And that is not all, gentlemen. They were gotten up through a certain sort of compulsion exercised upon the persons who circulated them. Mr. Davis, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Perkins, on the White River route—not to go further—all state that they got these petitions up because they were asked to, and because such relations existed between them and Mr. Dorsey and these defendants, they being in a measure dependent upon these defendants, that they could not very well refuse; that they got them up, and did not trouble themselves at all as to whether they were justified or not.

Mr. Schultz gives you some interesting evidence upon that subject of getting up petitions, which I will stop for a moment to call your attention to. He says, on page 1720—it is but a single line, but it is very expressive:

There is no trouble about getting signers when you do not want any money.

He says he got them readily. Of course these defendants did not want any money from the signers, but they wanted the signers' names upon these petitions in order to use them for the purpose of getting money. Mr. McBean says that he signed and circulated some petitions. He said he did not care anything about it, did not know anything about it; he would sign for somebody to come out there and toot a horn. They were got up in the same way, through the instigation of these contractors appealing to the great people of Colonel Ingersoll, and then they were brought here, and as far as possible the indorsement was secured of the great people of Mr. Brady, and then they were a sufficient cover to enable Mr. Brady to have some pretense of gratifying the wishes of these other defendants.

Without stopping to take out the petition on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, I want to call your attention to it. It appears that none of the signers lived east of Springfield, which was within twenty miles of the west end of the line.

On the White River route, Secretary Teller upon the stand here told you that the petition was a false one in stating the condition of the country, the mines, &c. Secretary Teller said there was not anything of the sort there.

And here, gentlemen, perhaps, as I am considering these petitions, I may briefly refer to another question connected therewith, and that is this: the names of the persons signing the petitions asking for an increase of service, an increase of trips, are made to do service upon the jackets, and, as a possible backing for Mr. Brady, as recommending the expedition. There are some marked instances of that to which I desire to call your attention. For instance, take the Bismarck and Tongue River route. On the jacket the statement is paraded that General Miles asks increase of trips and expedition, and as I recollect it the General of the Army is also brought into the same connection. And yet the General of the Army does nothing except to transmit with his indorsement the petition made with General Miles's indorsement. And now I have here in my hand all of the several letters and indorsements of General Miles. They are 25 T, 28 T, 29 T, 30 T, and 36 T. They are letters or indorsements, and all of them, without exception, are limited absolutely to requests for increase of trips, and the increase of trips is specified, as for instance in 25 T, he asks that the trips be increased to three or six times a week; but there is not a word about expedition. In the letter of the War Department transmitting the letter of General Miles asking that it be increased to tri-weekly or daily mail it is said:

The General of the Army recommends tri-weekly mail.

In the indorsement upon the petition of General Miles (36 T) it is said:

I earnestly indorse the above petition, and add, &c.

That petition is one which asks for a daily mail; does not ask for expedition at all. Another letter, of which there is a copy here, transmitted through the regular routine, says the same thing. It relates entirely to increase of trips. The only other indorsement of General Miles is upon a petition for tri-weekly or daily mail. And yet these letters are all made to do service before you here as Mr. Brady's authority for expedition, for increase of trips, and for increase of speed. Increase of trips, if he carried it up to six times a week, would not have made the payment to the contractors upon that route $15,000. Mr. Brady told you himself that the more service the contractors got at that rate the worse it would be for them; that to multiply losing trips could only make a greater loss, and that was better than his ordinary arithmetic. And yet, using these papers in connection with others, which do, I say frankly, ask for expedition, and these being really the most important and weighty in the lot, Brady orders expedition that carries the route up to $70,000 a year, and it is put upon the jacket that these gentlemen recommended expedition.

Mr. HENKLE. Do you mean to say that Mr. Brady prepared those orders and knew what was in them?

Mr. BLISS. I make no claim as to what General Brady prepared or did not prepare. I say that he signed a jacket; that his name appears upon it, ordering so and so. And Mr. Brady cannot come here before this jury and claim that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, important enough, he says, to be a factor in the politics of a great State, important enough to be supervisor of internal revenue, and important enough to be consul at an important commercial point—he cannot come before you and make a claim that upon orders which took $70,000 out of the Treasury he signed his name without knowing anything about what was in them.

On the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn we find the Hon. Mr. Teller and the Hon. Mr. Hill cited as recommending increase of expedition and of service, and yet you will find in fact that they did not recommend anything but the increase of service. They did not ask for increase of trips. And there is another petition of a gentleman—Mr. Chilcott—who was then filling a county office in Colorado, and who subsequently became United States Senator—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I think you said something you did not intend to say.

Mr. BLISS. What?

Mr. MERRICK. You said there was an increase of expedition advised.

The COURT. You represented that the recommendation was for increase of expedition and not increase of service.

Mr. BLISS. I got it just the wrong way then; it was the other way. The petitions recommend an increase of trips. Now, that is the kind of petition and the kind of papers which these defendants have submitted, and that is the kind of petitions upon which Mr. Brady based his action.

I now pass to another matter, as showing the course of things in the department under Brady at the instigation of these defendants. I wish to call your attention for a moment to the way in which no attention was paid to the remonstrances of people who certainly were entitled to some consideration. At any rate, they stated facts which should have put the Second Assistant Postmaster-General upon investigation. I confine myself—as the court has required us to do—entirely to those papers which were received before orders were made by Mr. Brady. Anything afterwards, remonstrating against action already taken, was excluded on this trial.

On the route from Pueblo to Rosita, as early as August 30, 1878, a gentleman, who frankly gives his name as a contractor upon another route, and shows thereby that he had knowledge of the subject and the facts, calls his attention to the fact that there is being circulated a petition to have the schedule changed on the route from Pueblo to Rosita from once a week, as it now is, to three times a week. He says (page 865):

You are aware there is now a daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita, by way of Cañon City, and all the mail for Rosita goes and comes by way of Cañon City, and would continue to do so if there was a daily mail from Pueblo to Rosita by way of Greenwood. The object in having the service increased is not to better accommodate the people, but for the increased pay.

There was notice, as early as August 30, 1878, to Mr. Brady, by this contractor upon the other route, calling his attention to the precise condition of things which we have shown you existed upon that route. We have shown it to you by the parties who carried the mail upon both routes. We have shown by the postmaster at Pueblo that all the mail going over that route practically, except a mere rivulet that was occasionally turned in upon this Pueblo to Rosita route, intended for Rosita and points below, passed from Pueblo out on the railroad, and, although traveling more miles by railroad than would have been covered by going from Pueblo to Rosita, yet arrived at its destination sooner.

And in that connection, gentlemen, there is a very noteworthy thing here. On page 868 we find a jacket. The reading of the jacket will call your attention to some other letters and remonstrances upon this route. After giving the number of the route, the termini, the length of route, number of trips per week, the contractor's name (Miner), and pay per annum, it says:

Postmaster at Greenwood, the only intermediate office on the route, states that: "My duty to the department requires that I should suggest the discontinuance of the present mail service (weekly) from Pueblo to Rosita, as we now have a tri-weekly service from Florence to Greenwood, by which we receive all our mail."

Greenwood was the only intermediate office from Pueblo to Rosita. Greenwood got its mail from Florence, a nearer point upon the railroad, and therefore did not need the service, and the postmaster at Greenwood calls Mr. Brady's attention to that. Having called his attention to that, there is a jacket made up, and that jacket quotes the letter of the postmaster at Greenwood:

Mail matter from Pueblo to Rosita—is transmitted from Pueblo to Cañon City on the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, and from there to Rosita, via route No. 38132, thirty-one miles and back, six times a week.

It continues—

Length of this route fifty miles, and from Rosita to Silver Cliff (which office it is supposed to benefit by increase of service to daily and expedition), nine miles, making distance from Pueblo to Silver Cliff fifty-nine miles.

Concealing the fact apparently that it was by railroad.

By the present service on route No. 38132, Silver Cliff receives supply from the railroad by a traveling distance of thirty-one miles.

All that is recited upon the jacket, and then it is recited that—

Increase of service and expedition is recommended by Hon. H. M. Teller, U. S. S., and Hon. James B. Belford, M. C. Hon. W. H. Hyde, mayor of Pueblo, also recommends improved service petitioned for.

That jacket without date is placed in another jacket, which Mr. Brady uses as his authority for directing the increase of service over that route to six trips a week, and to pay the contractor $2,328 additional for the increase of trips, and to reduce the running time from fifteen to ten hours, and to pay the contractor $5,432 per annum additional for that, running up from the original allowance, which is here on the same jacket, of $388 to a sum over $8,100, and doing it in the face of a jacket contained in this jacket on which he made his order, on which there is the recital of these facts which showed to anybody that the order was an utterly unjustifiable order; and yet he did it, as the jacket states, on the recommendation of Mr. Teller and Mr. Belford. The order itself is made, I think, upon no other papers than those I have referred to, except the affidavit, but it is possible there may be others. At the same time, however, there was before Mr. Brady not only the letter of the postmaster at Greenwood, in which he says that his duty to the department compels him to state that the route is unnecessary, but there is quoted on the jacket another passage from the letter, in which he says:

So long as we have the mail promptly by other routes, the service from Pueblo to Rosita is superfluous and a needless expense to the Government. I do not make this suggestion at the instance of any interested parties, but simply as a saving to the department.

If he had known the way business is done in the Post-Office Department he would have been perfectly aware that to make that statement would render it certain that no attention would be paid to his suggestion, for all the suggestions that they attended to were the suggestions of interested parties. Not only does he make that suggestion, but another postmaster at the same place subsequently calls attention to the same condition of things, stating that the service is utterly unnecessary. I think the letter from the second postmaster was not written until after Mr. Brady made the order.

On the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City Mr. Trew, the postmaster at a terminal point, wrote to the department before the order was made, substantially saying that the route was of no importance.

On the White River route the postmaster at one of the offices wrote to the department calling attention to the fact that it was desirable, instead of having the time shortened, to make the time five days, and he went into an argument upon that question. You remember I showed Mr. Brady that letter when he was on the stand, and Mr. Brady got very indignant with that postmaster because he spoke of five days, and subsequently, somehow or other, he spoke of one hundred and eight hours, and Mr. Brady said that that postmaster did not know the difference between five days and one hundred and eight hours, and then he threw the letter to one side, off on the floor, with an indignant air that the man should not be able to make better arithmetic than that. And yet Mr. Brady had been giving large sums from the Treasury upon arithmetic undoubtedly worse than that. And even after that Mr. Brady was not sure that he did not mean days of twelve hours until I called his attention to some things in the letter utterly inconsistent with that idea. He then said he did not pay any attention to that. He was postmaster out there, and he paid just as little attention to that as he did to the direction of Mr. James, his superior officer, to revoke the order upon the same route.

On the route from Ouray to Los Pinos, gentlemen, you will remember that, having originally made a one-day route from Ouray to Los Pinos, they changed a six-day route so that it passed over some thirty or forty miles of this route, and from that time there was but one mail pouch went over that route. But one mail pouch went over it six times a week, I think. The letters over both these routes were put in the same bag and were carried by the same carrier upon the same horse. Mr. Brady's attention was called to that by a letter from a postmaster out there who had been stirred up. That postmaster, not considering it possible, after the six-day route was put over the same territory precisely as the other route, that the one-day-a-week route could remain, had failed to make his monthly report of arrivals and departures upon the one-day route. He was punished up for that delinquency by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's office, and he was requested to inform the department as to why he had not done it. He then writes to Mr. Brady a long letter and explains the whole thing. He gives him the correspondence showing the condition of things and showing that that route is being run utterly uselessly to the Government, and that it was putting so much money into the pockets of the contractor without any excuse whatever. But that order remains unrevoked by Mr. Brady; that condition of things remains unchanged for considerably over a year, and it remained unchanged, as I recollect, until about the time of the Congressional investigation, which caused somewhat of an overhauling in the dirty house of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. Brady also made a series of orders which resulted in no benefit to the Government, but which resulted in taking from the Treasury large sums of money and putting them into the pockets of these defendants. For instance, on the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, the original schedule was twelve hours, I think. An extension of time was made in consequence of this fictitious increase of twelve miles for extending the route up from Saint Charles, and they carried it up to fifteen hours. Then they expedited it down to seven hours, and paid for that large sums of money. And yet the evidence before you shows beyond all question that the mail was being carried ordinarily and generally in eight hours' time before any order for increase was made or any order for expedition. It was not being carried in seven, but was being carried in eight hours; and though at the same time the contractor had a right to take more time, and if he did so could not be fined, of course, yet, as a general thing, he did it in eight hours.

However that may be, it is said to be desirable to have this increase and expedition in order to make it certain that the mail should arrive in the day-time for the convenience of the farmers, and that was probably in a measure true. And yet you will bear in mind that the number of people who would be benefited by it, other than the contractors, was very small; the amount of mail matter was very small, and the number of people living along the route was comparatively small. But there is this significant fact in connection with that case: that though he made the expedition at a large expense, giving some $3,000, I think, therefor, yet the man who performed the service was receiving only $840.

There was a schedule of arrivals and departures made on that route which resulted in the mails arriving at Pueblo, the terminal point upon the railroad, just about an hour after the mails east and west had left, so that they could not go forward for twenty-four hours afterwards. The mail going from Pueblo had to lie over twenty-four hours. Yet Mr. Brady paid this large sum upon papers which recited that it was desirable to have a connection with the east and the outer world; and upon papers some of which are signed by persons living in New York, on the ground of wanting connection there, he gave an order of expedition, and yet he did not secure any expedition whatever. The mail lay over, and left just at the same time going east as it would have left if no such order had been made.

On the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls precisely the same condition of things existed. The expedition gained nothing except what was gained by the people along the route getting their mail possibly in a somewhat shorter time.

On the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City there was a condition of things which I must call your attention to for a moment. Brady made an order for expedition, in spite of the remonstrance of the postmasters, which took from the Treasury a great deal of money, running up the allowance, as I recollect it, to $10,000 or to $15,000. And he made the order, as it was apparently claimed, on the ground that at Ojo Caliente it connected with another route which was a six-day-in-the-week route. And yet we put witnesses upon the stand and produced to you the record evidence to show that Ojo Caliente, not being on the railroad—it was then some twelve or fifteen miles from the railroad—had no connection absolutely at that time with the railroad except that by private enterprise a mail was carried once or twice a week over towards Taos, striking the railroad, but that the mail route which connected with the railroad was a route that diverged somewhat to the south from Ojo Caliente and struck the railroad lower down, and that was only a once-a-week route. We produced the clerk with the route register, and we put that in, showing conclusively that there was no such mail, and that there was no connection whatever. (See page 1203.)

On the route from White River to Rawlins there was the same failure to connect. The mail arrived at Rawlins, which was on the railroad, the other end having no connection whatever, being a place in the mountains or in the air, with no communication whatever beyond it. The mail arrived at Rawlins just two hours after the train left, and his expedition therefore gained absolutely nothing. There was some attempt, after we showed that state of affairs, to make out that that came from the desire of the postmaster at Rawlins not to be waked up in the night. That led, however, to our putting in the evidence showing that the postmasters sought a change of schedule, and that Mr. Brady had not made it, and it led also to an investigation and discussion of the subject, which enabled us to call the attention of the court and of yourselves, gentlemen, to the fact that under the statute the duty of making the schedules rests with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. That is provided for by the statute, and is not a regulation of the department. He is the man who has charge of making the schedules, and it is his business, as an honest and efficient officer, whenever he makes expedition on any particular route, to see that that connection is made.

Mr. Chandler told you in his opening, when he was anxious to make out that there should not be any attention paid to the remonstrances of these postmasters, that the postmasters did not know anything about the connections all the way through; that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, sitting here in Washington, has a knowledge of these things; that he must judge of the system under that statute, and that you have no business to pay any attention to these postmasters, who do not amount to anything. That was Mr. Chandler's opening. And yet when we came to the evidence, then counsel got up and argued that Mr. Brady has nothing to do with this business, but that was a matter resting with the parties out there. The fact is, you will find, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady knew what it was necessary to know with reference to all the practice and to all these orders. He knew what it was necessary to know to put money into the pockets of these contractors. He knew what it was necessary to know to prevent him from stopping money from going into the pockets of these contractors; and when any further knowledge than that was necessary, he took care, according to his counsel and according to the gentlemen here concerned, not to have any knowledge of it.

I have called your attention, gentlemen, to the facts which stared Mr. Brady in the face when he made those orders as to the amount of mail-matter, so far as that amount was disclosed by the mail bills. I called your attention also to the knowledge which stared him in the face so far as the productiveness of the routes was concerned. I mentioned that on some of the routes the jackets themselves had the productiveness or the want of productiveness indorsed upon them, and yet Mr. Brady paid no attention to the indorsement. I find on examination that on eleven of the routes the jackets did contain a statement of the revenues. In cases where orders were made upon eleven different routes the orders contain a statement of the revenues. In the other cases they apparently do not, but they were always accessible to Mr. Brady. Now, as to the amount of mail matter apart from the question of the mail bills and simply as showing how the oral evidence bears out the statement of the mail bill. You remember that on the Mineral Park and Pioche route Mr. Brady made two remarkable orders. On the 22d of January, 1880, he made this order:

The mail bills received by the inspection division showing little mail matter passing over this route, as per files of said division, and that the service is most irregularly and inefficiently performed: Ordered, That service on said route be reduced from the 1st day of February next to what it was at original letting, both as to trips and speed, without one month's extra pay.

Then, in black ink:

From February 1, 1880, reduce service from seven trips per week to one trip per week, and increase running time from sixty hours to eighty-four hours, decreasing contractor's pay $49,051.33 per annum, being amount allowed by orders bearing date December 31, 1878 (No. 11446), and July 23, 1879 (No. 6834), for increase of trips and expedition of running time, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

The order of December 31, 1878, was the order made upon those two altered petitions on the Mineral Park and Pioche and Mineral Park and Ehrenberg routes, one of which was admittedly altered by Miner and the other by Rerdell. The order of July 23, 1879, was an order made solely upon the letter of Sidney Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad. Brady revoked both of those orders without one month's extra pay on the service dispensed with. That was the indignation of Mr. Brady on the 22d of January, 1880. It was not a sudden indignation of that day only, because on the preceding day Mr. Brady had made in his own handwriting the longest memorandum that I have found by him among the papers in this case. It is marked 25 K. He there writes out substantially the order made on the 22d of January. But on the 28th of January, either the row that Mr. Brady had had with the defendants—there is some indication among the papers of a temporary row—or possibly the pendency of the Congressional investigation, caused the making of another order. The order of the 22d of January was just succeeding Mr. Brady's first examination before the committee, and preceded his second examination, as I recollect it. At any rate it was pending his examination, when he had been called upon for the records of the office with reference to the increase upon this and other routes. That order was then made cutting off $49,000, and leaving only twenty-odd hundred dollars. But six days afterwards he recites :

An order was issued bearing date January 22, 1880, to reduce the service from seven to once a week. In view of the fact that this route forms a part of the direct line of communication between the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads, it is deemed advisable to maintain three times a week's service.

1st. Rescind order bearing date January 22, 1880 (No. 633).

2d. From February 1, 1880, reduce service four trips per week, and deduct from contractor's and subcontractor's pay $29,733.33 per annum, being pro rata, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

He left them with about twenty-two or twenty-three thousand dollars still, and you will see why he did it. He recites that his first order, having been made upon the basis of the mail bills, showing there was no mail matter, that now, in view of the fact that this route forms a part of the direct line of communication between the Southern and Central Pacific Railroads, that order should be rescinded ; and yet the very mail bills to which he referred, and which he had obviously seen and studied, showed him there never had been a letter passing over that route from the Central to the Southern Pacific Railroad, and that in thirty-nine days there had been nineteen days when no letter whatever had gone over that route, and that there had been absolutely no mail matter going over the whole length of the route. Yet notwithstanding the mail bills which had met his eye, because he recites that he had seen them, and notwithstanding the fact that he had taken off the expedition and the trips because there was no mail matter, he then put on three trips with expedition. The mail bills showed him that the statement of his last order was not true and that the line was not one over which any through mail passed. When Mr. Brady came on the stand he asked you to believe that he made that order because it was represented to him that it would not be fair to the contractors to cut them off as he had originally cut them off. He did not say on the stand that he did it on account of the through mail. He did at one time refer to that matter, but he said it was represented to him that it would not be fair to do it ; and he lugged in here, entirely without justification, and apparently with a desire that you might think there was something reflecting upon him, Senator Plumb of Kansas as a man whom he said came to him and represented the necessity for this order. I do not believe he did. But suppose he did. What had Senator Plumb of Kansas to do with representations with reference to a route from Mineral Park to Pioche? And what had Mr. Brady to do with reference to what was justice to the contractor when there was such great injustice done to the Government in making the order and in paying the contractors, as he did, about $13.67 a letter for every letter carried over that route during thirty-nine days. I ought to say about this mail matter that Mr. Kri-der, the postmaster at Mineral Park, told you that there was almost absolutely no mail matter through; that they did not get the mail matter from the north, but from the south, from Prescott, connecting with the railroad. Mr. Caldwell Wright, who was a witness from there and who had occasion to know about the contents of the mail, said distinctly that mail bags sometimes did not contain anything, just as the mail bills showed you that for nineteen days out of thirty-nine that was the case.

On the Tongue River route Mr. Pennell tells you that there was one small sack. The mail subsequently increased until there were two sacks, and down quite late in the term the amount of the mail matter, according to the evidence, was carried up to two hundred or three hundred pounds a day going west. Coming east it was almost nothing. That was the evidence of Mr. Pennell, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Lambert, Mr. Lounsberry, and Mr. Swift, and that evidence is all confirmed by the mail bills on that route. On the route from Rawlins to White River the mail varied from fifty pounds one way, including the weight of the sack, to ten pounds the other way. They told us that at one time during the intermediate period there was a large number of soldiers in there. But that was not the time when either one of these orders was made for increase on that route. One order was made long before the soldiers went in there, and the other order was made after the soldiers went out. In the interim there were, however, twenty or thirty companies of soldiers in there, and several hundred letters went in on one trip. But as I said, gentlemen, before the soldiers came there the evidence is that there were not over twenty letters a day, the mail varying, as I said, from ten pounds in one direction to thirty, forty, and fifty pounds in the other direction. Mr. France, the postmaster, told you there were from fifteen to twenty letters on that route, and that was all. On the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls I call your attention to the fact that there was one of the mail bills that showed that on that day there were three letters starting from Vermillion. You will bear in mind that that was the route upon which we had for a witness the bright young boy who was so indignant at the idea that he slept with the mail bags. On the route from Eugene City to Mitchell Mrs. Powers told you that the mail as far as McKinzie Bridge, which was about one-third of the way, consisted of ten or twelve letters, and beyond McKinzie Bridge it varied from six letters to none. This is the "Gum-boot route," gentlemen. I think I have summed it up in that statement. All the mail was carried in the leg of an India-rubber boot. Mr. McBean, before the service commenced, told Mr. Moore upon that route that he could carry all the mail in his pocket. Mrs. Powers told you there was very little mail. Mr. Powers told you the same thing, and the mail bills show, in fact, that there was almost no mail going over that route beyond McKinzie Bridge, which was at the base of the mountains on the west side. On the route from The Dalles to Baker City Mr. Fisk told you there was twenty pounds on an average, and Mr. Hall, the postmaster at Canyon City, the middle office—I am speaking now of the mail passing from The Dalles going east—that two-thirds of the mail that started from The Dalles came only to his office. It appears on that route, gentlemen, that there was absolutely no through mail. The through mail all went around by way of Pendleton. That was so true that the stations within ten miles of each terminus of the route sent it around, going back to the end of the route, and then on the other route. They could transmit the mail quicker, better, and more certainly in that way. On the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton the evidence is that there was about half a mail-sack of matter. I think there was also some evidence that at one time, quite late in the contract term, after the route was changed to Wilcox, some one saw several bags of mail matter. I am giving you this evidence, which is all uncontradicted. There is no dispute about it.

On the route from Julian to Colton the evidence is that the mails weighed from thirty to sixty pounds going south from Colton, and that beyond Jacinto they were less than that. Going north they varied from ten to twenty pounds. Sometimes for a certain portion of the route, from Julian to the first station out of Julian, they even weighed as high as thirty pounds. That is the outside limit given them. On the Silverton route Mr. Cornell tells you that there was a pouch weighing not over forty pounds. I have already called your attention to the mail bills on the Ojo Caliente and Parrott City route, and they are confirmed by the evidence of Joseph and Jaramillo. On the Kearney and Kent route Mr. French told you that when they were running once a week perhaps a hundred pounds started out from Kearney, but when they got to Loup City, which was the point to which the expedition was carried, they had only ten or fifteen letters and twelve papers, and most of those they had picked up at a way station where there was service from a railroad coming across the line. Subsequently there was a time when the mail starting from Kearney increased from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pounds, a large portion of which, however, was paper mail. On the Greenhorn and Pueblo route the witnesses put it from eight to ten pounds, and at certain stages from twenty to forty pounds one way, and the other way it was put at from two to eight pounds, respectively. On the Rosita route Mr. Tuttle, who carried it, says that it was most of the time from two to ten pounds, and that was all chiefly left at Greenwood. Sometimes they had three or four letters for Rosita, and occasionally they had a letter or two from Rosita coming back; but that was the general result of it. Mr. Gooch, on the same route, said there were from three to five pounds, of which four or five were letters. Mr. Walters, the postmaster at Greenwood, says that what passed through his office must have been ten or fifteen pounds, with probably four or five letters. I have called your attention to Mr. Marks's testimony. On the Toquerville and Adairville route we are told that the mail started with one hundred pounds, and that from one-half to one-third of it was intended for Kanab, while to Pahreah, the end of the route, there was almost nothing. Going back, the mail was very much smaller, because there were no papers to go east on the route. On the Fort McDermitt and Canyon City route Mr. Brown, the carrier, said that there were from five to ten pounds of mail, and that it was the largest going north, and that there was on one occasion one hundred and fifty pounds, but he said that was dry-goods. Mr. McBean was carrying the military mail, as it was called at the north end, to Camp Harney. When Camp Harney had the companies of soldiers there Mr. McBean said the military mail consisted of only twenty to forty pounds. That is the statement of the mail matter. Now, bear in mind, gentlemen, upon the routes which I have specified the mail matter, both by the mail bills and by the oral evidence before you, was as I have stated, and yet to carry that mail matter the service was run up from $41,000 to four hundred and twenty-odd thousand dollars, and of that amount $217,000 to $220,000, as I recollect it, was for increase of speed. That was done for the purpose, or for the pretended purpose, of carrying this little petty mail over these routes.

Your honor, I am about to take up another subject. Shall we stop for recess now?

The COURT. Yes, we will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, I referred just before recess to Mr. Brady's holy indignation on discovering, early in January, 1880, that there was practically no mail matter passing over the route from Mineral Park to Pioche, and his reference to the mail bills which he said satisfied him of that fact. For the purpose of refreshing your memory as to these mail bills, I ask you to look at this one which I have here and which is marked 63 K. It is a mail bill on route 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, and started from the post-office at Mineral Park on the 3d of December, 1879:

Mail consisting of this bill was dispatched this day at 6 a. m.

WILLIAM M. KRIDER, P. M.

Below:

Post-office at Pioche, Nevada, December 7, 1879. The mail accompanying this mail bill, consisting of this bill only, was received this day at 6.15 o'clock p. m.

CHARLES F. MEYERS,

Postmaster.

Then, gentlemen, Mr. Meyers was guilty of a piece of impertinence which certainly ought to have ended his career in the public service. He actually inserted upon this mail bill something which he was not called upon to do, and which forced itself upon Mr. Brady's attention. He made this little note at the bottom:

This route costs the Post-Office Department over $25,000 per year.

The only trouble was that his $25,000 was not half enough. He ought to have stated that it cost $52,000 a year.

With reference to another class of orders which Mr. Brady made, I call your attention to the admitted evidence that upon the route from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt the service was not put on, according to Mr. Vaile's own admission on the stand, over the whole route until the 1st of January, 1879. Yet prior to that time, the postmasters having officially notified Mr. Brady that there was no service upon the route, and there having been complaints upon the route, and there having been evidence of that fact filed, Mr. Brady, without reference to that evidence and on the ground that there was a demand for more service and for increase of speed, making no mention at all of the fact that the service had not all been put on, and on the theory that the service had commenced on the 1st of July, 1878, Mr. Brady, before any service had been commenced on the southern part of the route, went to work and made an order for increase of trips and increase of expedition upon that route, whereby he took from the Treasury a very large amount of money.

He asked you to believe, and he claimed that that was a provident and an honest exercise of the power that was lodged in him, that when a contractor had shown himself so faithless that he had not performed the service for six months after he was bound under the contract to do it, and when Mr. Brady had failed to exercise his right and failed to perform his duty of declaring that man a failing contractor and forcing the service to be properly performed, Mr. Brady deliberately waited until these parties could get up the petitions and get up all the necessary machinery for the increase. That was the route upon which Miner was making these forged petitions which I showed you. While they were getting up all the machinery for the increase of service, Mr. Brady forbore to declare them failing contractors, and then, when they got the forged petitions well arranged and filed in the department, Mr. Brady came in and condoned all that had passed, and made an order for increase of service on that route. They came in and made an affidavit, which affidavit alleged, in substance, that to perform the then existing service required so many men and so many animals, when there had not been any service performed upon the route at all.

That is one class of orders Mr. Brady made. Mr. Brady made another class of orders, to which I shall call your attention, and that is, orders which were practically impossible to be performed. It might seem at first glance that if an order of that kind was made directing the mail to be carried over a given route in twenty hours when it could not be done in less than thirty hours the Government suffered nothing by it. But entirely apart from the disarrangement of the postal service that might result, you will bear in mind that the evidence before you shows that when a contractor is ordered to perform expedited service, and he fails to perform it, and he comes in with the affidavits from his carriers and certificates from others along the route that he was prevented by unforeseen circumstances, the Government does not fine him for not performing that extraordinary speed. It deducts for the trips that he absolutely misses, but if he makes a trip in four times the number of hours required he gets credit for the trip and gets credit for the expedition, provided he brings in affidavits showing that he was prevented in some way from performing the service, that, in other words, it was not his fault that he did not perform the service. You will bear in mind also another thing: that the contractors were to be paid large sums of money for expediting the service, and if orders were made for time that could not be performed remissions were made, and the result was that the Government paid out all the money and got no service for it. You will bear in mind also another thing: that when Mr. Brady ordered impracticable service it was the subcontractors who were to pay all the fines and penalties. It was the contractors sitting here in Washington who were to receive their profits, no matter how much might be taken away from the subcontractors. It was provided that the subcontractor should pay the fines. I think poor Joseph on one occasion was fined all of his pay. At any rate, if not fined all of it, he was fined so near to it that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey wrote Mr. Joseph an appealing letter, telling him he must look out and not be fined so much, that he would be fined all of his pay and some of the pay of the contractors too; and in that case what would become of the contractors' profit? Mr. Brady made these orders for expedition, and so long as there was not an absolute failure of service, or, in other words, an absolute failure to perform the trips, and so long as the failure to perform trips was not so great as to eat up all the money that was to go to the subcontractors, the contractors, Mr. Brady's friends and pets here, were not affected at all.

They got their large profits, and it was the poor subcontractors that had to suffer. On the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City Mr. Brady ordered the service to be reduced to fifteen hours. They will say to you, gentlemen, with reference to these impracticable orders, as we call them, that in point of fact it was only so many miles an hour. That is true. But it was so many miles an hour of travel night and day. On this Ojo Caliente route the evidence is uncontradicted that it was impossible during a large portion of the time to travel nights, particularly in the winter; that there were no roads and no bridges, and that when the streams rose the carriers were obliged to leave the trails and wind their way around up in the mountains, doing as best they could, and that travel at night was absolutely impossible. Therefore when it comes to be said, as I presume it will be said, that to reduce the time on the Ojo Caliente route to fifty hours was simply to reduce it to three or four miles an hour, you must remember that that means so many miles of travel in each hour of the twenty-four, and that travel at night was impossible upon that route. Mr. Brady made this order for fifty hours, and he sent out schedule after schedule. We put in four of them here, I think. He sent these schedules to the postmasters, asking them to fix a time for arrivals and departures on that route on the basis of fifty hours. Each one of these schedules was returned in succession with the statement of all the postmasters upon the route—there is no question about that—that fifty hours' service was impossible, and that they could not make any schedules better and shorter than the schedules they did make, which provided for five days, I think, on an average. Finally, Mr. Trew, the postmaster, said that so many of those schedules were sent in that way, which they kept replying to in the same form, that as they still persisted in coming he threw them in the waste-basket and paid no attention to them. Mr. Brady finally got around that action of his postmasters by misconstruing one of their schedules providing that the mail should leave at a certain time on a certain day and arrive at a certain other day. The schedule provided that the mail should leave on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday and arrive on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, and he took the Thursday as being fitted for the arrival of the mail departing on Wednesday, when the postmasters obviously intended it under the schedule for the departure of the mail on the preceding Monday, and Brady therefore assumed that he had got the fifty-hour schedule, or a schedule somewhere in that neighborhood, and let it go at that. In fact the service never was performed in fifty hours. The evidence about that is conclusive. There were fines imposed upon the subcontractors until they were in succession fined out of existence, and poor Jaramillo finally paid $500 to be released from his obligations under his contract, and then he released also all claims on the United States. Having gotten him to do that these gentlemen then turned around and promptly got a remission of some twelve or fifteen hundred dollars of the fines which had been imposed upon poor Jaramillo, and inasmuch as he had not only paid $500 to be released from their claims, but had also released all claims upon the United States, they put that twelve or fifteen hundred dollars into their own pockets. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek Mr. Peck, in his application for remission, states that the time to which Mr. Brady reduced the service was impracticable and impossible, and upon that statement asked and received a remission. Upon the route from Silverton to Parrott City I have already called your attention to the fact that the reduction to fifteen hours was certified by everybody to be an impossible time in which to perform the service in the winter. On the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls Mr.

Vaile himself tells you that the order reducing the time to ten hours, I think it was, was simply for an impracticable service, and that it could not be done; that the route was seventy miles long, and there were ten offices on the route, and at each office the postmaster was entitled to detain the mail seven minutes. Yet with that condition of things you remember that is the route on which Mr. Brady preferred the dead dog to the live animal. He preferred Mr. Kidder who had gone out of office, and would not interfere with the arrangement he had made, to Judge Bennett, who was in office, although all the postmasters represented the schedule as impracticable. On the Bismarck and Tongue River route Mr. Lounsberry, the postmaster, certainly not in our interest, in his mail bills which are in evidence here, and in his monthly report for January, 1880, on page 2888 of the record, says that the time is impracticable, and that no man could perform the service in that time over that route. The defendants came to the stand and said, "Yes, we were fined a great many thousand dollars on that route." When we came to examine into the matter we found this condition of things: they were fined on that route during the administration of Mr. Brady but $13,000. All the other fines imposed were imposed after Mr. Brady was turned out of office. I think of the $13,000 there was remitted subsequently every dollar for loss of time. Of course it was impossible to remit for loss of trips. That Mr. Brady could not do without a flagrant and open violation of the custom of the department. That would have been an action that he did not dare to take.

Mr. HENKLE. I do not want to interrupt you, but it may be that I will not argue the case at all. I want to call your attention to a statement you have just made to the jury, that Mr. Lounsberry testified that this was an impossible schedule.

Mr. BLISS. I said that in Mr. Lounsberry's monthly report, on page 2888, he said so. You will find it there.

Mr. HENKLE. Lounsberry on the stand said that there were certain times when it was impossible to perform it on that schedule.

Mr. WILSON. At the same time that the railroads could not run their trains.

Mr. HENKLE. At the same time that the railroads could not run their trains. That was all that he said.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading:]

No person can perform this service in winter time on schedule time—

That is a general statement—and during much of last month it would have been impossible for man or beast to travel.

He says distinctly that no person could perform this service in the winter time on schedule time. He does say that no man could perform it in such weather as they had. He then goes on and says that during much of the weather they have had it was impossible for man or beast to travel. The first statement is—and I submit that it is borne out by the evidence—that no man could perform the schedule time on that route in winter.

Mr. HENKLE. I only want it stated fairly.

The COURT. What does he call winter?

Mr. BLISS. I do not know.

Mr. HENKLE. He said on the stand that at the same time this route could not be performed on that schedule the railroads could not make their trips.

Mr. BLISS. Where does he say that?

The COURT. Something was said about certain intervals between the 1st of December and the 1st of April.

Mr. BLISS. If you want what Mr. Lounsberry said I will give it to you :

Q. Did you recommend the department to increase the number of trips on that route?—A. I did.

Q. Did you recommend the department to expedite the time?—A. I did.

* * * * *

Q. You made those recommendations to the department in good faith and for what you considered to be the best interests of the Government and the public service?—

A. I did ; giving all matters all the consideration that I would give now, excepting as to time. Perhaps I might not have recommended that time, in view of the facts which followed but so far as the service was concerned I certainly should make the same recommendation now under the same circumstances.

Q. You say, in view of the facts which followed, you might not have recommended the same time that you then recommended. Will you explain to the jury what you mean by that?—A. I found subsequently that it was absolutely impossible to carry the mail in winter time on the time recommended.

The winter time generally ; not particularly.

I do not think any power under heaven could have put that mail through in sixty-five hours during the winter, and therefore I would not recommend that it be done.

That is on page 2194.

Mr. MERRICK. And on page 2195 is the same.

Mr. WILSON. That was after he had recommended that service.

Mr. BLISS. Precisely ; but the point I make, may it please the court and you, gentlemen of the jury, is this : that Mr. Brady ordered an impossible time, and this postmaster told him in his monthly report that he had ordered an impossible time, and yet Mr. Brady did not change the time. Mr. Brady proceeded to leave the time just as it was and to remit to these contractors all the fines imposed upon them for not making the impossible time, and therefore continued to pay out of the Treasury for service not rendered, because the time was not made. He did that, gentlemen, and yet he wants you to believe that that was the practice of an honorable and honest Second Assistant Postmaster-General. If he was misled in the first instance by Mr. Lounsberry, we say he ought not to have been when the notice came to him. It was his business to have taken the back track, and not certainly to have gone on and remitted for all the lost time which they made.

But, gentlemen, leaving those matters of detail, we say that even assuming that Mr. Brady was deceived in making the orders that he did make, so far as being deceived in increasing the trips and deceived in decreasing the time, that in his orders he allowed extravagant and illegal amounts. Assume that the affidavits were true. Assume, if you choose, that everything that appears upon the papers was true and believed by him to be true. We still say, nevertheless, that his action was unjustifiable. You will bear in mind that under the statute he could legally allow nothing extra for expedition unless the number of men and carriers was increased. You will bear in mind that if the number of men and carriers was increased the statute then gave him a limit beyond which he must not go, to wit, the increased number of men and carriers. He could allow the proportion which the increased number of horses and carriers bore to the original number of horses and carriers. What was the fact ? On the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn he reduced the time from sixteen hours to seven hours, and he allowed at that time $2,630.40. He did it on the affidavit of Miner that one man and one animal were necessary to carry the mail three times a week on the then schedule, and that on a schedule of seven hours the number was two men and four animals. Neither one of these branches of the affidavit was true. They were both false, and in both cases the falsity was against the Government. Withers, Sears, Farrish, McDaniel, and Higgason, all of them, who were successively carriers upon that route, said that, in point of fact, on the original schedule one man and two horses were used at that time, and that one man and two horses continued to be used under the reduced schedule; and not only that, but the same horses, and at various times the identically same man, continued to perform the service. Therefore there was no increase of men and carriers upon that route whatever. Precisely the same number of men and horses were used before the increase as after. That, you will see, was a direct illegality, because the statute says :

No extra allowance shall be made for increase of expedition in carrying the mail, unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary.

There is not any dispute about this, gentlemen. There is not a contradictory witness from beginning to end upon this subject. Withers, Sears, Farrish, McDaniel, and Higgason, all of them carriers successively during the contract term on this route, swore to those facts. Yet Mr. Brady paid out on the route for the expedition, on the theory that the affidavit was true, $2,630.40. In passing, let me say, gentlemen, that the pretense rendering expedition necessary upon this route was only because of a paper increase of twelve miles. I admit that on account of this addition it was fairly within the terms of the contract to pay the contractor for the extra distance; but it did not necessarily involve an increase of four hours in the time. If that increase of four hours of time had not been made there would have been no pretense or excuse for the expedition. On the route from Toquerville to Adairville the affidavit did not conform to the regulations. Very many of these affidavits did not conform to the regulations. This is one of the things which we ask you to bear in mind as showing what practice prevailed during the carnival of corruption that existed in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's office under Mr. Brady, and how completely the affidavits that were presented failed to conform even to Mr. Brady's own regulations. The regulation is :

When it becomes necessary to increase the speed on any route the contractor will be required to state under oath the number of horses and men required to perform the service according to the contract schedule.

You will bear in mind that the contract schedule is for so many trips, leaving at such a time and arriving at such a time. Therefore the contract schedule fixes both the number of trips and the hours. The affidavits are very frequently like this on the Toquerville and Adairville route :

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route 41119, seven times a week, on the present schedule, &c.

It never was seven times a week on the long schedule. There is no pretense of that. The regulation looks to the affidavit giving one fact, to wit, the number of men and carriers that are used on the existing schedule with the existing number of trips. Now, on the Toquerville and Adairville route, as I recollect it, at that time there were only three trips being made. This affidavit says that the number of men and animals necessary on the long schedule and seven trips a week is so many, and the number necessary on the short schedule, seven trips a week, is so many. You will see there, gentlemen, at once, that the affidavit does not comply with the regulation. That regulation, Mr. Chandler told you, was binding upon the Postmaster General and the Second Assistant

Postmaster-General—as binding as the law. In differing from the regulation it defeated the whole object, or the whole pretended object, of the regulation because it became an affidavit which in both its branches was a mere matter of opinion. On its face it purported to be in that way. It never had been run seven times a week at that time. Therefore to say that so many men and horses were necessary for a seven-times-a-week service on the long schedule was a statement of the contractor's opinion, and to say that so many men and horses would be required on the short schedule was a statement of the contractor's opinion. That is one of the affidavits in pretended conformity to the regulation, to which it did not conform at all. When you come to look at it in connection with the statute which says not what is sworn to but what is the fact shall govern, the question is how many men and horses are necessary on the existing schedule and how many men and horses will be necessary in fact on the proposed rate of speed and the proposed schedule. Therefore, gentlemen, you will see that as to these affidavits there is a difficulty in making any comparison to show their falsity with absolute accuracy; but I think I can do something in that direction. On this route from Toquerville to Adairville, if we should assume that this affidavit was intended to be in compliance with the regulations, and therefore to give the number of men and horses that were used on the long schedule on three trips a week, and the number of men and horses that would be used on the short schedule and seven trips a week, we would find this condition of affairs: The original price having been $1,168 for one trip there was allowed for expedition by Mr. Brady $12,718.22. Taking the facts as they were, the oath states that the number of men and horses required on the present schedule is three men and six horses, making nine. In point of fact the uncontradicted evidence is that for three trips, assuming the affidavit to apply to three trips, though it appears on its face to apply to seven, the existing number of men and horses was four and ten, making fourteen; having sworn that for seven trips it only required nine, yet in point of fact for two trips it required fourteen. Now, bear in mind, gentlemen, what I called to your attention yesterday and again this morning—the result of even a slight difference, or rather a slight misstatement; an understatement of the number of men and horses actually required. Here was an understatement of at least five. They stated it as nine when it really took fourteen. Then they said that for seven trips on the short schedule it would take twenty-three men and animals. As to that the evidence is that that portion of the affidavit is about right. It took, in fact, seven men and fifteen animals, making twenty-two, according to the uncontradicted evidence before you. That being so we arrive at the result which I will give you. I have the details here, but I will not weary you with them. The result is this: Judging by the affidavit, Mr. Brady allowed $12,718.22 a year. Judging by the fact, he could not have allowed over $5,256 a year. There was over $7,200 of clear stealing on the difference between the affidavit made by Peck, or purporting to be made by Peck, and the real fact as it was, the real fact as Brady might have found it out from the men who were performing the service, and as he might have found it out by communication with his own postmasters, whom he despised. On the route from Trinidad to Madison John W. Dorsey as subcontractor, which he was not, made the oath. He said it would take for three trips in sixteen hours' time one man and four horses, and for three trips in twelve hours' time—you see this affidavit is a little different in form, but I will not stop to get it out—five men and seven horses. According to the evidence we find this condition of things: De Busk says that Mr. Duncan, who was the first man who drove under the contract, used three men and three horses where Dorsey says there were five men and horses. Dorsey made the factor five instead of six, and understated it to that extent. De Busk says he used six. Burgman put the figures at seven. The result is, giving Mr. Brady and the contractors the most liberal allowance possible, that we find this condition of things: There was allowed by Brady for expedition upon that route $2,758.05. There ought not to have been allowed over $255.08. On the Ojo Caliente route the affidavit is for three trips on the present schedule, but when it was made there was only one trip on that schedule, so that the affidavit does not comply with the regulations. But taking it as it is and comparing it with the facts in the case, we find that Mr. Brady allowed $8,457.84 for expedition, and yet, giving him the benefit of the most liberal allowances made in his favor by any of the witnesses, he could not have allowed on the actual facts over $3,233.68, being a difference of something over $5,200. On the Redding and Alturas route we find things pretty thoroughly mixed. The oath says "on the present schedule," without specifying the number of trips. The number of trips at that time was three and the hours one hundred and eight. Assuming the oath to refer to that, we find that the oath gives three men and eight animals as necessary on the present schedule, a total of eleven, and says that to reduce it to seventy-two hours it would require six men and eighteen animals, making twenty-four. If those figures were correct then the allowance for expedition might have been $21,230.19; but upon this jacket we find the figuring to be that the allowance for expedition could have been $10,419.12, understating the allowance that might have been made for expedition. But it goes on and immediately states that the allowance for three trips could have been $19,401.12, when in point of fact the allowance that could have been made for the trips could not have exceeded about $17,000. It is all mixed up in the statement, therefore it is naturally mixed up in the order which Mr. Brady made. Mr. Brady there committed another illegality. The order is:

■ Increase the service three trips per week and reduce the running time from 108 hours to 72 hours, allowing contractor $26,946 per annum additional, being less than pro rata, but in accordance with his written agreement, from December 16, 1878.

That is an allowance of $26,900 for a reduction of twenty-six hours and for an addition of three trips, and yet the law says:

Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service—and when any such additional service is ordered the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered upon the books of the department.

That is to say, shall not be in excess of pro rata—

Gentlemen, there is not any escape from it. If $26,946 is claimed to be the amount for the increase of service, then it is in excess of the proportion allowed by the statute. If it is not solely for increase of service, as it clearly is not, but is for a combination of trips and expedition, then the order does not comply with the branch of the statute which directs that the amount to be allowed shall be specified in the order. There is no possibility of escaping from that dilemma. The order is an illegal order on its face in one form or the other. I have not been able to find an arithmetician who was able to work the problem out so as to tell me just how much of that sum belongs to service and how much belongs to expedition. The best calculation that I have been able to make upon the subject is, that taking the oath as true, which obviously is absurdly false, there might have been allowed for expedition $29,230.18; but if you take the facts as they were, the number of men and horses actually used and the number of men and horses which after the order was made were required to be used, there could not have been allowed over $5,826, where there might have been allowed $21,230.18 under the oath. Under any circumstances, treating as coming into the $26,900 all the pro rata that could come for trips, his order, instead of being for less than pro rata, is beyond all question an order greatly in excess of pro rata. Under any circumstances it is an illegal order in not stating the amount allowed for increase of service. If it is claimed that the $26,000 is the amount allowed for increase of service then it is an illegal order, because the amount is beyond the amount which the statute permits. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek the oath is a little different in form apparently, and yet we may get something from it, bearing in mind that although there was only one trip being then performed, it is an oath which was framed on the idea of three trips apparently. On the oath Mr. Brady allowed $14,486.10 as the amount for expedition. Taking the undisputed fact as to horses and carriers as they were before and after expedition he could not legally have allowed more than $2,991.23. On the route from The Dalles to Baker City the oath speaks of the number necessary without specifying the trips. There was allowed upon that oath by Mr. Brady $18,648 for expedition, and yet, taking the most favorable evidence that can be got on that subject in any manner, we find that there could not be legally allowed over $4,144. I have the details of the calculations, but probably they would find no lodgment in your minds and I will not therefore read them. I simply say that I have taken the oaths and had them tested each way, and I find that the amounts upon all the routes that I have mentioned agree with the amounts which the oaths purport on Brady's jacket to call for. Then I have taken the evidence in the case. I have taken the statement of the man who gave the lowest number of men and horses on the existing schedule, and the man who gave the highest number of men and horses on the proposed schedule, so that in both cases I have counted against the Government, and the results to which I have been led are those that I am giving you. On the route from Julian to Colton the oath is defective in the same manner. It speaks of three trips on the present schedule when in point of fact only one was being made. Mr. Brady could, under the oath, have given for expedition $7,128. He gave $7,128. Although the oath differed in the details the error was on each side, and therefore it agreed with the facts in its results. On the route from Silverton to Parrott City Mr. Brady allowed $10,549.51. The oath is there made for seven trips on the present schedule, but seven trips were not then being performed. That is another case of the oath not conforming to the regulations or the statute. Under the oath Brady could have allowed $10,549.51 and he did allow it; yet under the facts he could only have allowed $4,576.74, making a difference there of about $6,000. On the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route he could have given, under the oath, $3,680, and he gave it; under the facts he could have given only $374.13, making a difference there of some $3,200. I will not trouble you by going through and making an analysis of the amounts that might on other routes have been given under the oaths and under the facts. I simply give you those as specimens, and I say to you that they show beyond dispute that there was gross violation of the law upon Mr. Brady's part uniformly and constantly, and that the violation in every case was in favor of the contractor. You never find a mistake against a contractor. You never find a mistake in favor of the Government. It is all the other way.

But, gentlemen, Mr. Brady was not content with extravagance and illegality as exhibited in this form. He showed it in other forms. On the route from Toquerville to Adairville, on the 19th of June, 1879, the appointment office reported that the terminal office of Adairville had been discontinued. John W. Dorsey was out there and made a subcontract about that time, and he made it based upon the idea that there would be a discontinuance of Adairville, and that the route would terminate at Pahreah, and in that way ten or twelve miles of the route would be cut off. He made his subcontract upon that basis, and in one of his letters to Johnson, the subcontractor, he refers to that fact. On the 19th of June, 1879, twelve miles were in fact cut off the end of the route. On the 8th of July, twenty days afterwards, Mr. Brady made an order for expedition, and he made that order for expedition over the entire route. In other words, the contractor was to be paid for an increase of speed over the twelve miles of the route between Pahreah and Adairville which had been abolished twenty days previously, and of which notice had been given. He made that order on the 8th of July. The actual order in the Second Assistant's office cutting off those twelve miles was not made until the 14th of July, six days after Mr. Brady's order for expedition, though they had had notice twenty days previously of the cutting off of that distance. But the order for expedition did not take effect until the 1st of August. The order taking off Adairville took effect at the same time, though made on the 14th of July. Yet Mr. Brady paid on the order for expedition the month's extra pay reckoned upon the sum to be allowed for expedition after the 1st of August, when there was no possibility of going over that portion of the route in that way, and not upon the amount that was actually being paid at the time when the office was abolished. The result, gentlemen, was this: that the month's extra pay was reckoned on $20,894 instead of on $3,504. It was the difference between dividing $20,894 by twelve and dividing $3,500 by twelve. It was a small steal, but it was a steal. I have told you how Raton was put on the route from Trinidad to Madison. I am not going over the story again to tell you how unnecessary it was. It was declared that Raton added twenty-three miles, although the schedule of distances from their own postmasters showed it only added sixteen miles. The route was let as forty-five miles and at thirteen hours, and they added twenty-three miles, which brought it up to sixty-eight miles. Then there came in expedition, and the result was that of the amount allowed for expedition $900 was absolutely for the alleged increase of distance for Raton, which did not exist to the extent named. I ought to say, because I shall probably be followed by gentlemen who will be accurate with regard to these details, that one of the orders connected with Raton is an order not made by Brady, but an order made by French. It is an intermediate order, but Mr. Brady adopts whatever may have been in French's order by including it in his order for expedition.

In the same way, on the route from Silverton to Parrott City an allowance is made for ten miles' extra distance for Animas City, when in point of fact the schedules in the department at that time showed that Animas City was a post-office receiving its letters upon that route, and the carriers always went by Animas. That carried the total distance up to sixty-five miles.

I have not said anything, gentlemen, as to the construction of the act of April 7, 1880, because I perceived that in my absence, during Mr. Ker's remarks, it was the subject of some discussion between counsel and the court. All that I desire to call your attention to was this: that after that act was passed large increases were made on the Ojo Caliente route, as appears by 11 F; on The Dalles route, as appears by 19 L; on the Canyon City route, as appears by 19 H; and on the Redding route, as appears by 28 G. There were also two increases upon the White River route, one upon the Mineral Park route, and one upon the Tres Alamos and Clifton. All of which were in fact, and apparently in form, violations of that law.

Mr. WILSON. Will you allow me to interrupt you?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to know whether in these cases, to which you are now referring, you claim that there was increase of trips with expedition.

Mr. BLISS. I am going on to speak about that. As I said, they were in fact, if not in form, violations of the law. The orders describe them as increases, and yet the statute says, as I recollect—perhaps Mr. Ker can give me the precise language of that statute of April 7, 1880—it says in fact that it shall not exceed 50 per cent. of the contract price, I think.

The COURT. The letting.

Mr. MERRICK. The original letting.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading:]

Not exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

Mr. WILSON. What page?

Mr. BLISS. Richardson's Supplement, page 514.

Take for instance, if you choose, the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt. There is an order made upon the 16th of July, 1880; of course after the passage of that statute. It is an order in form for an increase of trips, and it says that the trips shall be increased four, and that there shall be allowed for the four trips $28,666.66. Now, for four trips, of course, as they cannot allow beyond pro rata, that must be allowing over $7,100 per trip for those four trips. And yet the original contract price for one trip was $2,888. They allowed, in fact, for an increase of trips at the rate of over $7,100 when the original contract price was only $2,888. And yet they urge here that that is not a violation of the law which says that you shall not allow for extra expedition more than 50 per centum of the price at the original letting. They claim that it is not an allowance for expedition, because they describe it as an increase of trips. If that were the correct construction I do not see why they might not upon a given day make an increase of 50 per cent. on expedition, keeping themselves within that statute, and then at a later period on the same day increase the trips, and in that way claim that by cutting that cherry in two and describing it as expedition they are within the law. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to spend any time in arguing that with you. I simply desire to call your attention to the fact that in that way, under the pretense of increases of trips, there were taken from the Treasury by Mr. Brady in violation of the spirit of the law, beyond all question, the following sums:

On the Ojo Caliente route, by an order made in February, 1881, he took for four trips $17,910. That, of course, is at the rate of somewhere about $4,500 per trip. And yet the original contract letting per trip was only $2,745.

On the route from The Dalles to Baker City, Mr. Brady, by an order made on the 16th of July, 1880, added one trip and took from the Treasury $10,360. And yet on the contract letting one trip was only $4,144.

I call your attention to the fact that on the route from Redding to Alturas, on February 11, 1881, Mr. Brady took from the Treasury for increase of one trip $5,988. And yet $5,988 was the precise sum which, under the contract letting, was payable for two trips.

On the route from Rawlins to White River, by an order made on the 8th of March, 1881, which Mr. Brady did not revoke when Mr. James told him to, he took from the Treasury, under pretense of four trips, $18,275, amounting to somewhere about $4,500 a trip. And yet the original contract price per trip was $1,700. And, as we say, under the construction of that law, beyond all question he could take only $850 for expedition, and in point of fact he allowed $18,275.

On the route from Mineral Park to Pioche there is a little whipping of the devil around the stump. Brady, on the 28th of January, corrects his order of the 22d of January. On the 22d of January he cut off expedition and all extra trips over and above the contract price. On the 28th of January he allows for a reduction to sixty hours and for six trips a week $29,733.33. There was no expedition. At that moment, when he made that order, there was no expedition, no increase of trips. And yet he goes to work and makes an allowance—no matter what the form of the order is, it is in effect an allowance—for $29,733.33, when he could have allowed but $1,450. That order is in the form of rescinding the order that he had made on the 22d of January, and then going on and making another order. It is not rescinding part of the order and leaving the rest to stand, but it is absolutely rescinding that order and making a new one. It therefore stands as a new one.

On the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton, on the 11th of February, 1881, Brady made an order for increase, four trips, allowing $15,950.62, and yet the original contract letting for one trip was only $1,568. Now, whether the law is to be evaded in that way, whether you can get around it by simply first expediting the service and running it up above ten or fifteen times the amount of the original contract letting by saying that you have paid nothing for expedition but you have paid it for increase of trips, is a question of law which I do not propose here and now to argue. I call your attention to it merely in this point of view: that, no matter in what way you look at it, it was in fact either a violation of the law, or it was a violation of the absolute and obvious intention of the legislators in that respect. What they intended was to put a stop to these extravagant increases, and they supposed they had done it by the language they had used. I doubt whether any language could have stopped Mr. Brady.

I call your attention, on the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, to another instance of Mr. Brady's extravagance, even though it was in little matters. When the route terminated at Saint Charles and before it was extended to Pueblo, the route over that additional twelve miles was being carried by one E. M. Ames, under a temporary contract made with the postmaster at Pueblo, at the rate of $275 a year, and he gave notice to Mr. Brady, by a paper which we produced here, that he was carrying it at that rate. He also gave notice of an offer to continue to carry it at that rate. Now, Mr. Miner says that Mr. Ames was his carrier, and not only his carrier but he was his nephew, and that he had authority from him to sign his name; and it appears in a certain case that Mr. Miner does sign his name to withdraw his subcontract. There was also a subcontract with Ames, which subcontract contained a provision that he was to perform the service over the whole route for the sum of five hundred and odd dollars, and that if it was extended to Pueblo he was to perform the additional service for some $60 or $70 more, as I recollect. That subcontract was on file, placed there, Mr. Miner says, to cut out some post-office drafts. However that may be, it was there, and showed those two facts, showed the temporary contract that Mr. Ames was performing, and Ames's offer shows that he was willing to perform the service for the whole term for something less than $100. And yet, when they extend, the route from Saint Charles to Pueblo, Mr. Brady makes an order allowing—there is allowed for that extension $328.80. I said Mr. Brady allowed, and then I stopped, because I am not positively certain but that order was made by Mr. French, as various small ones were. But having been put up in that way to $328.80, when it came to expedition the result was that that $328.80 was multiplied under Brady's order, and it figured, in connection with the whole thing, at something over $1,000 as applicable to that portion of expedition. Yet that service, on the subcontract on file, could have been obtained for $100. Three hundred and twenty-eight dollars and eighty cents was paid for it.

On the route from Kearney to Kent, I think it was, that Fitzalon was added on the 3d of May, 1878. September 24, following, an order was made first giving fifteen miles more of distance and allowing therefor $112.42. We say that the uncontradicted evidence is that Fitzalon involved no increase of distance. They went through Fitzalon before; they went through Fitzalon afterwards. It is right to say that the other side have mixed this up in connection with the Cedarville business. But however that may be, they went through Fitzalon before the order was made, and they went through Fitzalon after the order was made, and they went through it in precisely the same way. When it came to expedition the result was that the addition of the fictitious fifteen miles cost the Government $664.48, when expedition came to be applied over that distance.

Another form of illegality in connection with these things is in making orders retroactive. The statute, as you remember, says:

No compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

It is a statute providing for increase of compensation, for increased service. Compensation for additional service shall not be in excess of a certain sum, and—

No compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

Now, Fitzalon having been put on this route on the 3d of May, 1878, Mr. Brady on the 24th of September, 1878, ordered that $112.24 should be allowed for it as from the previous 1st of July. He did not need to go back any farther, because the 1st of July was when his pets, these present contractors, commenced the service. Remember that Fitzalon was on the route before this contract commenced, and yet there having been no specification in there of allowing anything more for it, for the reason that there was no reason for allowing anything more, because it was directly on the route, on the 24th of September, 1878, as I say, Mr. Brady ordered that $112.24 should be allowed for it, and made it retroactive back to the 1st of July.

On the Raton route, Raton was put on the route April 24, 1879. And yet by order it was paid for from the 1st of July, 1878.

Pagosa, so far as we can find, was never in any form placed upon the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City. There were two or three roads there running at different distances over the mountains, and differently available at different seasons of the year. The route by Pagosa was, if not the longest, certainly not the shortest. There never had been any order putting it on. And yet the order there is made increasing the allowance for Pagosa, and antedated, I think, nearly a year; that is my recollection. The order for the extra allowance was given on the 24th of April, 1879, to commence on the 1st of July, 1878. There never was any formal order, apparently, putting Pagosa on the route. We had the clerk here with the route-book containing all the orders, and that did not appear. Pagosa had, however, been recognized in some of the distance circulars as apparently on the route. The distance circulars give us the distance by Pagosa, and give us the distance the other way, and the contractor had during a portion of that time, beyond all question, gone by Pagosa. At the same time there had been no order putting it on the route and no allowance of money for it. And yet on the 24th of April, 1879, Mr. Brady ordered $190.62 a year to be added to it as from the 1st of July, 1878, notwithstanding the statute stated that—

No compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

And this order making that extra allowance for Pagosa is made two or three days before Mr. Brady makes another order granting expedition upon that route. So that he makes the order retroact about ten months, and just at the time he is fixing a nice little deal to give them expedition, and that extra fifteen miles in there makes a very pretty record in counting up the money.

Then, gentlemen, on that same route, you remember that on the 26th of February, 1881, Mr. Brady ordered four trips over the whole route at a cost of $17,910.72, and he directed it to antedate one month and eleven days over the whole route.

Mr. WILSON. What route is that?

Mr. BLISS. That is the Ojo Caliente route. He did that upon petitions which asked only for an increase of trips over fifty-nine miles of the two hundred and seventy-five miles of the route. I think it is somewhere about two hundred and seventy-five miles. By that order he paid out from the Treasury $2,011.46 illegally, beyond all question. Of that amount the subcontractor, the man who was doing the service, got only a little more than half and these contractors got the other half for doing nothing.

Now, that particular order, gentlemen, is attempted to be excused by a telegraphic dispatch, which is upon page 4346 of the record, and which Mr. Brady sent to Mr. Sanderson, who was then apparently performing the service under some subcontract with the contract or upon the route. But that dispatch read thus:

[By Western Union Tel. Company.]

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1881.

To J. L. SANDERSON,
936 Chouteau avenue, Saint Louis, Missouri:

You are hereby authorized to begin daily service from Chama to the nearest point on the Ojo Caliente route, 25 miles, and increase service to daily on Ojo Caliente route from the junction made to Animas City, from the 15th instant.

THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Charge P. O. D.—T. J. B.

That dispatch authorized them to make daily service over a new route until they struck this route, and then to make daily service from the point where they struck this route until they got to Animas City. And without stopping to show you the map, the fact about it is that the distance from where they struck Animas City is something less than sixty miles. Therefore, that telegraphic order can only be reckoned as authority for an increase of trips over those sixty miles, and it cannot be, by any pretense whatever, regarded as authority for the increase over the balance of the route, some one hundred and sixty miles more.

That order, let me say, is not only an order made in violation of the spirit of the act of April 7, 1880, but it is an order for increase of trips from Ojo Caliente, when I have already shown you that for fifteen miles between Ojo Caliente and the railroad at this end there was at that time no connection except once a week.

Perhaps here, gentlemen, it is just as well to call your attention to one or two figures that I have. Mr. Brady made in all, for increase of trips, twenty-six orders that are in evidence in this case. All of them allow pro rata. He made orders for expedition which, on their face, allow pro rata; that is to say, they say on their face they are pro rata, and the pro rata is governed by the affidavits. If he had made orders not by the affidavits but by the facts, every one of his orders for expedition but one would have been in excess of pro rata. He made ten orders for trips which included expedition because there had been previously expedition ordered, and therefore the amount for that expedition went into the aggregate, which he then multiplied by additional trips. On three trips it appears on the papers that for expedition he claims to have allowed less than pro rata. Those are Tongue River, Dalles, and Julian.

As to the Tongue River order he claims to have allowed for expedition less than the pro rata amount, basing it upon Miner's absurd affidavit of one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses. If he had placed it upon Miner's other affidavit, which other affidavit was not correct, but at any rate very much less, his order for expedition would have been in excess of pro rata.

On the route from Julian to Colton he claims to have allowed less than pro rata. Judged by the facts he allowed just pro rata.

And on the route from The Dalles to Baker City he claims to have allowed less than pro rata, when, judged by the facts, he allowed greatly more than pro rata, something like three times pro rata.

There are three orders which violate the statute to which I have directly called your attention, in not specifying the amount allowed for trips. They are combined. The order includes expedition and trips, and notwithstanding that the statute says expressly that the amount allowed for additional service shall be expressed in the order, it is not so expressed. Those three routes are from Mineral Park to Pioche, Canyon City to Fort McDermitt, and Redding to Alturas, and in each one of those he says he allowed less than pro rata. As near as I can make it, on the route from Redding to Alturas he allowed greatly more than pro rata, while on the Mineral Park to Pioche and Canyon City to Fort McDermitt he did allow something less than pro rata, but that is dependent upon the question whether I am accurately calculating the division as between trips and expedition according to the way that he reckoned it.

I will pass briefly over this, for I am taking more time than I anticipated.

There is other evidence that Mr. Brady had before him that he was allowing, when he made this allowance for expedition, greatly more than the law required and more than he was justified in allowing, because it was greatly more than the Government needed to have paid. That evidence we find in part from the papers on file in the department and in part from the papers in evidence here. In many cases it appears from the subcontracts themselves, the subcontracts made in accordance with the subcontract law, many of them being on file in the department. There was a direct provision in them that the man who was to perform the service was to get very much less than the amount that the Government was to allow. Sometimes it is put in as a percentage; he was to get only a percentage of the amount to be allowed. That is the case in the subcontract upon the Kearney and Kent route; true also in regard to the subcontract upon the Rawlins and White River route; true also upon the Redding and Alturas route. In the Redding and Alturas route the amount put in to be allowed is not declared to be a percentage. In the others it was. But on that route the provision in the subcontract is that the subcontractor was to be allowed $4,000 in gross, provided expedition was made to a certain amount. That showed that the parties who were performing the service, and who were to perform the service, were to get only $4,000 in case of expedition. And yet in the face of that provision in the subcontract on file, Mr. Brady allowed for expedition and trips together, putting it into one order, $26,946. Under the subcontract law, when a subcontract was on file, Mr. Brady was compelled, when he made an order for expedition, to provide that so much should go to the contractor and so much to the subcontractor, the man who was performing the service. But bear in mind, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady was to allow from the Treasury only the amount necessary to procure the service to be fairly performed. Yet on the Ojo Caliente route Brady, in an order dated 26th of February, 1881, directs that $17,910.72, shall be paid from the Treasury for increase, and he provides in the same order that the man who is to do the work shall get only $1,066.64 for it.

They tell you that he had no hold on the subcontractors, and that he had a hold on the contractors. But you must bear in mind that, while that is true in one sense, the subcontractor was willing to perform the service and subject himself to all fines and deductions. The contractor was to have no fines and deductions. It would have been very easy for Mr Brady to say to the contractor, if he had been an honest and faithful officer, not in collusion with them: "I have here on my files the evidence that that service can be performed for $10,000. I cannot give you $18,000; I will give you $10,000; or if you choose, I will give you $12,000, and if you do not like that throw up your contract." But no contract was thrown up. Mr. Brady did not act in that way. He gave these men up to the very outside of their own affidavits, which stated the amount they claimed, and then he gave a beggarly fraction of it to the man who was actually performing the service.

Under the same circumstances, on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, Brady put into his order that the Treasury was to pay $14,486.10 to the contractor, and yet the man who performed the service was to get but $6,971.02 for it.

On the Redding and Alturas route Mr. Brady paid from the Treasury $5,098 to the contractor, and the subcontractor was to get only $2,000.

I have called your attention to the fact that on the Greenhorn route Mr. Ames was the subcontractor, and that he was getting $548. But if it was extended to Pueblo he was to have $612, or an addition of only $64. When Mr. Brady extended it to Pueblo he added $328.80.

These are subcontracts, gentlemen, that are on file, where Brady's order had to direct this division between the contractor and subcontractor, and where he cannot plead that he knew nothing of the facts. But the others not on file, which we put in evidence, show precisely the same condition of things.

It appears, for instance, on the Toquerville route—and there is something perhaps worthy of note in that connection—that Mr. Johnson was to have $1,000 additional if the route was increased to four miles and upwards. The contract gave him for one trip $1,127; for three trips $3,381; for six trips $6,381; for seven trips $7,444. And if the speed was increased he was to get $1,000.

That contract was so satisfactory to Mr. John W. Dorsey that he burst out into correspondence and wrote back to Mr. Johnson that the contract “brought it nearer to pro rata than any I have made since I left home.” And yet under that contract Brady made an order under which John W. Dorsey & Co. got $19,311.33, while Johnson, the subcontractor, got only $8,444; and he did all the service, ran all the risks of the fines and deductions, and he paid all the fines and deductions.

On the Canyon City route in the same manner the service was performed for $10,000. Brady paid for it $50,166.66, and Vaile says that there was $20,000 profit. The subcontractors got $10,000. Brady paid $50,166.66. That left $40,000, and of that $40,000 Mr. Vaile says there was $20,000 of profit. Where did the odd $20,000 go? Does it not come pretty nearly to Mr. Walsh’s 30 per cent.?

At another time upon that route McBean and Brown were together paid $11,000 for a service for which Brady was paying $21,500.

On the White River route Foote & Dalton were paid $10,000 for what Brady paid $13,706.25.

On the Ojo Caliente route Jaramillo was paid $6,200 for what Brady paid $13,434.04.

Joseph, on the same route, at an earlier stage, was paid $2,360 for one trip, $3,800 for two trips, and $5,300 for three trips. Brady was then paying $5,252.42, and he then added enough to it to make it up to $14,710.24, of which Mr. Joseph got only $6,252.42. And when Mr. Joseph remonstrated upon the subject there came a letter from Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey which is worth reading. Bear in mind that $14,710.24 was being paid, and Mr. Joseph was getting only $6,252.42. He had apparently written to Mr. S. W. Dorsey and at page 1104 we find Mr. Dorsey’s answer:

Your statement that it would cost $12,000 to run this service in fifty hours is equally absurd.

Brady was paying $14,710.24, and Mr. Dorsey says:

Your statement that it would cost $12,000 to run this service in fifty hours is equally absurd. That would be at the rate of $26 per mile per annum—

Brady says $30 was a proper rate. Mr. Dorsey says—while the average cost of horseback service is less than $5 per mile per annum.

Now, there is the difference. Mr. Dorsey was getting his $14,710.24 from the Treasury, and when his subcontractor remonstrated with him, saying that it would cost $12,000, Mr. Dorsey replies that the statement that it would cost that to run the route is absurd. And yet you are asked to believe that Mr. Brady’s order allowing that amount to Dorsey and his associates was a proper and honest order.

On the Silverton route, on page 1861, Steineger appears as receiving $9,400 as subcontractor, while Brady was paying $16,512.28. At an earlier stage only $5,400 was paid to the subcontractor, while Brady was paying $16,512.28.

On the route from Kearney to Kent it appears that French got $1,587.40 for service for which Brady was paying $4,302.65.

On the Greenhorn route Farrish, McDaniel, and Higgins each successively got $840 for performing the service for which Brady was paying $3,945.

On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek Mr. Powers got $12,000 for performing the service for which Brady paid $21,460.89.

On the route from Trinidad to Madison the subcontractor got $2,402.30, while Mr. Brady paid $4,290.30.

On the Pueblo and Rosita route Mr. Brady paid $8,148, and by the subcontract it appears that the subcontractor took it at $3,100, and he had so good a thing that he let it to a sub-sub. at $2,600. Two thousand six hundred dollars was the amount actually paid for performing the service, and yet Mr. Brady paid for that service $8,148.

Now, gentlemen, can these things be justified by any consideration consistent with Mr. Brady's capacity and Mr. Brady's honesty. I submit that they cannot.

On the question of pro rata, to which I have made a little reference, Mr. Brady claims, or his counsel claim, that under the contract the parties were entitled to the pro rata on any increase of service; that if they had taken a contract at $1,000 they were entitled, under the terms of the contract, when one trip was added to the $1,000, to be paid $2,000; when three trips, $3,000. That that allowance was an extravagant and unnecessary sum abundantly appears in the papers in this case.

We find by the subcontracts which Mr. John W. Dorsey made with French that he provided, for one trip, $700; for two trips, $1,300; for three trips, $1,800; for six trips, $3,300; and he said those are the terms, and the man who will accept those terms gets the contract.

On the route from Toquerville to Adairville we find a somewhat similar sliding scale: One trip, $1,127; three trips, $3,381; six trips, $6,381; and seven trips, $7,444.

On the Ojo Caliente route, Joseph's subcontract: One trip, $2,200; two trips, $3,800; three trips, $5,300.

On the route from Redding to Alturas we find: Two trips, $5,500; three trips, $7,500; six trips, $15,000; seven trips, $17,000.

And so it goes on all the way through, showing that the contractors, the defendants, the subcontractors, and everybody recognized the fact that, as a matter of justice and fair dealing, when the trips are doubled it does not necessarily involve a doubling of the expense; that there is, as every one must see, a certain amount of increase which does not involve a proportionate amount of expense; that it does not increase in proportion with the increase of trips. But that is claimed to be defended by the fact that there is a provision in the contract which says so. There was no provision in the contract which obliged Mr. Brady to make increases. It was perfectly possible for him to say, "I will not make this increase and give you these additional trips which you are moving heaven and earth to get, unless you take it upon fair business principles at something less than pro rata. If you claim under the contract, I cannot, as you say, force upon you increase of trips, unless you get pro rata, but I can refrain from giving an increase of trips." That was possible to do. That assumes that the contract was in accordance with the law. But, gentlemen, you will see that the law does not say that it shall be given pro rata.

The law says that—

Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service.

It places the outside limit beyond which it shall not go. There is incorporated in the contract a clause saying that in case of increase they are to have the extreme outside limit; and that being in the contract, of course, in some measure, acts as a shield to protect Mr. Brady from any charge of criminality in that connection. He had no right to regard it, even if it was in the contract. If the contract contained an illegal clause he had no right to follow it. All I have to say is that if this were the only charge against him, if this were the only blot upon his escutcheon, if that were the only thing to lead you, as it has led us, to believe that he was guilty of corrupt misconduct as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, we certainly should not be here presenting this case to you. But being here, considering these matters in connection with others, we think he is not entitled to the same presumption from his actions in connection with them that a man with an unblotted escutcheon would be who had done such a thing.

I ask you to bear this fact in mind: that these contractors were originally getting from the Government less than they had to pay to get the service performed, and that Brady promptly came to their assistance and transformed their losing contracts into largely gaining contracts.

On the route from Pueblo to Rosita they got originally from the Government $388, and they had to pay to the subcontractor $700. Mr. Brady carried that amount up to $8,148, while they paid the subcontractor $2,600. They got a profit of over $5,000 upon a contract which originally was losing them something over $300. On the Silverton route they got originally from the Government $1,488, and they had to pay $2,280. (I am speaking now of subcontracts which are in evidence here.) Mr. Brady carried the amount up to $14,870.01, multiplying the original $1,488 by almost ten. And while they had to pay originally $2,280, they now paid no more than $9,400 to the subcontractor. So that the contract, which was originally a loss to them of nearly $800, was paying them a profit of something like $5,400.

On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek the original sum from the Government was $2,468, and they had to pay for having the service performed $2,700. Brady kindly increased the amount the Government paid them to $21,460.89, almost multiplying it by ten, and then they paid out only $12,000, leaving a profit of $9,400 on a contract which was originally a loss to them of between $200 and $300.

On the route from Mineral Park to Pioche they lost originally about $1,800. Mr. Brady paid originally $2,982, and it was increased to $49,051.33. The exact amount they paid to the subcontractors after the increase we have no means of ascertaining in this case.

On the route from Rawlins to White River the original contract was $1,700, and it cost them to get the service performed originally $2,500. And yet they finally received from the Government $31,981.35, of which they paid out for getting the service performed something less than two-thirds.

That I may not have to trouble you to-morrow with any of this class of statistics, let me call your attention to two little fragments of evidence which have crept into this case, and which will take me but a moment. It is evidence which shows how extravagant Mr. Brady was by his secret orders, made without competition, as compared with what might have been obtained by open and public bidding.

On the route from Julian to Colton it crept in incidentally that the service is now being performed for $2,400 a year on a thirty-hour schedule. Brady paid for a twenty-six hour schedule $8,910.

On the White River route it appears that the service is now being performed under advertisement and public bidding for $7,000 by a contractor who says it is a very pretty schedule and a very pretty contract to have. And yet Brady was paying $13,706.25. The present schedule is a changing schedule, less in summer and more in winter; but applying to it the average which Mr. Brady claimed to apply in his order on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, and which he said made it all the same, the old schedule and the existing schedule are substantially identical.

Shall I stop now, your honor.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] May it please the court, and you, gentlemen of the jury, I have discussed substantially all that I desire to call to your attention in connection with the financial portion of this case, and the evidences of Brady's extravagance for the benefit of these defendants; and it must naturally have occurred to you, as it would occur to any one, in connection with the facts, that Brady's action in that respect could not have been the action either of a careful or of an ignorant man, but was the action of an interested and a corrupt man—an action for the benefit of these defendants. I now wish to call your attention for a few moments to some of the papers upon which Brady acted in one or two cases. I have already called your attention to the fact of his granting expedition and assigning as authority for it petitions or letters which asked only for increase of service. On the Kearney and Kent route I called your attention to the fact that there was no paper on file asking for expedition, except the single altered petition into which the words "schedule thirteen hours" were inserted. Upon the route from Trinidad to Madison, Mr. Brady, on the 22d of April, 1879, ordered an increase of two trips, and on the 9th of May, 1879, ordered expedition, the two trips costing $1,021.50 additional, and the expedition costing $2,758.05. The order for expedition was made upon two papers, and two papers only, so far as I can find. Those papers are, first, a letter from Mr. Belford, which is found on page 1020 of the record, in which he asks an increase of speed, not naming the time; and, second, a letter from New York, from Mr. J. B. Chaffee, in which he asks that the service be increased. Those are the two letters and the only two letters. There is nothing I am aware of on that route asking for that increase except simply the letter of Mr. Belford and the letter of Mr. Chaffee. Mr. Belford was then a member of Congress. Mr. Chaffee had been a Senator from Colorado, but had removed to New York City, and wrote from New York City. On the Mineral Park and Pioche route I called your attention to the fact that there is a single letter from the Delegate, a letter from General Fremont, and a bogus petition, in which Mr. Miner admits he inserted the word "Ehrenberg," accompanied by the other petition on the other route in which Mr. Rerdell made the insertion. That is all there is for an increase of twenty-two or twenty-three thousand dollars; and all there is for the subsequent increase of $29,733.33 on the same route is the letter of Sidney Dillon. When Mr. Brady operated in that way, and dealt in that way, and acted on his moods, and spent the public money in that way, is there any reason to be surprised that, having made an estimate for the amount needed from Congress, and Congress having given him all the money he asked for, although being economically inclined, and that being almost the only appropriation which they did give up to the full amount that was asked, before six months of the year had passed he found himself threatened with a deficiency and he was obliged to go to Congress and ask an appropriation of $2,000,000 more. Pending his attempt to get that appropriation through Congress he was obliged to cut down all the star-route service in the country that was over one trip a week by one trip a week, and he was obliged to allow therefor to the contractors the month's extra pay upon the entire star-route service of the country for service not rendered, because he directed that it should not be rendered. He was obliged to incur all that expense, and then, having done that, he did finally, by aid of the fund to which Mr. Walsh was invited to contribute $8,000, the corruption fund for Congress, get an appropriation of about $1,150,000. Is it any wonder, gentlemen, in view of the way I have shown you that he went on and distributed the public money, that he incurred a deficiency? Is it not rather a wonder that Congress even gave him that qualified approval which he took so much pleasure in upon the stand, saying they did not approve any of his acts, but would authorize him to have $1,100,000 more, and forbid him to expedite any more routes to an extent of more than 50 per cent. over the original contract price.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to interrupt you. Do I understand you to say that Brady made a general order cutting down all the star-route service one trip?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Can you show me that order?

Mr. BLISS. I cannot show you Mr. Brady's order, but there are in evidence, as the jury will remember, printed letters of these defendants which they sent to all their subcontractors, notifying them that Mr. Brady had made an order reducing the service by one trip. On the stand, I think, I asked him about the same thing. It is my recollection that I did. The subcontractors were notified of the reduction, and they were told that it was done pending the Congressional appropriation, and they were advised to tell their people to get up petitions to Congress so as to aid in getting the appropriation through. In one or two cases the subcontractors were told that the service would not be off but a little while and there would not be any great loss to them, because they could make use of the time in bringing up their stock. The order of Mr. Brady upon that subject of course is not in evidence. There are in evidence in several cases the orders of Mr. Brady cutting off service on specific routes, and there are several of those circulars sent out by Miner and the others which stated that that was the condition of things, and they stand uncontradicted.

Now, gentlemen, Mr. Brady did all these things upon the oaths to which I have referred. As to those oaths I desire to call your attention to one or two things, taking the oaths in the aggregate. I have here, gentlemen, all the oaths that were used in this case. There was expedition upon eighteen of the nineteen routes, and upon two or three of them there were double oaths filed. I want to ask you, gentlemen, to examine these oaths as a whole. You will find beyond all question, as your eyes will show you, that every one of these oaths, with two exceptions, have been either altered by operative words being written over erasures, to wit, the numbers of men and animals, or else altered by having obviously been written in blank, and the blanks subsequently filled, as Mr. Miner was compelled to admit upon the stand was the fact—every one of these oaths which was submitted to Brady other than two, I think, to wit, one made by Miner and one made by Vaile. It does not occur to me that there are any other exceptions to that rule. All the rest are altered in that way. Now, we can well understand, gentlemen, that there may be cases where a party having written an affidavit of this kind may have made some error in the writing, or something of that sort, and may have changed a figure occasionally to correct his error, but it is not within the bounds of reasonable probability, gentlemen, that these parties would on all of these oaths make mistakes of that kind and have to correct them. It is only consistent, I submit, with the theory that these oaths are not what they purport to be, that they were false, forged, changed, and altered at some time and somewhere, and that they carried to Mr. Brady the evidence that they were in that form. I ask the jury to take them and examine them. (Submitting oaths to jury.) Yet Brady chose to act upon those oaths and to accept them as oaths made by reputable people. I submit that the very inspection of them will satisfy you that they are all wrong, false, altered, and changed, and that they come directly within the provisions of the statute which I will now read:

SEC. 5418. Every person who falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits any bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit, or other writing, for the purpose of defrauding the United States, or utters or publishes as true any such false, forged, altered, or counterfeited bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public bond, affidavit, or other writing, for such purpose, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered, or counterfeited—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Colonel Bliss, will you please suspend. The jurors are looking at the papers and are very much interested in them.

Mr. BLISS. Yes. I desire to have them examine the papers carefully.

Mr. CARPENTER. They have not seen them more than fifty times.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to have them see them again in the aggregate. [After a pause.] Gentlemen, I am anxious to get on, and I will therefore again call your attention to this statute:

SEC. 5418. Every person who falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits any bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit, or other writing, for the purpose of defrauding the United States, or utters or publishes as true any such false, forged, altered, or counterfeited bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit, or other writing, for such purpose, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered, or counterfeited, or transmits to or presents at the office of any officer of the United States any such false, forged, altered, or counterfeited bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit, or other writing, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered, or counterfeited for such purpose, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not more than ten years, or be fined not more than one thousand dollars, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. VERNON [a juror]. Excuse me. We do not have time to look over these oaths.

Mr. BLISS. I am perfectly willing to give you more time. I supposed you were anxious to have me get on.

Mr. SHIELDS [a juror]. Permit me to ask a question in regard to these papers.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Who is responsible for this work; whom do they purport to be signed by?

Mr. BLISS. Part of them are signed by John W. Dorsey, part of them by John M. Peck, part of them by John R. Miner, and there is one that is signed by Harvey M. Vaile, which is not altered, and one that is signed by Perkins, the subcontractor.

Mr. SHIELDS. The cause of my asking is so many different handwritings.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, you asked me where my authority was for the statement that Mr. Brady made an order reducing this service. I find it on page 669:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1880.

DEAR SIR: By a general order of the Postmaster-General issued to-day all mail service, except railway and steamboat, will be reduced to one trip per week, commencing March 1, 1880. You will take notice thereof, and from that date make only one trip per week on route No. 34149, from Kearney to Kent.

This reduction is in consequence of the failure of Congress to appropriate a sufficient sum to pay for service on any greater basis for the remainder of the year ending June 30, 1880.

It will be well for the people of your section to send to the member of Congress from your district such petitions as will express their opinions on the subject of this reduction.

Truly, yours,

JNO. R. MINER, Ag't.

Mr. WILSON. That is all there is of it, is it not?

Mr. BLISS. There are several more of them. I assume that you gentlemen are not going to say that John R. Miner lied.

Mr. WILSON. That is not all there is of it?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; that is not all there is of it. There are several others.

Mr. WILSON. Give us the balance.

Mr. MERRICK. I think you have got enough until you come to reply.

Mr. WILSON. All right. I will reply.

Mr. MERRICK. Go on, colonel, if they can't take Miner's word for it.

Mr. WILSON. He said the Second Assistant Postmaster-General made the order.

Mr. BLISS. The paper is 38 A, a printed paper with John R. Miner's signature to it. I have just read it. Gentlemen of the jury, there is the paper. [Exhibiting paper to the jury.] There is John R. Miner's signature to it, and I ask the jury to look at it.

Mr. WILSON. If you have any more I would like to know what they are.

Mr. BLISS. There are several more like that.

Mr. WILSON. I think there are not any more.

Mr. BLISS. I have shown you, gentlemen, all the affidavits upon these routes except the affidavit upon the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, which was made by Vaile, Vaile being the subcontractor and having no relation according to the regulations to the route. The regulations required the contractor to make the affidavit. Vaile did not come within the reason that Brady gave on the stand at first, because he was not the man who was performing the service. Vaile did not pretend that he ever performed the service. He says that he made the affidavit with no knowledge of the route, and that he never had been in that region; but he imagined—that is the language he used—from his experience in the mail service that he could make a correct statement. I have shown to you by the actual facts as to the number of men and horses that were used that his imagination was a lively one, and that he could not and did not make a statement that was anywhere near correct. That oath was not altered. The extraordinary oath of Mr. Miner upon the Tongue River route is not altered; not altered, gentlemen, because he had already made another affidavit which stated the number at about one-half what was stated on this affidavit. That other affidavit had been filed in the department, and an abstract of it had been carried on to a jacket made up for Mr. Brady to make an order upon. That affidavit disappeared, although Mr. Brewer told you it was there at one time. Then came Mr. Miner's affidavit, with the extraordinary number of one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals on a route that was three hundred and three miles long. That affidavit of Mr. Miner's on that route was not altered, and I think it probably may be said that the affidavit which I now hold in my hand does not so plainly appear to have been altered as some of the others. It is the affidavit on route 38135, from Pueblo to Greenhorn, made by Miner. My own judgment is that the words "one," "two," and "four" were inserted in blanks which existed before; in other words, that the affidavit was in some form first written, and those words subsequently inserted. But I am bound in frankness to say that is not so entirely clear as it seems to be upon some of the other routes.

Now, as to these affidavits, gentlemen, let us see what the condition of things is. I was asked who made these affidavits. The affidavits on the White River route, on the Silverton route, on the Trinidad and Madison route, on the Ojo Caliente route, on the Mineral Park route, and on the Tres Alamos route were all made by John W. Dorsey. On two of those routes, the Ojo Caliente route and the Pueblo and Greenhorn route, he made two affidavits each. The affidavits on the route from Kearney to Kent, from Toquerville to Adairville, from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, from The Dalles to Baker City, from Canyon City to Fort McDermitt—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] You said John W. Dorsey made the two affidavits on the Pueblo and Greenhorn route. Miner made those affidavits.

Mr. BLISS. I meant the Pueblo and Rosita route. The affidavits on the Kearney and Kent route, upon the Toquerville and Adairville route, upon the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, upon The Dalles and Baker City route, upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route upon the Julian and Colton route, and upon the Redding and Alturas route, were all made by John M. Peck. The affidavit upon the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, as I have told you, was made by Mr. Vaile and is unaltered. The affidavit upon the Tongue River route was made by Mr. Miner. Mr. Miner also made the affidavit upon the other Pueblo route. I think that and the Tongue River affidavit are the only ones which Mr. Miner made in this case. That is my recollection.

Mr. HENKLE. Two; on the Pueblo route and on the Tongue River route.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Miner therefore, when he told Mr. Moore out in Denver that these defendants were all good affidavitmakers, was speaking perhaps in a measure rather more for the others than for himself. But he made up for the lack of the number of his affidavits by the quantity that he put in, as his famous affidavit for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses on the Tongue River route will show. On the White River route Mr. Perkins, the subcontractor, made his affidavit out in Rawlins, and he forwarded it here to these parties in blank, with no figures or letters relating to the operative parts. That paper was filed by some one of these parties in the department, and is the paper which is referred to upon the back of the jacket upon which Mr. Brady made his order for expedition on that route. It is the paper which he certified in his letter to Congress he used upon that route. And yet it is claimed that by the calculation it will appear that he used the other affidavit of John W. Dorsey which is filed on the same route. However that may be it makes no difference so far as my present purpose is concerned. That affidavit was a false, fraudulent, forged, and altered affidavit of Perkins. It was transmitted within the language of the statute which uses the word "transmit" to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of obtaining upon it a fraudulent allowance from the Treasury of the United States. There cannot be any escape from that. The evidence is undisputed. I do not care whether you say that Mr. Rerdell sent it there by the direction of Mr. Vaile, or Miner, or Dorsey, or how. I shall have occasion to call your attention in another connection to this matter. I do not care how it was sent there. It was received there. Mr. Perkins says it was in blank, and Mr. Smith, the notary who took it, swears it was in blank when he took the oath, and Perkins swears he sent it back here in blank, and then there is evidence as to the handwriting in the oath where it was filled up. I have forgotten precisely whose handwriting it was stated to be, but I shall have occasion to call your attention to it hereafter. It was filled up in the handwriting of some of the defendants here. That oath so received here by these defendants was transmitted by them to the Post-Office Department and intended to be the basis of action of the Post-Office Department. Mr. Brady said in his jacket that it was the basis of his action. Mr. Brady said in his notice to Congress that it was the basis of his action. The calculation would seem to show that he used the affidavit Mr. Dorsey filed in the same case; but however that may have been, the question whether the fraud succeeded or not through the act of these parties in transmitting the forged document has nothing to do with the statute. They committed forgery; they violated that law; and they therefore, we shall insist to you, brought themselves within the strictest construction of the conspiracy statute which may be asked for by the other side—that the conspiracy must be a conspiracy to commit an offense made a crime by the statute. That is true of the Perkins affidavit. Have you any doubt that it is true in a large number of these other affidavits? I shall have occasion later on to analyze them in connection with the action of these different defendants in the case. But have you any doubt from the evidence before you, from an examination of the papers and from the dates of the jurats made out in New Mexico and the dates of the papers here, as have already been shown to you, but to which I shall call your attention again, that a large number of these affidavits were in fact false, forged, and altered affidavits? They were transmitted admittedly, because as to the bulk of these affidavits they are accompanied by letters, which I have here, signed by the different parties transmitting them. Miner wrote the one I hold in hand in Peck's name, saying he transmits a proposal for carrying the mail. They are indorsed at the Post-Office Department as proposals received from these parties. The evidence that these parties transmitted them is absolute. There cannot be any escape from it. They are letters in the undisputed handwriting of these different parties that were sent to the Post-Office Department, and that were there used as the basis of orders which did in fact defraud the Government of the United States. They were not only intended to defraud the United States, but the fraud was successful, as I have shown you.

These affidavits were thus in that way made to carry out the fraud, and these parties, therefore, are very clearly, and beyond all dispute, within the language of the section I have read. Of course they are not on trial now for a violation of that section. They are on trial now for a violation of the section which declares that it is a crime to conspire to defraud the United States. One construction of that statute is that to defraud the United States must be to defraud it in a manner made a crime by some independent statute. If that is the proper construction, and if the court will so instruct you, then, going no further, these affidavits would come directly within that statute. But, gentlemen, further than that, how does John R. Miner stand with regard to the petitions on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route? The statute says any false, forged, or altered writing, after enumerating all these other papers. The petition, 29 H, on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route is a paper which Mr. Miner himself will not undertake to say he did not alter. He will not undertake to say that he did not alter it and put those six names there. Anybody can see that those names are all in one handwriting. Anybody can see that those names are not in the handwriting of the men they purport to be written by. They differ from the genuine handwriting of the same persons on other petitions that are in evidence before you.

But Mr. Hall, the postmaster, happened to be here, and on the stand he swore that that was not his signature, and that he never authorized John R. Miner to place it there. He forged the name of Hall to that paper. He dare not say under oath that he did not. His chosen witness, Mr. Waugh, whom he put upon the stand, said he was familiar with his handwriting, and he said "Yes, that is Mr. Miner's handwriting." Can there be any escape from the fact of the transmission by Miner to the department of forged and altered papers?

Take the route from Kearney to Kent. There is a case in which Miner denied that he inserted those words. Mr. Boone and others say that it is Miner's handwriting. The words were inserted after the petition was signed and forwarded here, beyond all dispute. The man who wrote the petition, the man who sent it here, and some of the men who signed it, all say that those words were not there. That petition was sent here to John R. Miner, was gotten up in obedience to his request, I think; at any rate, it was sent here to Miner, and that is the sole basis for an order involving the payment of large sums of money from the Treasury. The addition is sworn to be in the handwriting of John R. Miner. The next we know of it it is on file in the Post-Office Department as a voucher upon which to get an order, which it did get, upon a route which John R. Miner was managing, and from which John R. Miner was deriving the benefit, and from which he did derive the benefit during the entire contract term. It was John R. Miner's route in his association with Vaile, Vaile taking his portion of the plunder and Miner taking the other. That petition was a false, altered, forged petition, and it was filed in the department, as we say, by John R. Miner as a false, altered, and forged petition.

As to alterations of other petitions, there is the alteration that Rerdell made upon the petition upon the Pueblo and Greenhorn route. And bear in mind, gentlemen, that we treat Mr. Rerdell always as a defendant in this case. He is not subjected to your action, because he has chosen to plead guilty. But he is a defendant, and he stands up and admits having altered these petitions. He says he did it by the direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. I shall have occasion to call your attention to something on that subject by and by. There are three or four other cases of altered petitions on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route, as to which the evidence is not so direct, and yet from the mere exhibition of the papers, I do not believe you can have any doubt that these papers belonged to a list of names which had a blank on the back of one of the sheets, and that over that there was written the form of a petition, and the names were made to answer the purpose of recommending something which they were never intended to recommend. There cannot be any escape from this in the case of two or three of the petitions on that route, and that is the same one upon the petitions on which Mr. Miner was altering and forging names. I will not say that there cannot be any question about it, but the evidence shows that the figures 96 and the words "ninety-six" upon two of the petitions are very clearly written over erasures; there is no escape from that. And the evidence is—Miner denies it, of course—the evidence of Boone, I think it is, and Rerdell is that those alterations are in the handwriting of Mr. Miner. However that may be, they are papers that went into the possession of Mr. Miner; papers upon a route that was managed for Miner and Vaile; papers upon a route where the amount was run up to $50,000; papers upon a route where Vaile told you upon the stand that there was a profit of at least $20,000; papers upon a route where the subcontractors got only $10,000, leaving the balance of the $50,000 to be accounted for as expenses by way of getting orders in the department, or in some way maintaining their influence in the department, which Mr. Dorsey told Mr. Moore was a matter of expense, or in paying those expenses which Mr. John R. Miner wrote about to Mr. Hayes, out in California as being necessarily incurred here in doing their business. Some way or other that money went. The money was obtained upon that series of forged and altered petitions. Some of those petitions were undoubtedly forged and altered by Miner; and all of them were filed in the department by him. And yet he comes before you now claiming that he has done nothing for which he ought to be held responsible at the bar of this court, just as he told you on the stand that though he paid $1,800 to settle an indictment against him for defrauding the revenue, yet he was not guilty. Now, gentlemen, do honorable and high-minded men pay $1,800 when they are indicted but are not guilty? I submit that the story is obviously false. It is a proper story to come from the lips of a man who stands, on indisputable and uncontradicted evidence, guilty of the violation of a statute of the United States which, if proved, would render him liable to ten years in the penitentiary.

All these affidavits, as I say, are full of that sort of thing. I will not stop to enumerate them; I have gone over them in detail in calling your attention to them, but I submit that they establish a case of gross and persistent violations of the law.

Now, gentlemen, up to this time I have, with very few exceptions as to very slight points, confined myself absolutely to record evidence and uncontradicted evidence. I have, in everything I have asked you to consider, I think, referred to no case in any way about which there is any dispute, except Miner's denial of the thirteen hours on Kearney and Kent petitions, and some denial as to what passed with Moore. I think everything else I have said has been based upon record evidence or the uncontradicted evidence of witnesses whom we placed upon the stand—the stage-drivers, the carriers, the men from the West—and there has been no contradiction of any of them.

Leaving out of view entirely the question of whether Rerdell is to be believed; leaving out of view entirely the question of the contradictions of these defendants upon the stand; leaving out of view entirely the prevarications that they were guilty of; leaving all these questions out; leaving Moore's testimony out, leaving out the testimony as to what John W. Dorsey said out on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route; leaving out the testimony of what was told to Major and to McBean; leaving all that out of view as claimed to be either contradicted by the witnesses on the stand, or not to have been authorized to be stated by the parties who stated it; and what do we find? It will do us good, it will assist you in the decision of the case, to pause here, I think, and see how the case stands just upon that ground; how it stands when we have gone thus far with the record evidence and uncontradicted and undisputed oral evidence so far as it has come before you.

Do we not find that Brady resorted to expedition as the regular practice of the department, when he ought to have confined himself to that simply to cure sudden and unexpected emergencies that had arisen? The evidence shows—and he will not say that he did not—that he resorted to expedition to twenty times the amount ordered by his two immediate predecessors in a corresponding period of time; that he resorted to it as a rule and not as an exception.

Have we not shown you that he spent large sums of money under orders for expedition where no expenditure was needed, because the service was rendered in just the same time after the order was made as before? Take the Redding and Alturas route; there the subcontractors were performing the service, and were happy to perform it in connection with their stage service, at a reduced rate, at a rate of speed less than that which Brady ordered it reduced to. They made no complaint; there never was any complaint anywhere on the subject. And yet these defendants came to Brady, and they got from Brady an order for the payment of a large sum of money to them for an expedition which they never made, because expedition implies gain over the existing schedule, and there was no such gain. On the contrary, the mail was always being carried on less than the expedited schedule. And he did that with papers on file in his department showing that on the question of expedition only $4,000 of money could go to these parties. On the Pueblo and Greenhorn route there was no practical gain, though there was in form some gain in time.

Have we not shown you that he paid large sums of money where there was no gain, because he disregarded the question of connections? Though the mail was carried over the route at greater speed, it arrived at the terminus and there had to remain about twenty-four hours until it could be taken up and carried on beyond.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that he paid large sums of money where there was absolutely no mail carried over the route, and where by his own declaration he admitted that there was substantially no mail?

Have we not shown you that in every single little item, the addition of a post-office or taking off a post-office, or making expedition, when there was about to be a change on the route, the care in making an order of expedition in order that the contractor might get his month's extra pay—have we not shown you that in all these respects Mr. Brady regarded only the interest of these contractors, and not the interest of the Government? Have we not shown you that he made supposititious additions, like Animas City and Brighton and others, where the mail had all the time gone directly through the same places, and made extra allowances to the contractors for those supposititious additions, and then that he used those supposititious additions as an excuse for extending the schedule time, and then that he turned around and, because the time was so long, expended large sums of money in expediting? And in one route, having expedited it from thirteen hours to fifteen hours, he paid this money for expedition and reduced it back only to twelve.

Have we not shown to you, gentlemen, that by his own avowal he utterly disregarded the law as to productiveness? The law says that he shall regard productiveness and other circumstances, and yet by his own avowal on certain of the routes he made no pretense of regarding productiveness. Have we not shown that in no case is there any evidence that he took productiveness into consideration, save on the route from Mineral Park to Pioche, where he said, on the 22d of January, that there being no mail, and therefore no productiveness, he cut off $49,000 of expedition and increase of trips that he had put on there, and having done that on the 22d of January, on the 28th of January he put back something over $22,000 of that, though he himself had said six days before, that there was no mail and no productiveness on the route?

Have we not shown you that when he was asked to add such a place as Raton to one route, to which it could have been added by going six or eight miles to the railroad, at an expense of a couple of hundred dollars, he wrenched around the Trinidad and Madison route and added twenty-three miles to the distance, though in point of fact, as the record of his office shows, it only added fifteen miles, and then, having done that, he, in consequence of that increase of distance, carried the schedule up to nineteen and three-quarters hours, and then having got it up so that the mail could not go over the route in one day, he turned around and spent large sums upon expedition, so as to get it over the route in the same day, as it would have done if he had added Raton on the route in accordance with the petition and the request of Senator Teller?

Have we not shown you that in such cases as on the route from Toquerville to Adairville, when the First Assistant Postmaster-General had notified him as early as the 19th of June that the terminal office was abolished, that there was no service, no mail to go over ten miles at the end, yet thirty days after he is so notified he makes an order for expedition over the entire route, which expedition was not to take effect until the following 1st of August, and then, a few days afterwards, comes an order formally cutting off the ten miles which the First Assistant Postmaster General had told him had been practically cut off thirty days before that, and that formal cutting off was also to take effect on the 1st of August, this accompanied by the fact that the contractor must have a month's extra pay upon the rate of pay for the expedited service, instead of the rate of pay for the service in the time they were performing it, making a difference to the Government of some $1,200 to $1,500?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, in all cases save in two or three exceptional ones, and those exceptional ones surrounded by frauds, as in the case of Miner's affidavit on the Tongue River route, that in every one of them Mr. Brady ordered pay up to the very limit of the sum which, under the statute, he could pay assuming the affidavits that he had before him to be true? The statute says you shall not pay beyond a certain sum. He says, "I will take the affidavits before me as true. They show that the sum that I can pay is so much, and I will pay that extreme sum." Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that he did that in almost every case? He did it in every case where there was an increase of trips, as to which, as I told you before, there might be some pretense of excuse for it, but as to the expedition there could not be any pretense of excuse whatever.

Have we not shown you that in direct violation of law he made several orders which were retroactive, to take effect and take money from the Treasury as of a time before those orders were made? Have we not shown you that that was so on the expedition ordered on the Ojo Caliente route, for the addition of Pagosa, the addition of one other place—Brighton, I think it was—the orders all made to take effect prior to the time when they were made, in direct violation of the provisions of the statute?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that he did not comply with the law in the form of his orders? The statute says that the order for increase of service shall state how much is allowed for such increase, and in at least three cases, beyond all dispute, the order is made without giving anything of the kind.

Have we not shown you the violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law in the orders he made granting expedition to a greater amount than 50 per cent. of the amount at the original letting?

Have we not shown you that he acted upon affidavits which, in form, violated the regulation which Mr. Chandler told you, and undoubtedly truly, was binding upon Brady as well as upon everybody else? The regulation required that the affidavit should state the number of men and horses necessary upon the then present schedule, and yet affidavit after affidavit does not pretend to do it in that form.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, by his own admission, that he made this expedition entirely upon the oaths of these contractors; that they knew nothing of the business; that he did not care whether they knew anything of the business; that he knew they were not themselves performing the service; that he knew they had never been upon the routes; and that he knew that those oaths were made by men who were swearing in their own interest? And yet on the theory that they were necessarily honest men he accepted those oaths without inquiry, and gave up to the extreme limit of what was possible under the law to give to them. Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that those oaths were in fact false—false almost without exception?

On the Pueblo and Greenhorn route the oath stated that a certain number of men and horses would be needed; and yet the undisputed evidence of every carrier who was ever on the route during the contract term is that no more men and horses were used after the increase than before; that the number of men was precisely the same, and the horses were identically the same. They jogged over the route in the same time and in the same way. And yet Mr. Brady made an order for increase, misstating the number of men and horses that were then actually in use, and also misstating the number of men and horses that would be required. He made an order which took from the Treasury a large sum of money, though the statute says there should not be any money taken from the Treasury in such cases except for the use of an additional number of men and horses.

Have we not shown you, too, that he made these orders upon affidavits that had been filed in his office, when he had before him also contradictory affidavits by the same men, made on the same day, when both could not be true? When Mr. John W. Dorsey swore, on the 21st of April, 1879, that a certain number of men and animals were then necessary to carry the mail on that route on the then present schedule, and then at a later hour in the same day he swore that a different number of men and animals were necessary to carry the mail on the same schedule, both of those oaths could not be true. Yet Mr. Brady admittedly made his order for expedition upon one of them. He made no inquiry, and he assumed that the man who could make two contradictory oaths upon the same day was an honest man, swearing fairly, not deceiving, and not acting in his own interest rather than the interest of the Government.

On the Ojo Caliente route there were also two oaths. Those two oaths, however, were not made, I think, on the same day. They related, so far as the then present schedule was concerned, to the same schedule, the same number of trips, and so far as that portion of the affidavits is concerned they were equally contradictory. They were both before Mr. Brady, and he treated the man who could make those two affidavits as a reliable man, and his affidavits as the only authority upon which he could take money from the Treasury.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route, there having been in Mr. Brady's office and before him a jacket on which the affidavit was abstracted (the affidavit of Mr. Miner, which stated the number of men and horses on the route in both branches of the affidavit, present and future), and which was different from the affidavit which Brady finally used, was much smaller, only one half, I think, of the first affidavit, which stated the number of men and animals one hundred and fifty each, and I think the second affidavit reduced the number of men from one hundred and fifty to thirty-seven, and the number of animals from one hundred and fifty to seventy three—that that jacket, having been made up reciting that affidavit, was put inside of another jacket in which there was put John R. Miner's affidavit that it took one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses, and that Mr. Brady made his order for expedition upon that larger affidavit, claiming that it was less than pro rata, when, in point of fact, he made it for considerably more than Mr. Miner's original affidavit would have authorized?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that those affidavits were absurd on their face; that the least calculation would have shown you that they were not and could not be true?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that on one route, if the affidavit was true, the result would have been that each horse upon that route, upon an expedited schedule, would have traveled only thirty-three minutes in a day, and would have traveled about one mile and seven-eighths, I think it was, in a day; and that the oaths were full of things of that kind? One of the oaths actually required, if there were only so many men used at the rate of speed called for, that the men stated to be necessary should travel forty hours in every twenty-four, and every horse, I think, would have to travel twenty hours in every twenty-four. Mr. Brady says he did sometimes figure a little.

Gentlemen, in considering these facts I ask you to bear in mind that the Government would be defrauded if they understated the number of men and animals actually used, or if they overstated the number of men and animals which were to be used. These affidavits, as the evidence shows, almost without exception sinned in both respects.

Have we not shown you that in the face of the regulation, though the regulation was binding as law upon him (that he must have the oath of the contractor), he accepted the oath of subcontractors, like Vaile and others. Have we not shown you that he accepted, on two routes certainly, the oath of a man who on the affidavits signs himself as subcontractor (John W. Dorsey), when he was neither contractor nor subcontractor, and that very jacket upon which Mr. Brady made the order showed that he was not either contractor or subcontractor?

Have we not shown you that it was a matter of entire indifference to Mr. Brady who made the affidavits, what the form was, or what they contained, so long as they gave him a pretense of taking money out of the Treasury and putting it into the pockets of these defendants?

Have we not shown you that those affidavits were all altered, erased, forged? I will not dwell upon that after the examination you yourselves have made this morning.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that the affidavits were false in fact as to the number of men and animals that were called for?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that the petitions filed were altered, forged, gotten up originally often at the instance of these defendants, who wrote to their parties out in that region where they were to get them that they must not have them alike; that they must have changes in them so that they might appear to be the voluntary petitions of the people in that locality? And yet after that they were not content with that, they forged and altered the petitions in such a way that any man looking at them must see—taking those on the Kearney and Kent route and the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route—that they were, to say the least, suspicious, and not a justification to base action upon?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady, by his orders for expedition, ordered the payment of sums far greater than were necessary to obtain the service performed, and far greater than he knew was necessary to obtain the performance of the service, because not only did the subcontracts on file in his own office give him the means of knowing that fact, but in the very order that he made he provided that the Treasury was to pay out a given sum, usually twice as great as the sum which his own order showed was to go to the man who was actually performing the service?

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady, instead of declaring these contractors failing contractors, waited, on one route at least, six or seven months to enable them to get up petitions for increase of service and for expedition, and that then, having gotten up this string of fraudulent and forged petitions upon the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route, he then went on and made an order for increase of trips and expedition before they had ever driven a horse a mile over the whole of that route? And yet he gave them six months to enable them to get ready with these petitions, and then he made an order before service had commenced for expedition and increase of trips.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady went on and did these things in spite of the remonstrances of the postmasters along the route; in spite of the remonstrances of the people? Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that when he chose he followed the wishes of a Member of Congress or a Delegate, taking that as his excuse, and when he did not choose he did not follow the wishes of a Member of Congress or Delegate? But always, in every case where he failed to follow the wishes of the Member of Congress or Delegate, it was because that Member of Congress or that Delegate wished him to take some action which would keep money in the Treasury, and prevent it going into the pockets of these contractors. In no single case did he disregard the wishes of a Member of Congress, Senator, or Delegate, except when, if he had disregarded it, it would have been to the injury of the pockets of these defendants. Have we not shown you that when he could not comply with their requests he gave absurd and inconsistent excuses?

Have we not shown you that he said that he could not give the extension asked for on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route because he claimed it would be in violation of the contract which extended the time, when in point of fact the route had been advertised as fifty miles and it proved to be seventy-five miles? He said he could not extend it because the extension asked for was beyond the contract. And yet when it came to the Saint Charles and Greenhorn route he extended the time. When it came to the Bismarck and Tongue River route, advertised at eighty-four hours, he extended it to one hundred and eight hours, though the contract said that the bidder should inform himself as to the length of the route and the circumstances and be bound by it. The advertisement and contract together stated that the route was such a length and the schedule required so many hours. And yet, while on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route he could extend it for the benefit of the contractors, on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route he could not extend it, because then it would have been in accordance with the request of the postmasters and for the benefit of the Treasury.

Have we not shown you, gentlemen, that Mr. Brady sawed these routes up and down—the Mineral Park and Pioche route down $49,000 one week, and in less than a week afterwards he put back $22,000 of it, and that he did that without any pretense of excuse, and that he avowed that he did that and other things solely for the benefit of the contractors, and not in any sense for the benefit of the people or the Treasury?

Have we not shown you all these things and more? And having done that, shown it upon uncontradicted testimony, shown it to you chiefly upon the record evidence, then I ask you to bear these facts in mind as you go with me for a little while to consider the evidence as to which it may be claimed that there is some pretense of contradiction. But we ask you also, in bearing all these facts in mind, to remember that all these acts of Brady were acts done for the benefit of these defendants, and which redounded to their emolument.

These defendants other than Brady would have you believe apparently that, while Mr. Brady may have done these things, may have done them extravagantly, may have done them erroneously, may have done them illegally, still it was done without any collusion with them; that they got the benefit; that they were simply lucky people standing around while some naughty boy had climbed the tree, and they were holding up their aprons and catching the fruit; and that while the boy, perhaps, ought to be punished, they, who got the benefit, were entirely innocent, and nothing should be said as to them. Let us see for a moment whether that is so.

Mr. Brady made various increases upon various routes where the inquiry is pertinent as to how he came to fix upon the precise time at which he arrived. On the route from Silverton to Parrott City the then existing schedule time was thirty-five hours; he reduced it to fifteen hours. On the route from White River to Rawlins the schedule time was one hundred and eight hours; he reduced it to forty-five hours. On the route from Toquerville to Adairville the schedule was sixty hours; he reduced it to thirty-three hours. On the Greenhorn route the schedule was sixteen hours; he reduced it to seven. On the route from Julian to Colton the schedule time was fifty-four hours, and he reduced it to twenty-six. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek the schedule time was one hundred and twenty hours, and he reduced it to fifty. How did he come to get at those precise times? How did he come when the schedule was thirty-five hours on the Silverton route, to take fifteen, and not sixteen, not seventeen, not some other time?

Gentlemen, I ask that question because of this remarkable fact: In not one of those routes was there on file before Brady a single paper—save one, to which I will directly call your attention—which indicated or suggested the number of hours at which he arrived, not one. The petitions either name other times than those which he selected, or they simply said “faster time,” “quicker time,” or something of the sort. Not one of them suggested the time which Brady fixed upon. How did he get at that time? It might, perhaps, be suggested that it was a proper arrangement made with the contractors at the moment of his action; that they suggested this time and he accepted it. But the difficulty is that both Mr. Brady on the stand and the facts repudiate that theory.

On the White River route the petitioners ask for eighty-four hours; the then schedule was one hundred and eight hours. Mr. Brady gave them forty-five hours. The distance being one hundred and eighty miles, he says he did it to make the running time four miles an hour. But the petition, containing the names of his favorite Senators, &c., asked for eighty-four hours. He liberally gave them more than they asked.

On the route to Greenhorn the petition asked merely for faster time. There were two papers there which suggested eight hours, but all the others merely asked for faster time. Mr. Brady says he preferred seven hours, a little over four miles an hour, the distance being thirty-five miles, which would in fact make it five miles an hour at seven hours (which was what he gave). But when Mr. Brady made that reply he forgot that he had made an order which had put on that route a supposititious addition of twelve miles, and that, in point of fact, by his order the department was regarding that route as forty-nine miles long—may be it was forty-seven, but I think it was forty-nine—and therefore the theory of four miles an hour did not accord with his statement, because it was five miles an hour, and when you come to carry it up to the theory which he was carrying out in payment for the service it was some six or seven miles an hour.

On the route from Toquerville to Adairville the petitioners asked for forty-eight hours; Brady made it thirty-three hours. He says that is just four miles an hour, but that disregards the ten miles struck off.

On the route from Julian to Colton the petitioners asked, some of them for thirty-six, and some for thirty-eight hours. Brady made it twenty-six hours. The distance was one hundred and twenty miles. When asked on the stand how he came to do that he said he did not remember.

On the Silverton route the petitioners asked for faster time only. The existing schedule having been advertised as thirty-five hours, he had put Animas City on the route with a supposititious addition of ten miles, paid for that, and extended the time to thirty-seven hours; and then Mr. Brady, though the petitioners asked only for faster time, got it down to fifteen hours, and he says he cannot tell why he did it, except that the route is sixty-five miles and a little over, which would make about four miles an hour. In point of fact, gentlemen, the route was advertised as sixty-nine miles. Brady had put on ten more miles, making it seventy-nine miles, which would be considerably over five miles an hour, and this five miles an hour across a range of mountains which is ten thousand feet above the level of the sea, and known as the Continental Divide.

On the route from Kearney to Kent Mr. Brady says he has no recollection about it, but he says he took his thirteen hours from nowhere except the interlineation in the petition—the interlineation that Miner forged. He has no explanation to give. But Miner has one, and let us see what it is. Miner says that he got the thirteen hours which was put into the affidavit in that case from a letter of French's in the record of the last trial. That letter was referred to. It is in the record of the last trial, dated at Loup City on the 23d of January, 1879. It does contain the thirteen hours. There, he says, is where he got it. That letter came from Loup City here. The thirteen hours was then taken out of that letter, filled into an affidavit by John R. Miner, sent out to John M. Peck in New Mexico, so that John M. Peck swore to it on the 1st of February, and all this in eight days. They wish you to believe that a letter came from Loup City, away up in Nebraska, north of the railroad, to Washington, was received and considered, an affidavit prepared, filled in, and sent out to John M. Peck in New Mexico, and that John M. Peck swore to it, and all that was accomplished in the brief period of eight days. I do not think Mr. Brady will thank Mr. Miner for undertaking to help him out of that scrape. It was not very efficient help.

Mr. Brady said on the stand that he was looking for four-miles-an-hour expedition, and that was the way that he got at these rates. I have shown you already that his four miles-an-hour theory does not work. He gave more than four miles an hour, and more than five miles an hour, as I have specified to you.

But when Mr. Brady came to expedite the Canyon City route he expedited only to two and fifty-three one-hundredths miles an hour. He was not after four miles an hour there. When he came to expedite on the Redding and Alturas route, he expedited only to two and fifty-eight one-hundredths miles an hour. There was no theory of four miles an hour which he must come up to, though the petitioners did not ask it, though the members of Congress did not ask it, though neither class of people asked it—Colonel Ingersoll's people or Mr. Brady's people.

Now, gentlemen, there is one fact which will show to you conclusively that there is no possible explanation of this action of Brady's, except an explanation which involves the idea of collusion. The rule of speed did not govern it. Then what do we find? We find that there is in every case one paper which does settle it absolutely.

On the Silverton route Brady made an order for expedition on June 12, 1879, and he made it for fifteen hours, though no petition asked any definite time. The petitions only asked for faster time, and the existing schedule was thirty-seven hours. But Brady made that order of June 12, 1879, upon an affidavit sworn to by John W. Dorsey, in Vermont, on the 21st of April previous, and that affidavit names fifteen hours. How did John W. Dorsey, in Vermont, on the 21st of April, 1879, know that Thomas J. Brady would, in June, 1879, when he was considering the question of expedition on the Silverton route, want to be informed how many men and horses would be necessary to perform the service on a schedule of fifteen hours? How did John W. Dorsey then know that a fifteen-hour schedule would be what Mr. Brady would wish to be informed about. Remember there was no petition that named fifteen hours; there was no suggestion of anything of the kind. Remember this is not an affidavit sworn to when Mr. Brady was considering the case after the papers were filed there, and when he might have turned around and said to the contractor, "What time is proper? How many men and horses will it take upon the route? Upon what time?" But this is a case where, by anticipation, John W.

Dorsey knew, on the 21st of April, up in Vermont, what Mr. Brady would want to know in the June following.

On the Toquerville and Adairville route, gentlemen, the oath of Peck is for a thirty-three-hour schedule. The order is for thirty-three hours. The petitions were for forty-eight hours. There is not a paper anywhere which mentions anything less than forty-eight hours. The order is made on the 8th of July, 1879, and yet John M. Peck, on his bed of sickness out in New Mexico, knew in the previous January, 1879, that Mr. Brady would want to be informed of how many men and horses were necessary upon a schedule of thirty-three hours. How did Mr. Peck know that in January, 1879, nearly six months previous; how could he know it except there was collusion between Mr. Brady and these contractors? I submit, gentlemen, that there is not any possibility of escape from that, and the ingenuity of counsel cannot get up any excuse consistent with the integrity of these affidavits which does not involve the fact of collusion between Mr. Brady and these contractors.

On the Greenhorn route the oath of Miner was made April 17, 1879. The order for seven hours is made on the 26th of June, 1879. The petitions all ask only for faster time, except two, which ask for eight hours. And yet Mr. Miner knew on the 17th of April that Mr. Brady's mind would, somehow or other, fix upon seven hours, and he made the oath for seven hours. I think that is on the Greenhorn route; I am not sure. It is either on the Greenhorn or the Rosita, one or the other.

On the Julian route Mr. Peck made his oath on the 30th of December, 1878. The order was not made until the 24th of June, 1879. And yet the papers all ask for thirty-six hours. The order was for twenty-six hours, and Mr. Peck's oath, made six months previous, is for twenty-six hours.

On the Kearney and Kent route Peck's oath is dated February 1, 1879. The order is dated July 10, 1879. There was no paper in the department suggesting expedition until after the 6th of February, 1879; no paper suggesting expedition whatever until the 6th of February, 1879, and then there came in the altered petition, altered by John R. Miner, as we say, by the insertion of the words "schedule thirteen hours." That is the only language in any paper that looks for expedition on that route. That paper came into the department on the 6th of February, 1879, and yet on the 1st of February preceding, John M. Peck, out in New Mexico, knew not only that expedition was to be had, but he knew that expedition was to be asked for at the rate of thirteen hours. How did he know it? The only possibility of his knowing it consistent with any theory except that of collusion is that by some lightning arrangement French's letter, written in Loup City on the 23d of January, was able to come here and be converted into that kind of an affidavit and then be sent West with the suggestion. On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek the oath was made by Peck in the same way on the 22d of January. The order was made on the 26th of June. In that case the schedule was one hundred and twenty hours. Senator John H. Mitchell, whose name appears on the pencil memorandum given by Dorsey to Rerdell, recommended one hundred hours and wrote a letter recommending one hundred hours. I think the papers disclose that he had a personal interview asking for one hundred hours. The petitioners asked for "faster time." None of them, I think, named any time less than one hundred hours. I think none of them named any time other than Mr. Mitchell. And yet Mr. Brady, on the 26th of June, made an order for fifty hours, and Mr. Peck, out in New Mexico, in the January preceding, knew that Mr. Brady was going to want just that information. Substantially the same thing is true with reference to the Trinidad and Madison route, though the difference there in time between the affidavit and the order is considerably less. There the petitions did not ask for any time, but simply said "faster time." The only paper that mentions the time is the affidavit.

On the White River route, gentlemen, I may say in passing that there is one little peculiarity. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey at one stage telegraphed out there that an order had been made to expedite the time to fifty hours. There never was an order made to expedite the time to fifty hours, but just about that time there was an order made to expedite it to forty-five hours, that expedition to forty-five hours being in spite of the petition which asked for eighty hours, and the "forty-five" appearing over an erasure in Mr. Brady's order. What led to that telegram of Mr. Dorsey's in this connection is one of the things of which we have no explanation so far.

Now, gentlemen, those affidavits, as we say, and the dates and the amounts contain beyond all question conclusive evidence of prearrangement between these contractors and Mr. Brady. But they are not the only evidences of prearrangement that exist. We find, for instance, upon the Tongue River route that they built more ranches than they needed. They doubled the number of ranches that they needed upon the existing schedule. They spent $6,000 for building ranches, though the entire income of the route for the four years of the contract term at the contract price would have been but about $9,600. They spent $6,000 in building these double ranches. They did not use them and they did not want to use them when the service was only once a week. They stated that they did not want to use them then. But they were going to have expedition, and when expedition came then they were going to use every ranch, the ranches being seventeen miles apart, and then their foresight in building them would be apparent. That was precisely what happened. Mr. Dorsey undertakes to say that he did not tell Mr. Pennell to do anything of that kind, and seems to imply that Mr. Pennell did not do anything of that kind, Mr. Pennell says that Mr. Dorsey did tell him that precise thing; that he did tell him to build the ranches in that way, and that he did build them in that way. Who are you going to believe? Are you going to believe John W. Dorsey, the man who, by his own admission, undertook by a false and fraudulent petition to get a side post-office put on that route with an addition of sixty miles, and which would therefore have cost one-fifth of the sum that was paid on that route? If we make that calculation, taking the amount that was allowed after expedition, that paper post-office would have taken from the Treasury $12,000 a year. Will you believe John W. Dorsey, a man who, by his own admission, undertook to get that post-office put upon that route, or Mr. Pennell, to whom the proposition was made and who said that he would not have anything to do with it? Mr. Dorsey said upon the stand that because of Mr. Pennell's refusal to have anything to do with it he always respected him. If Mr. Dorsey respected Mr. Pennell for that refusal, what was his opinion of himself? You are asked to believe Mr. Dorsey when he says that he did not tell Mr. Pennell these things and Mr. Pennell did not do these things. Mr. Pennell says Dorsey did tell him and that he did do them. Moreover, the men who were with Mr. Pennell confirm his testimony so far as the building of the ranches is concerned. John W. Dorsey told Mr. Pennell that there would be an increase to three trips, and then the time would be shortened and then there would be an increase to six trips; that there would be at least an increase of $25,000, one increase in six months and another in a year; that he had a brother in Washington who could fix it all right as they wanted it with the department. That Mr. Dorsey told these things to Mr. Pennell is indisputably true. He told them to Mr. Pennell for the purpose of inducing Mr. Pennell to go into a partnership with him. They had not the money that they needed on that route, and they wanted Mr. Pennell to put in the money and take a half interest in it. Mr. Pennell saw that that arrangement involved matters that he could not go into; matters that he in his innocence did not believe could be brought about, and he declined to go into it. The result was that precisely the things occurred which John W. Dorsey said would occur. There were two orders made. One of them was made within the time John W. Dorsey said it would be made, and the other was delayed a month longer, so that it did not come until a month after the time Dorsey fixed; but as to the compensation, instead of an allowance of $25,000 there was obtained upon that route an allowance of $67,500. Now, it is urged that these statements were made because the defendants knew from the position of the route, its locality, and geographical situation that it must be increased and expedited. John W. Dorsey undertakes to say that while he did not know anything about it, when he got out there and saw General Miles he learned it. Mr. Dorsey was allowed on the stand to detail a conversation with General Miles after General Miles had been on the stand and had not been asked anything about it, and after General Miles had gone away so that we could not call him back to question him as to its truth. John W. Dorsey gave this conversation with General Miles, in which General Miles showed his knowledge of the necessity of having a fast service and more trips and everything of that kind. Mr. Dorsey knew nothing about expedition or anything of that kind, but in telling this story he said to General Miles that if they went on and increased the trips with faster time the contractors would throw up the contract, as they had a right to do. Dorsey wants you to believe that he was sufficiently posted as to the practice of the Post-Office Department and the rights of contractors under that practice to know that if the Post-Office Department ordered increase of trips with expedition, as he told General Miles, in that case the contracts could be thrown up. And yet Mr. Vaile, the old mail contractor, when on the stand, told you that he did not know anything about his authority to throw up a contract, and that if he had he would have thrown up the Tongue River contract. What a pity for these poor losing contractors that the knowledge of Mr. Dorsey and the ignorance of Mr. Vaile in the mail business could not somehow have been concentrated in one man, so that the contractors would have been saved this great loss and the Government could have saved the $70,000 a year on this route.

At this point (12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. Before recess, gentlemen, I was considering the question of the evidences of pre-arrangement other than those which were derived from the affidavits in the case. I referred to the testimony as to what John W. Dorsey stated in Bismarck about the probabilities or the certainties of the increase of the service, and of the expedition upon the Bismarck and Tongue River route, and I called your attention to the fact that the precise increases, both in time and in money, which he predicted came about almost exactly as he predicted. I was then about to refer to the fact that it was claimed that this anticipation of such increase arose from the circumstances of the case, and that, although John W. Dorsey had undertaken to say that he got some information from General Miles upon the subject, yet the evidence showed very clearly that that was not true as bearing upon the conversation with Pennell, because Pennell was distinct, and fixed it accurately by various occurrences as showing that the conversation took place before Mr. Dorsey went to Fort Keogh and saw General Miles. I think Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, when he was on the stand, would not say whether he told Mr. Rerdell when he went out to Bismarck that the route would be expedited or not. Rerdell said it would, and he would not say he did not tell him so; possibly he did, though he did not remember; but it would have been expedited; the circumstances of the case, its locality, and so forth, rendered it necessary that the route should be increased and expedited. But, gentlemen, with reference to that, I desire to call your attention to some remarkable evidence as bearing upon this case, and that is this: that this route which they claim was necessary from the circumstances of the case, and was sure to be increased, upon which the service commenced in July, 1878, and upon which the first order for increase was made in the course of that fall, they were at first very anxious to have discontinued. Upon that route, which was so inevitably, as they want to claim to you, to be increased that they could go on and make their expenditures and make their promises that it must be increased from the nature of things, on the 27th day of June, 1878, John R. Miner submitted to the department his statement, which was apparently carried there by Judge Kidder, the Delegate, and backed by his personal assertion, saying that the route was entirely unnecessary. I will read a passage:

There is no office between Bismarck and Tongue River now, and there are no settlements whatever to be supplied with the United States mail.

Tongue River is supplied twice a week by the route from Fort Buford.

The whole country between Bismarck and Tongue River is occupied by hostile Indians, and no mail can be carried over this line except with a large military escort. It is simply impossible to carry the mails over this route until military posts are established along this route.

I therefore respectfully ask that this route may be discontinued.

Judge Kidder presented this. Judge Kidder is the gentleman in whom Mr. Brady had so much confidence that after he went out of office he said he had put up the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls for Judge Kidder, and did not propose to put it down for Mr. Bennett, his successor. Judge Kidder was an important factor. He was so able to judge of the necessities of the service that Brady gave that much deference to him. And yet Brady indorsed this application:

Judge Kidder presents this with the statement that he has reason to believe that the facts set forth therein are correct, though he does not know of his personal knowledge.

That paper was accompanied, also, by the application of Mr. Boone, made on behalf of these defendants, stating that the route was entirely unnecessary, and asking that it be discontinued. Yet this route, which, on the 28th of June, 1878, they were able to say was so utterly unnecessary that it must be discontinued, they want now in another phase of the question to have you believe was so important that when, on the 11th of July, 1878, Stephen W. Dorsey sent Mr. Rerdell west he was sure it would be expedited, and therefore it is quite likely he may have told Mr. Rerdell so. And when John W. Dorsey went West, in the middle of April, 1878, two months before they represented the utter uselessness of this route, and went to Bismarck, arriving at Bismarck some time in the month of June, prior to the time when this petition was submitted to the department, Mr. John W. Dorsey was able to tell Mr. Pennell that there would be increase and that there would be expedition, and that that increase and that expedition would be obtained by two separate orders, one of which would come within six months and the other within a year, and both of which did follow. Yet they say that the certainty of expedition in view of the location of the route was such that that accounts for this conversation. Gentlemen, it is an insult to your intelligence to dwell further upon that point.

But John W. Dorsey did not talk only to Pennell out there—he talked to Pennell and tried to induce Pennell to become a contractor and take half of the route and furnish the stock, as Pennell says—but he talked to others. Out by the camp-fire, after he had been to see General Miles, and when he was coming eastward from Fort Keogh, somewhere near the Little Missouri, it seems there was apparently some dissatisfaction among his men and a feeling that they might not get their pay. We see now that money was not a plentiful commodity with them apparently. There was what was described by the witnesses as a “kick,” and it was necessary for John W. Dorsey to quiet these parties, and, as they say, he had a conversation with them. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that Lambert, McLellan, Cable, and, I think, Swift, all testified to similar conversations out there with John W. Dorsey, but they are not all the same conversations as I gather. My impression is that Lambert’s conversation was a conversation that he had personally with John W. Dorsey apart from the others. That is the inference that I draw from the statement here. I read from page 2175. After stating that he met Dorsey in September, 1878, and he had conversation with him, the testimony goes on:

Q. Was anything said about any change on the route?—A. There was. I was talking to him about the route, and he said he expected to make a good route out of it.

Q. Did he say how?—A. He said the route would be expedited.

Q. Anything more?—A. That was all that time, I believe.

Q. Did you have any other conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir; after I got on the road.

Lambert had applied to him for employment on the road.

Q. What was it then?—A. I came in and complained to him about the road being in the condition it was, and he said to wait, that there would be plenty there to build up the road. He said, “You can’t blame me. I am not the one that is doing it.” He said, “My brother will have everything on here and make a good road out of it.”

Q. When was that?—A. That was in January—my first trip in there with the mail.

Lambert was employed as a mail carrier, and went over the route. He said the first conversation was before he was employed, and the second conversation was after he was employed and went over the route. He was cross-examined as to that, and he fixes the first conversation as having taken place at the Merchant’s Hotel in Bismarck. As to the second conversation, I read from page 2179:

I started in on him about the condition that the road was in. It was not equipped or anything of the kind. He told me it was not his fault; that his brother was running that part of the business; that he was doing the best he could.

Q. His brother ran that part of the business?—A. That was understood; that his brother was putting up the money for it.

So much for Lambert. Then, on page 2656, we have the testimony of McLellan. McLellan says that he saw John W. Dorsey on the route between Bismarck and Fort Keogh, and he conversed with him in July or August. I will read from his testimony:

He told us that he intended to have the service increased. In about three months, I think, he expected a tri-weekly service, and in about three months after that he expected a daily service.

Q. Did he say anything about the profits or cost of it?—A. Yes, sir; he said that while they were having a weekly service they expected to lose money on it, but when it was increased and the time expedited, they expected to make a very good thing of it.

Q. Were any sums named?—A. I think he mentioned $150,000 as the sum to be realized.

Q. Did he say anything about how he expected to get it increased?—A. Yes, sir; he told us that his brother, Senator Dorsey, was chairman of the Post-Office Committee, I believe it was, and through his influence he expected to get the increase, or partly through his influence.

Q. Did he say anything as to who was interested in the route?—A. He did not say who all of the parties were.

Q. Did he name any?—A. I don't remember any, excepting Senator Dorsey and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. He named him, did he?—A. He did not give the name; only the position.

Q. Was anything said about the way the service was to be performed?—A. I do not understand.

Q. Was anything said about performing the service on time or anything in that connection?—A. I think he said at one time he did not care whether they got through on time or not; that they expected to draw pay just the same.

On cross-examination Mr. McLellan was asked to state the precise language, and said he could not give the precise language.

I read from page 2658:

I said before that I could not give the language in full, but I can give this part of it: He said they had organized a ring in Washington. I don't know whether he said that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was in that ring. Anyhow I understood that the ring had an understanding with him.

Q. Are you giving the language now?—A. No, sir.

Q. Go back and tell me when you stopped giving the language?—A. Just after this part of it; he said they had organized a ring in Washington.

Q. Give his words right, then?—A. That is all of his words that I can give.

Q. Did he say "they" have, or "we" have?—A. "They" have.

Q. Was "they" the word he used?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. "They have organized a ring in Washington?"—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You recollect that distinctly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect that that was the exact form of the expression?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. "They have organized a ring in Washington?"—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell who was in the ring?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Whom did he mean by "they," if he did not tell who was in it?—A. Well, I gathered from his conversation that he meant himself and Senator Dorsey and others. I do not know who the others were.

Q. Himself and Senator Dorsey and others?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you who the others were?—A. No, sir.

Then he was questioned as to the circumstances under which he first mentioned this conversation, and it appeared that he mentioned it to a post-office inspector in Bismarck or Omaha, or somewhere there, some two years ago, and that he mentioned it to Mr. Ker before he went on the stand. He says that this conversation occurred at Beaver Creek, and he mentioned among the people who were present Charles McLaughlin and Mr. Cable, who was examined. Now, on page 2666, Mr. Cable was examined. I will read from his testimony:

A. We met Mr. Dorsey that evening on his return from Miles City; we met him that day in the afternoon some time, and that night we rode very late, and the men of the crew working for him was very angry at having to work so long, and rather thought it was Mr. Dorsey's fault, I guess, and they made some kick, and wanted to go back, and others thought they had no other way of getting their pay, and for this reason Mr. Dorsey gave this conversation when they made this—

Q. [Interposing.] Kick?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the conversation?—A. I don't think I can give the conversation.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same objection as before.

Q. You can give the substance of it?—A. I think I can.

Q. Well, what was it?—A. Well, he said that in the first place they did not expect to make any money out of the contract under the first bid or at the figures they had it at that time, but they took these contracts low in the first place to keep out small bids, or to be sure of getting the contracts, knowing that they would have an increase of service.

Q. What else?—A. He said they would get the increase with the influence of his brother, Senator Dorsey.

Q. Did he state how the influence was exercised?

Then came an interruption and the witness says he will give the whole conversation as well as he can, and goes on:

I believe he said with the influence his brother had over the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; he did not mention any name. He also said there was a ring formed here in Washington, but I don't remember as he said at that time what that ring was formed for.

Q. Anything else that you remember?—A. Not at present; no, sir.

Q. Was anything said about the amount of increase, or anything of that sort?—A. Well, he spoke of what their pay would be at the end of the year if it was increased as he expected. He said the pay would be $150,000.

He gave that amount a little high. Then the examination goes into another matter, which I will not take up now. Gentlemen, one conversation was sworn to by Lambert as having been a personal conversation with himself before he was employed and again after he had been over the route and complained to him about the condition of the route, Mr. Lambert had an entirely different conversation. We have Mr. Cable and Mr. McLellan swearing to their conversation in substantially the same language and giving substantially the same facts and yet with sufficient variations to show that they did not come on the stand here to relate a concerted story. Against that I am bound to say in frankness is the statement of Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey tells you that that is not true. Mr. Dorsey says, in denying the statement of Mr. McLellan, that it is a lie out of whole cloth and it is absurd to suppose he would tell anybody such a thing. He says he did not do it, but he admits the occurrence, admits meeting those parties there at that time, admits the long service, and undertakes to say that there could not have been any question with reference to pay, because they had plenty of money. Yet when he was met with a letter which he had himself written to Washington, complaining of the want of money, he undertook to make out that that related to a somewhat subsequent time. I think I may say, without going into the details, that he entirely failed to establish that point. This same conversation is referred to again on page 4147. There Mr. Dorsey goes into the details of the whole occurrence, describing how they met and how they were out very late that night, but undertaking to say that the conversation was not true. It therefore stands in this way, gentlemen: That Mr. John W. Dorsey is stated by Mr. Pennell to have had a conversation with him in which he declared that the route would be increased and the service expedited, and the details were given. He is stated by Mr. Lambert to have had a conversation with him in which he said substantially that the route would be increased, and that his brother would see that it was arranged; and he is stated by Cable and McLellan to have had a conversation with them in which he repeated all the things I have said to you. He is put upon the stand, and in a quasi way he denies the conversation with Pennell, but he admits that he talked with Pennell about a partnership, and admits substantially he talked with Pennell about the expedition and increase, but undertakes to locate it as occurring after the time he saw General Miles, and undertakes to lead you to believe that he got his knowledge about the expedition from General Miles's opinion. From the beginning to the end there is one thing he does not deny or pretend to deny while on the stand, and that is the conversation with Lambert. He pretends to deny the conversation with Pennell, yet he practically admits it. He does not deny the conversation with Lambert. As to the conversation with McLellan and the conversation with Cable, both of them were present at the same time. They were both before you, honest, intelligent witnesses, having no earthly reason for committing perjury on the stand, and no earthly interest in this trial. We brought them here from their work, as we brought all these Western witnesses from their work, under a subpoena and at a very great loss and inconvenience to them. They were brought here and kept here until after their opportunities to arrange for their spring and summer work were gone. They were pestering us with applications to be allowed to go back. They were simply here as witnesses under subpoena, with no reason for telling a lie, and no reason for committing perjury upon the stand. They stated that certain things occurred, and John W. Dorsey, the man who admittedly swore to two contradictory affidavits on the same day, the man who admittedly went under some instigation, or his own instigation, to Pennell and Lounsberry with regard to the paper post-office, by which, reckoning the amount upon the ultimate expedition, $12,000 a year would have been fraudulently taken from the Treasury; the man who is on trial for his liberty and his character, if he has any character, with all his interests at stake—that man expects you to believe him as against the witnesses I have first named. I shall satisfy you, gentlemen, before I get through, that beyond all dispute John W. Dorsey lied upon the stand as to some matters, and yet he asks you to believe that his statement is correct, and that Cable, McLellan, Lambert, and Pennell are liars. I do not think, gentlemen, you are going to believe anything of that kind.

Now, as to this side post-office. I only want to refer to it for the purpose of showing that Mr. John W. Dorsey, by his own confession, did undertake to get that side post-office put on, and that he went to Mr. Lounsberry, the postmaster at Bismarck, about it. Mr. Lounsberry was not a witness who placed himself very efficiently at the service of the Government, and therefore did not volunteer to give us any information, and when he was first on the stand we had no knowledge that Mr. Dorsey had any conversation or anything to do with Mr. Lounsberry upon this subject; but after Mr. Lounsberry went off the stand John W. Dorsey came to him and told him he was glad that he had not been examined about that side post-office business, because it would have made rather a bad show. That coming to our knowledge, Mr. Lounsberry was put back on the stand and swore that John W. Dorsey did come to him with a petition seeking to have a post-office established at a fictitious place sixty miles off the road, by a spur, somewhere near the Little Missouri River, and then it appeared that Mr. Dorsey, when the witness had left the stand the first time, admitted to him that he had had that conversation, and said it was the one crooked thing that he had been engaged in. It is the old story of the young lady, gentlemen, "Such a little one." Mr. Dorsey asks you to believe that. Mr. Dorsey was engaged in the business of establishing a fraudulent side post-office at a cost to the Government of $12,000 a year, if you take the rate of the ultimate expedition upon that route. John W. Dorsey said he was utterly green in post-office matters and did not know anything about expedition even until that expert in post-office matters, General Nelson A. Miles, told him about expedition out there, and then he learned something about expedition, but did not know anything else about the post-office business. Rerdell put him up to it. Rerdell is the man upon whom all these people want to put all their rascality from the time he came upon the witness-stand. Rerdell is the gigantic rascal who conceived all the iniquity that there is in this case. Rerdell is the man whom they have followed, and whose bidding they have done, and yet Rerdell was working on a salary of $3,000 a year, and all the advantages and the emoluments that were to come out of all these crooked things were to do Mr. Rerdell no possible good, but were to redound to the benefit of these defendants. Mr. John W. Dorsey asks you to believe that he did this thing at the instigation of Rerdell. He admits that he did it at the instigation of Rerdell, and wants you also to believe the Cable, McLellan, and company are lying about the other crooked thing that they declared he told them about. Suppose we take it as true that he did what he did about the paper post-office at the instigation of Rerdell. Where, then, do they land? Rerdell is a gentleman who came into this business, according to their theory, on the 11th day of July. They say Mr. Rerdell had nothing to do with it before that, except that he did on one night assist in making out the bids, but that was all that Rerdell had to do with the business up to that time. Mr. John W. Dorsey was a bidder, and Mr. John W. Dorsey was interested. In the middle of April, 1878, he started out on his western trip to put on the service, and he picked up a little knowledge of postal business, because, although he did not know anything about expedition, he knew enough to tell General Miles that if they undertook to give too much service the contractors would throw their contracts down. Vaile says he did not know that. But this innocent Mr. Dorsey did these things because Rerdell told him to. I think it quite likely that Mr. Rerdell did advise just that thing. If I mistake not Mr. Rerdell said that he did advise just that thing. But Mr. Rerdell says another thing. Mr. Rerdell says that before he left here on the 11th of July Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey handed him the blanks for the establishment of a post-office. They were not petitions. The department has a regular blank form gotten up which requires certain details of information and certain certificates. Mr. Rerdell says that before he left here Stephen W. Dorsey gave him those blanks and instructed him to see that this post-office was gotten up. He says that he went there with those papers, and in pursuance of those instructions did communicate with John W. Dorsey and did give the papers to John W. Dorsey, which John W. Dorsey admittedly took to Lounsberry, if not to Pennell, and that was the origin of the side post-office. Gentlemen, is not that explanation consistent with common sense? Rerdell knew nothing about post-office business. He went out on the 11th of July at Dorsey's request to spend his vacation in the West on this business; staid there less than ten days, I believe, and then came back. He knew nothing about it. He had no interest in the matter. Is it not consistent, gentlemen, with common sense to believe that Stephen W. Dorsey, who was the originator of this grand conspiracy, this grand scheme to defraud the United States, then being in the Senate of the United States, was the man who originated this idea, as he originated, in our opinion, the whole scheme of fraud, and that he gave Rerdell these blanks? The idea of getting up a side post-office was suggested to Dorsey by the fact that the route was advertised at two hundred and fifty miles and under the contract was stated at two hundred and fifty miles, when it turned out, on information, which the records show Stephen W. Dorsey obtained from General Rosser, the engineer of the Northern Pacific Railroad, that the distance was three hundred and three miles to the one intermediate point, and three hundred and ten miles to the terminal point. Dorsey got that information for the department and filed it in the department, and the result was that it was clear that they had to perform three hundred and ten miles of service upon that route for only two hundred and fifty miles of allowance. As Miner says in his letter asking the discontinuance of the route, they never knew of such a case as that before where there was such a discrepancy. That was one of the reasons why he asked that the route should be discontinued. But Stephen W. Dorsey knew something better than that. He knew of a better plan than getting a route discontinued. They were carrying the mail sixty miles further than they supposed the distance to be when they bid, and therefore Stephen W. Dorsey gets the papers to locate an alleged post-office and determines to have it sixty miles off the route. He was going to make up his sixty miles in that fashion. He gave those papers to Rerdell, with his instructions on the subject, and Rerdell gave them to John W. Dorsey. John W. Dorsey undertook to put the plan in operation until he was met by the opposition of the honest Pennell and the honest postmaster at Bismarck. Is not that the common-sense explanation of this thing? It is admitted that John W. Dorsey had the papers, and that John W. Dorsey took the papers to Lounsberry, if not to Pennell, and undertook to get the side post-office. How came John W. Dorsey to do it? John W. Dorsey says he did it at the instigation of Rerdell. What was Rerdell's interest in doing that thing. At that time he was not even on a salary, but was simply spending his vacation to aid Dorsey. Rerdell tells you he did it because Dorsey told him to do it, and gave him the papers with which it was to be done. I submit, gentlemen, that you cannot have any doubt upon that subject. John W. Dorsey by his own admission was engaged in this conspiracy, and admitted that he was engaged in it at the instigation of Rerdell. It seems to me that you will plainly see it was in reality at the instigation of Stephen W. Dorsey and for the benefit of both.

Again, with reference to other evidence of prearrangement I will refer to declarations made by these parties of what would be done, and which came about promptly as being done. Upon the route from Rawlins to White River Mr. Rankin was examined as a witness. Mr. Rankin says that Mr. John W. Dorsey was out there, and that he had an interview with him, after Rerdell had been there some time, in the latter part of June or July, 1879. I will read to you from his testimony, on page 2057:

Q. What was that conversation?—A. He talked to me in Rawlins something about me taking the contract to carry the mail. I told him that I did not want to have anything to do with it; that I had not time. Him and me traveled the next day, or two days afterwards, anyhow me and him traveled from Rawlins to Omaha together on the train, and we talked it all over. I told him there was no money for me in carrying the mail, and he said he expected to have extra service; that it would be made tri-weekly, and there would be some money in it.

Q. Did he say anything how he was going to get that service?—A. The conversation came up just like it did, as near as I can recollect, when Mr. Rerdell was there, that we were a great way west there and it took a long time to get anything done out there.

Q. Who said that?—A. I said that.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said that he had a brother that was a Senator, and through his influence he could get it done pretty soon, or something to that effect.

Q. Did he say anything further in that connection? Did he mention anybody else?—A. I do not think Mr. Dorsey did mention anybody. If he did, I don't recollect it.

Mr. Rankin referred to a previous conversation with Rerdell in which Rerdell had made some similar statement, in which he said that through Senator Dorsey and Brady the service would be put on at once. That conversation was had in Rankin's presence, and then afterward Dorsey came out there and he had the conversation I have read. Rankin says it came up just as it did, as near as he could recollect, when Rerdell was there, and goes on and narrates the conversation which I have read. With reference to that route from Rawlins to White River I will call your attention to one very singular fact, and that is the letter which Mr. Rerdell wrote in February, 1881. I would like to call your attention to the language of that letter. It is found on page 2077. Mr. Rerdell writes from Washington:

If you will get up petitions asking that the route be made six or seven times a week, I can get the increase. Get the officers at White to both sign petition and write letters to the Postmaster-General, asking for an increase.

P. S.—This must be done at once, so that I can get it by the 1st of March.

There is a letter that arrived at Rawlins. The very day it arrived there they set to work getting up a petition and it was circulated around the bar-rooms at Rawlins. They got the petition. The letter was sent on up the route to Adams, who undertook to get a petition signed by the officers at White River. He got a couple of names, and he got such a blowing up from the commandant for undertaking to be engaged in such a fraud that he went no further and never forwarded that petition here. The Rawlins petition was duly sent here. It did not get here by the 1st of March. It did not get here by the time General Garfield's administration came into office on the 4th of March, which, as we claim, was the whole object in having it here by the 1st of March. It got here upon the 7th or 8th of March. Upon that day, promptly, Thomas J. Brady did precisely what Mr. Rerdell, writing out to Rawlins, said he would do. He made the order for the increase of trips and added four trips to that route, upon which the mail at that time was very small, because most of the soldiers had gone. He made the order adding four trips, and, in violation of the spirit if not the letter of the law of the 7th of April, 1880, he allowed for those four trips $18,275, though the original pay on the route per trip was only $1,750. He allowed that large sum by an order made on the 8th of March. When that order met the eye of Mr. James he directed him to revoke it. Mr. Brady did not revoke it. He went out of office leaving it unrevoked, and the money was paid out of the Treasury until we entered upon this investigation in the fall of 1881. Then we found this order unrevoked, and it was revoked pretty quickly. Mr. Brady's only excuse for not revoking the order is that he told Mr. James he wanted a written order. He undertakes to tell you that he thinks Mr. James's conversation with him was about some routes in Texas, and he refers to a letter which he produced. That letter related on its face to orders which had not been issued, and said, "Don't issue the orders until I see you again." He says Mr. James's conversation with him was about that; but Mr. James says it was about this order, and it was caused by his seeing the order upon the journal of the day. The order had been made and he directed that it be revoked. He gave the direction not to Brady but to one of the other officers, and Brady then came to him and wanted to know whether that direction showed that economy was to be the policy of his administration, and he was told that it did. Then he undertakes to say that he had the impudence to tell his superior officer that he would not revoke the order unless he was given written directions to that effect; and never having received a written order the order never was revoked. Gentlemen, I do not think you will believe anything of that kind.

On this question of prearrangement let me pass along to some other matters which go to show that there can be no possibility in connection with this matter except the theory that will account for the affidavits to which I have called your attention, to wit, collusion and prearrangement between these defendants. Mr. Miner, in the name of Miner, Peck & Co., on the 9th of July, 1878, writes to J. Chauncey Hayes, who was a witness on the stand from California, with whom he had been negotiating:

With regard to increase of 46132, our contract specifies rate of pay. In case of increase we do not care to go on making new bargains for four years, and are surprised that you as a business man should ask it.

The letter indicates that the question of increase had already come up as early as the 9th of July, 1878, only nine days after the service commenced. On the 3d of August there is another letter:

DEAR SIR: Yours 23d received. Increases can only be obtained by our joint efforts. They are based upon petitions from the citizens along the route—

Brady says they are based upon petitions from citizens up in the Capitol—but it requires active work here to consummate them; therefore, according to the terms of the contract, the benefits are to be shared.

We are willing to increase your compensation $12 per year, which is just what it would have cost us had your error been made known to us in time. This is really more than could be claimed, as the change made in your copy of the contract was without our knowledge or consent.

That apparently refers to some other matter. Then, on the 19th of September, there is another letter:

DEAR SIR: Yours 1st and 4th received. Increased speed is very seldom ordered—

Increase of speed is very seldom ordered. Was that true, gentlemen, under Mr. Brady? It may have been true under Mr. Brady's predecessors, but was it true under Mr. Brady—and never without special labor here and considerable expense.

What expense was to be incurred here in procuring an order for increase of speed? Can you imagine, has anybody undertaken to tell you, did Miner on the stand undertake to suggest what expense, could be incurred for increase of speed?

Your ideas as to how things are managed are very erroneous.

Very clearly they were. Mr. Hayes imagined things were managed honestly.

You seem to fancy that everything is done on the route and nothing here, which is quite a mistake.

Now, what can you infer from that except that Mr. Miner told Mr. Hayes over his own name that they had to incur expenses here in getting increase of speed? Can there be any inference whatever, except that the expense incurred was an illegitimate expense? Could there be any honest expense incurred here in getting an increase of speed? There was some subsequent correspondence with Hayes, which it does not occur to me has any bearing on the subject that I am now considering. Let us see what Mr. Miner says when given a full opportunity to explain these letters. On page 4274, Mr. Miner's attention was called to this matter and he was asked :

What do you mean by "active work here?"—A. I mean what I say.

Q. You mean active work, and that is all you have to explain?—A. That is all.

Then he was asked what he meant by the phrase :

Increased speed is very seldom ordered, and never without special labor here and considerable expense.

And he answered that he meant precisely what he said.

Q. "Never ordered without considerable expense here?"—A. I meant precisely what the letter said.

Q. Precisely what it said?—A. Yes, sir; if you want to know the circumstances under which that letter was written, I can tell you.

Q. You can make any explanation you want. I want to know what you meant by saying "considerable expense?"—A. I can explain the whole matter. Mr. Hayes had a postmaster out there by the name of Scipio Craig, who was a schoolmate of "Tom Brady," as he called him, and he thought that anything he asked, whether reasonable or not, could be done.

That seems to indicate that Mr. Brady's school-boy days were very much like his manhood :

Q. And you wanted to satisfy him that it could not?—A. I wanted to satisfy him that it required the indorsements of his members of Congress from California, and there is another letter in the case that so states.

Q. Is that your only explanation?—A. That is all.

Q. What did you mean by considerable expense?—A. I was at the expense of living here.

Q. You meant that?—A. I did.

He was asked what he meant by the expression "special labor here and considerable expense," and he said, "I was at the expense of living here."

Q. Then if you were at the expense of living here, and you meant that only, why did you refer to the expense in connection with increased speed, and say that increased speed required special labor here and considerable expense?—A. Because his letter that that was a reply to related only to increased speed.

Q. That is your explanation, is it?—A. That is my explanation, sir.

Q. That is your explanation of why you told him that increased speed required considerable expense here?—A. Yes, sir; and furthermore, Mr. Hayes was of the opinion that if any expedition was ordered on that route he ought to have it all, and I was trying to make a good trade with him.

Q. You wanted to make him believe you were at heavy expense in order to appreciate your services and to depreciate his?—A. I did, sir.

Q. That is, you wanted to deceive him, did you?—A. It would so appear.

Q. Is it a fact?—A. I think it is.

Q. Then when you said that it required expense here you told him a lie, did you?—

A. Well, sir, I was not under oath when I wrote that letter.

Now, is it necessary, gentlemen, to dwell any more upon the character or the evidence of a man who comes on the stand and deliberately tells you such a story as that? He says that the language "special labor and considerable expense" is explained by saying that he was at the expense of living here, and then, when he is pressed with the statement that he confined the expense to expedition, he said, "Well, I lied to him, and I was not under oath." It does not seem to me, gentlemen, that there is any necessity of wasting much more time or paying much more attention to Mr. Miner in this connection, or to anything else that he says in this case. But I may say in passing that he undertakes to fix that up by referring in his explanation to something about a postmaster out there having an idea that, being a schoolmate of "Tom Brady's," it could be done in that way. Unfortunately that letter was written on the 19th of September, 1878. There is another letter from Miner on the 9th of October, 1878, and it is not until the 2d of November, in reply to a letter of the 26th of October, that any mention is introduced into the correspondence about Tom Brady's schoolmate, the postmaster, or anything of that kind. This letter referring to special labor and considerable expense was written on the 19th of September, 1878, and mention of the schoolmate of Tom Brady does not appear until the 11th of November following, or about six weeks after that letter of Miner had been written in which he talked about the expense.

Again, as to the evidences of prearrangement, take Mr. Moore's statement of the instructions to him. I shall have something to say directly as to Mr. Moore, but for the moment I pass that and simply call your attention to what Mr. Moore stated. On page 1370 Mr. Moore states:

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey told me I could insure the subcontractors that the service would be increased and expedited, and I used my own terms to convince them that it would be.

Under that authority Mr. Moore told Mr. McBean, out in Oregon, that this would be done. I only refer to it now as showing you that the statement of Mr. Moore that Mr. Dorsey gave him that authority is not a manufactured statement at this time, and under the circumstances of the case. There can be no question, at any rate, that Mr. Moore did make this statement. Mr. Moore was sent West with the verbal directions of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, and with the written power of attorney of John R. Miner, which written power of attorney he surrendered to John R. Miner.

We called upon Mr. Miner to produce that paper, but he did not dare to produce it. This power of attorney authorized Moore to do certain things out there. Acting under the power of attorney, and with the verbal directions of Stephen W. Dorsey, Moore went West, and in Oregon he found Mr. McBean. He was trying to induce Mr. McBean to take the contract on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route. I read from page 1606, from the testimony of McBean:

A. In the first place I met him in Canyon City with Mr. Williamson. They wanted me to take the contract to carry half of that route. They asked me what I would do it for. I told him I would do it for $150—

He was to take the contract to run half of the route for $150, and Thomas J. Brady shortly afterwards was paying from the Treasury for the whole of that route over $50,000—as I was running the military mail. Then Williamson came around and told me they could not pay that. Then him and Moore went off together and talked awhile—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Has he any right to tell what Williamson told him?

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want what Williamson told him.

Q. My question was limited to your conversation with Moore?—A. Mr. Moore says to me in Canyon City, "I will give you $50. You take that $50 a month, and when I get to Camp Harney I will make you know that this route will be increased and expedited." I says, "All right, I will be none the loser by it. I will take the $50 a month," and consequently I took it.

Q. Did you go with him to Camp Harney?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did he make known to you that it would be expedited and increased?—A. By papers and documents he had with him.

Q. What did he say?—A. He told me that they had enough influence—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] I object to that, your honor, and reserve an exception.

Mr. WILSON. That is after he made the contract.

Q. Had you made the contract at the time of the conversation you are now speaking of?—A. Yes, sir; I made the contract with him in Canyon City with the understanding that he was to prove—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Hold on.

Mr. MERRICK. Go on and state the understanding.

A. [Continuing.] Says he, "When I go with you in the morning to Camp Harney," which he did, "you need not be afraid," or something of that kind. Says he, "It is only for a month or so, and then we will get this expedited." I says, "How do I know that?" He says, "I will show you everything when I get to Harney in the morning."

Q. Did he tell you by what process or through whom that expedition was to be made?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, what did he say?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

The COURT. That is within the scope of the ruling already made; what was done in pursuance of that power of attorney to make the contract.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I except.

Mr. HENKLE. I except, also.

Q. Go on and state through whom and how; who did he speak for?—A. He told me that they had influence in the Senate and also in the Post-Office Department to get anything they asked for.

Mr. WILSON. Does your honor say that is competent?

The COURT. No; that is not competent.

Then there was considerable discussion among counsel, and finally the court held that the witness could state nothing more than what he had there stated, I think, and could not go further into the statements made to him. Then on cross-examination there was some further testimony, and they undertook to raise the question as to whether this conversation did not occur with Williamson. Mr. Williamson was sitting here all the time by the side of Mr. Miner. Mr. McBean stated that a considerable portion of the conversation was not in the presence of Mr. Williamson. If Mr. Williamson could have contradicted anything that Mr. McBean stated Mr. Moore told him—and Mr. Moore said the same thing—would not Mr. Williamson have been put on the stand? Mr. Williamson is the partner of Mr. Vaile, and was his representative out there. Moore undoubtedly made that representation out there. Then there is this further passage of testimony from McBean that is very significant. After the court had ruled that he could not go any further than he had done, came this question:

Did the expedition and the increase follow as promised?—A. No, sir.

There our friends on the other side pricked up their ears with great relief—

He promised it should be increased and then afterwards expedited. It was increased and expedited at the same time.

That is the way that the promise that Stephen W. Dorsey authorized Mr. Moore to make, and which Mr. Moore did make to Mr. McBean, and which Mr. McBean testified about, was carried out. They lived up to that statement because it was a promise which it was for their benefit to keep. McBean said it was increased and expedited at the same time. We find that that conversation having occurred not far from September or October, 1878, on the 23d of December, 1878, Mr. Brady made an order expediting the route and increasing the service and allowing therefor $18,612. But Mr. Moore had another conversation. He had a conversation with Mr. Major. Mr. Major was a contractor of the firm of Major & Culverhouse on the route from Redding to Alturas. I read from page 1441:

When Mr. Moore came to Redding he was referred to me, as I was in the business of carrying the mails. He wanted to make a contract with me to carry that mail from Redding to Alturas, and I asked him on what terms. He said he wanted me to carry it for four years. I said, "In its present condition I do not want it at all. It would not pay horse-feed."

It was then two trips, and the time was one hundred and eight hours the pay being $5,988, or about $2,900 a trip.

He says, "If I make a contract with you I will assure you that the trips will be increased." I asked him by what assurance, and he then showed me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Showed you what?

The WITNESS. A power of attorney.

Then there was some objection to Mr. Ingersoll's interfering at that stage, and the witness went on:

He showed me the power of attorney and read it over, and I was looking over his shoulder, and it was signed by Miner, Peck, and Dorsey. He says, "I will state, furthermore, that you will have an increased trip before the service commences." I says, "That is pretty good." I believe that was about what was said in regard to it, with the exception of what was said about Senator Dorsey. He said that—

The COURT. You need not say what he said about Senator Dorsey.

The WITNESS. Well, that was the conversation between us.

Q. Did he say anything about expedition?—A. Yes; he said that in the course of time we would get the trips increased to six times a week and expedition, and he said, "You can get that by circulating petitions," which we did do.

Then there was some more discussion. He says that he made a contract.

Q. What happened in reference to the realization of the representations he had made subsequently?—A. It came just as he had said.

Q. What came first?—A. The one trip.

Q. What time; before you started?—A. Before we commenced the service.

Q. What came next?—A. Three trips and expedition.

Q. What came next?—A. Then there was another trip.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, well, the records will show.

Q. It came just as he said?—A. About as he said. He said in the course of several months after we started in we could get it six times a week.

Q. I think you have testified what Moore said in reference to the circulation of petitions?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not think he did.

The COURT. He said something about that.

A. Yes; he told me to circulate petitions for the increase and forward them to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. WILSON. I do not want to interrupt you, but possibly you have made a slip of the tongue. Did I understand you to say that Mr. McBean said he carried the military mail for $275 a year?

Mr. BLISS. He said $275 for a month, as I recollect it. I am not sure as to that.

Mr. WILSON. It was $270 a month.

Mr. BLISS. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. I think you said year.

Mr. BLISS. I was not sure about the time. I presume you are right. However that may be it is unimportant in the connection in which I spoke of it. Two hundred and seventy dollars a month for carrying the mail to Camp Harney was a pretty small sum in comparison with the amount which Mr. Brady paid from the Treasury.

Now, we have Mr. Moore telling Mr. McBean that certain things would be done, and they were done. We have Mr. Moore telling Mr. Major that certain things would be done; that, first, there would be one trip added before the service began. There was one trip added. Everything was done precisely as he said. He said that he made that statement on the verbal authority of Stephen W. Dorsey and by virtue of a written power of attorney of Mr. Miner, which they do not dare to produce. That the testimony is true that Moore made the statements to McBean and Major cannot be disputed. Now, how could Moore make them? What did Moore know about it? How could Moore predict anything about it when it was a matter at that time in which he was not interested except upon a salary? I think the interview of McBean was on his second trip after he had become interested, but his interview with Major was on his first trip, when he had no interest in the service.

Mr. HENKLE. Do you mean to say that the instructions were contained in the power of attorney?

Mr. BLISS. I mean to say that you did not dare to produce the power of attorney, and the inference is against you on that account. We did not know what was in it. But, acting under that power of attorney, he made certain statements which turned out to be true. Moore was not in a position to be able to know beforehand that those statements would be true, or to bring those things about. But Miner and Dorsey were in a position to know that they would become true and to bring them about. If you would produce the power of attorney you might be permitted to claim that there was nothing of the kind in it.

In the same connection, and before I go any farther, inasmuch as we have had under consideration this question of expense, let us notice one other statement that Mr. Moore makes. After he had first been West on a salary, and had come back here in the summer, and they wanted to engage him, he had a conversation with Miner, whom he had met at Denver, and Miner told him he could not make any arrangement with him to give him an interest in the business without authority from Dorsey. He then came on here and saw Dorsey, and unquestionably received from Dorsey a payment of a certain sum of money. He had a conversation, as he says, with Dorsey:

A. He asked if I had had any talk with Mr. Miner in regard to it. I told him I had. He wanted to know whether Mr. Miner was willing to agree to it. He said he could not make any contract, but as soon as Mr. Miner came he would have him draw up a contract to that effect, and give me one-quarter of the profits for four years in that service, ~~me~~ to give my time—

That is limited to the geographical region up there. I am reading from page 1373—but my expenses in traveling, and so forth, to be taken out of the general fund before there was a division of profits.

On the next page, 1374:

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about your profits, &c.?—A. Yes, sir; I made the same proposition to him that I had to Mr. Miner, or that Mr. Miner had made to me. I told him I was willing to give him my time, but my expenses must be taken out of the general fund before there was a division of the profits.

Mr. Miner says that it required active labor, and there is a good deal of expense about expedition. Dorsey says that it required money to hold the influence that they had with the department, and he makes a stipulation when he is arranging with Moore for taking an interest in the business that the expenses necessary in keeping up their influence with the department must first be taken out of the fund before there is any division of the profits. Well, gentlemen, if you were going into a partnership to run a stage line, certainly before you divided your profits you should pay the expense of the grease to put upon your axles.

Following along a little further this question of representations made before the occurrences, and showing that these gentlemen were getting profits—gentlemen, they spelled it prophets and profits, both—we find that there was some similar conversation with Mr. Fisk, also up in Oregon. Fisk was sent out on the route with Mr. Moore, and he says, at page 1678:

Well, Mr. Moore came and wanted me to go out and run the route from Canyon City to Baker City. He said that he had purchased Mr. Schutz's stock, and Mr. Schutz would go out with me and put the stock on the road. He said afterwards that probably Mr. Schutz would not be there, and in case he was not there at any time—

Then comes an objection. There always comes an objection when it comes to a critical point in the evidence.

Q. Well, you were to go out?—A. In the absence of Mr. Schutz or himself I was to take charge of the road.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We do not want any more of that, I suppose.

A. [Continuing.] I told him that a semi-weekly was the hardest route to stock that there was.

Mr. HENKLE. I object to that.

Mr. BLISS. This is all introductory, sir.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We object.

The COURT. The objection is overruled.

Mr. HENKLE. I note an exception.

Q. What did he say to that?—A. He said it was only temporary; that as soon as I could get the papers to Washington and back it would be increased.

Q. Did he say to what extent it would be increased?—A. I don't think he did exactly say to what extent.

Then he has a conversation also about the same time with Mr. Schutz, and Mr. Schutz testifies to it on page 1709:

Q. Did Mr. Moore say anything to you at that time with reference to petitions?—

A. Mr. Moore stated he represented a powerful contracting company—

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] I object to that.

The COURT. The objection is overruled.

Mr. HENKLE. I except.

A. [Continuing.]—and that they would hereafter control all the contracts in the far Northwest, and while he had to look after other routes, he appointed me agent to run that route from The Dalles to Baker, to all intents and purposes, by reason of my having run it before, I believe. He wanted me to get up petitions, and said that any petition they could get up they would get granted, because, as he represented, they owned the department.

Mr. HENKLE. I object to that.

Mr. WILSON. Is that competent?

The COURT. I have excluded evidence of that kind uniformly.

Mr. WILSON. I want that stricken out then.

The COURT. It is stricken out.

Mr. BLISS. What portion of it is stricken out?

The COURT. That this party owned the department.

So that is the way the answer stands.

would get granted.

He wanted me to get up petitions, and said that any petition they could get up they Remember, gentlemen, this is out in Oregon, in the immediate region of the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt operations, where Miner revealed in the alterations of petitions.

Q. Was anything said about the number of petitions?—A. Not any more than that I should circulate petitions very extensively, and all that I had to do was to get one or two original petitions, and they would doctor them up and get as many as they wanted.

Mr. HENKLE. I object to that.

Mr. MERRICK. That was in reference to getting up the petitions.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is that proper, if the court please—what they were going to do?

Then comes in some discussion, after which the court says:

Yes; within that power you can interrogate the witness.

The court allowed it to stand. So there we have Mr. Moore's statements showing not only a prearrangement, not only that they were going to get the service increased, but showing also how they were going to get it increased, and that was by procuring one or two genuine petitions and then making alterations. That conversation, gentlemen, occurred in September or October, 1878, and on the 29th day of September, 1878, Mr. Brady ordered expedition and paid therefor $18,468.

Besides all this evidence of prearrangement between the parties we find this condition of things: That Mr. Dorsey goes to work, and when Mr. Boone has drawn a subcontract he alters it; it does not suit him, and he strikes out a clause and puts in a clause. On page 3871 this is quoted from the testimony which Mr. Boone gave, and it is quoted in connection with Mr. Dorsey's examination. After referring to the form of the subcontract, Mr. Boone says it was changed:

Q. Who ordered the change?—A. Mr. Dorsey ordered the change.

Q. S. W. Dorsey?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State to the jury what it was originally, and what was the change made?—A. [Reading:]

"The party of the second part further covenants and agrees that in case said service is expedited from ——— hours to ——— hours running time, that the pay shall be calculated and paid at the following rates: ——— round trips per week, ——— dollars."

That was the clause prepared by myself, and my clause was stricken out by three black lines, and a new clause inserted.

And the copies of the original subcontract were produced here showing just how they were struck out. It had been printed with that clause in, and it was put back upon the press and those three lines are struck out by black lines across them, and then there is substituted this provision:

"It is further mutually agreed by the parties hereto, that in case said service is expedited, that the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part sixty-five per centum of the amount received by said first party from the Post-Office Department on account of said expedition, in addition to the sums hereinbefore agreed to be paid."

Q. Who directed the insertion of the second clause?—A. Mr. Dorsey wrote that, I believe. [Page 3872.]

That is in Boone's testimony. Mr. Dorsey is asked about it, and he says he does not remember whether he wrote it or not. He thinks it an excellent clause. And yet you will bear in mind that it gives 65 per cent. to the man who was doing the work and leaves 35 per cent. for the contractors.

And you will bear in mind, gentlemen, that Mr. Boone, a post-office contractor, was selected because he had great experience in the business, and he swore to you that he had at that time, when he was selected, one-tenth of all the contracts upon star routes in the United States—on eleven hundred routes; I think the total was between nine thousand and ten thousand, and he had one-tenth of them. He said that no such clause about expedition had ever come to his knowledge or notice; that he knew nothing about it. But Stephen W. Dorsey, away back there, knew sufficient about expedition to appreciate the importance of keeping for the contractors 35 per cent. and giving to the men who were performing the service only 65 per cent. So, after a large mass of subcontracts had been struck from the press, which gave to the subcontractors all the increase, he directed them to be put back on the press, and this provision giving the subcontractor his money struck out and this other clause put in. Why did Stephen W. Dorsey do that if it was not because his fertile imagination had already conceived the plan of defrauding the United States, and he was making arrangements by which that fraud could be consummated?

With reference to Moore, he testifies a little further in the same connection at page 1356:

Q. What occurred between you and Senator Dorsey at that interview?

That was after Mr. Moore had been West once, I think. It is the second interview.

Q. What occurred between you and Senator Dorsey at that interview?—A. He asked me my opinion of the service.

Q. [Resuming.] What did you reply?—A. I told him I thought the service had been taken too low, but with careful management loss might be avoided.

The COURT. Who said that?

The WITNESS. I said that.

Q. Was anything else said?—A. In speaking of the service I told him I did not understand why those long routes once and twice a week should be taken so low, and he said that was a service that they wished to get; that on that service there was a chance for increase and expedition, and on the date of service there was no chance for any increase.

“Date of service” is a misprint; it should be “daily service,” and was subsequently corrected by the witness. Again, on page 1360, Mr. Moore testifies, and he testifies that at this conversation Mr. Rerdell was present:

Q. What else was said, or what else occurred between you and Dorsey at that time?—A. He showed me a bundle of blank subcontracts, and pointed out, as I had never seen them before, where they had made arrangements for once and twice and three times a week service and daily in blank, and also for a certain per cent. for expedition—a blank per cent. for expedition. This was in the printed blank form.

Q. You say you had never seen a form like that before?—A. No, sir; that was the first I had ever seen of that kind.

Q. Well, what were you to do in the service of these persons?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, I do not—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] He says that he was employed by Miner to go West at a fixed salary; that Miner, on the following day, came and told him to go to Dorsey and get instructions.

The COURT. You are right, if that is the view.

Q. [Resuming.] What did Dorsey tell you you were to do under the contract you had made with Miner?

Under this contract that they will not produce.

A. He instructed me, in making all subcontracts, to make allowance for daily service all the way through, and also for expedition.

They were to arrange with the subcontractors as to the amount they wished on daily service and on expedition, then they would know precisely how much they had got to pay out, and then they would know just how deep they must go into the Treasury here to make the requisite profit to them and to pay the expenses which had to be incurred in Washington. On page 1361:

Q. What do you mean by allowance?—A. To make my contract with the subcontractor if it was once a week's service, for twice so much, for three times so much, and so on up to daily, and a certain per cent. for expedition.

Q. What particular instructions did he further give you, if any, in reference to the rate that you were to pay for increase of service and for expedition?—A. To be sure and make my contract for the increase on the descending scale.

Q. Will you explain the descending scale?

Then counsel in chorus interposed about it being explained. Mr. Ingersoll objected. Mr. Davidge wanted to know if he “might say a word.” Mr. Henkle reserved an exception. And generally we took considerable time. Then the court ruled that he might state it.

Q. Was there anything else said by Mr. Dorsey in relation to what you understood him to mean by descending scale; was anything else said by Mr. Dorsey as to the manner in which you were to graduate payments as the running was once a week and your contract for payments in the event of three, four, five, and six times?—A. I was to make the best contract I could, both for increase and expedition.

Q. What did you understand by a descending scale?—A. I understood that if a route was once a week I was to give $500 a year for it; at twice a week I was to allow the subcontractor $700 or $800; three times a week, $1,200, and so on up to daily.

Q. Not to double up every time?—A. No, sir; not to give pro rata, as the Government allows.

Q. But to descend as you advanced?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENKLE. Does he say that that is what Dorsey said to him?

The WITNESS. I understood that, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. You will have the cross-examination of him.

Q. [Resuming.] What was said about expedition and the price you were to pay for expedition?—A. I asked in reference to that particularly. That was something I did not know anything about, and I asked what would be a fair allowance for expedition. Still, I had to make the best terms I could. I insisted on knowing what would be about right for expedition. I asked him if I averaged 40 per cent. if it would be somewhere near right. He said he considered if I averaged 40 per cent. I would be making a good contract.

Mr. HENKLE. For expedition.

The WITNESS. Forty per cent. for expedition.

Mr. HENKLE. [To Mr. Merrick.] May I ask him whether he meant 40 per cent. for the subcontractor or the contractor?

The WITNESS. Forty per cent. for the subcontractor for all expedition of service.

The COURT. That is, if the service was doubled the pay of the subcontractor would not be doubled, but 40 per cent. would be added to his pay.

Mr. MERRICK. No. I have got through with that, your honor. He says this: That as to the increase of the service where two, three, four, five trips were added, for each additional trip there was to be a descending scale, not a pro rata, but where expedition was ordered then they would receive 40 per cent. for the expedition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He said if he made contracts that would average 40 per cent.—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] He would be making a good contract.

The COURT. That is exactly what I understood.

Mr. MERRICK. I thought your honor confused the increase with the expedition.

Q. [Resuming.] That is to say, where the time was shortened the subcontractor was to get 40 per cent. and the original contractor 60 per cent. of the increased pay?—A. Yes, sir; 40 per cent. of 100. That was the way I understood it, and the way the contracts were made.

Q. Now, what else occurred between you and Dorsey at that time?—A. He gave me letters of introduction to prominent men in California, and also employed—

Then Mr. Ingersoll objected to the letters coming in. But he was asked how many letters he had, and he says ten or a dozen:

Q. What else did he give you?—A. He gave me a trip pass to go and return over the Central Pacific and Union Pacific road—

One was the pass that he usually wrote for to Jay Gould and Sidney Dillon, after having made a return therefor on the Mineral Park route—and also from here to Chicago, and also an annual pass of his brother's over the Central Pacific and Union Pacific, but not from here to Chicago.

This is the honest Senator of the United States; above any fraud, above any petty steal. His brother having an annual pass over the Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad, he took that annual pass of his brother's and transferred it over to A. W. Moore to use, by personating John W. Dorsey, and sent him West with it. Well, now, gentlemen, I think that was a very great injustice to Mr. Moore, to ask him to represent such a man as John W. Dorsey. He ought to have been saved from any such degradation as that.

I have gone over all these evidences of prearrangement somewhat rapidly, and yet you may probably think I have taken a great deal of time with them. So I pass over various other items which I have upon my notes in that connection to call your attention to what it seems to me is pertinent as showing what kind of men these defendants were, whether they were likely to be engaged in a scheme to defraud the Government of the United States.

We find them seeking, in the first place, to prevent troublesome remonstrances from going upon the files of the department where their competitors might see them and they might be a little troublesome. For instance, at page 1314, we have this letter written to John Carey. Carey was a Frenchman, you remember, who was on the stand here as a witness, and he had made a subcontract on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route :

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1881.

JOHN CAREY, Esq.,
Fort McDermitt, Nev. :

DEAR SIR: One S. H. Abbott, who was postmaster at Alvord, I find, by accident, is writing to the department that you do not pay your bills, and that there is no need of anything more than a weekly mail.

I wish you would see this man at once and satisfy him ; pay him whatever is reasonable and report to R. C. Williamson, at The Dalles. I suppose that is what he is after. He knows nothing of the through mail, and probably a weekly is all he needs—

The evidence indicates that nobody knew anything of the through mail. After January, 1879, there was a through mail-bag, but there was no through mail. I say “through mail-bag” in the sense of the mail-bag going over the whole route—but more likely he wants some money. He complained once before to the department that he had to make a special trip to Camp McDermitt to make his returns, and I sent him $30 and it was all right. Now, I suppose, he wants a little more money.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN R. MINER.

When Mr. Miner came on the stand he was asked to explain this, and he started off with an explanation. And yet the only explanation that he gave is in reference to the latter portion of the letter. Let us see what the explanation is, on page 4206 :

The Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route was not started entirely through until about the 1st of January, 1879. The north end was started. This man Abbott, who was then postmaster at Alvord, sent a bill to the department for $30.

* * * * *

A. [Continuing.] He sent a bill to the department for $30 for the expense in going to Camp McDermitt to mail his quarterly report for the quarter ending the 30th of September, 1878. Mr. Turner handed that bill to me and I sent him the money, $30.

As it appears upon this page it was wrongly punctuated, and further on it was changed. But that is all there is about it.

Q. Why should you have paid his expenses in going to Camp McDermitt?—A. If the mail had started according to the contract, on the 1st of July, he would not have been obliged to go to Fort McDermitt to mail his returns. We considered that we were in neglect, possibly.

Rather. Having entered into a contract to commence service on the 1st of July, they did not begin it until after the 1st of July, and they “considered” that they “were in neglect,” and therefore this postmaster having to go to Fort McDermitt to mail his quarterly report, which, under the regulations, he was required to make, they paid him $30, and he was entitled to it as a legitimate expense. But how does that account in any manner for this:

One S. H. Abbott, who was postmaster at Alvord, I find by accident—

That was April 15, 1881, not away back in 1879—is writing to the department that you do not pay your bills, and that there is no need of anything more than a weekly mail.

I wish you would see this man at once and satisfy him ; pay him whatever is reasonable, and report to R. C. Williamson, at The Dalles. I suppose that is what he is after. He knows nothing of the through mail, and probably a weekly is all he needs ; but more likely he wants some money.

And so he wrote to Mr. Carey to go and buy off this Mr. Abbott. Whether Mr. Carey did that or not we do not know. It may be that Mr. Carey thought he was somewhat above a certain class of people whom I, as a stranger, see designated in the Washington papers as being about here, people who are engaged in operations to prevent the proper administration of the departments and the courts, who are described as department thieves, as jury-fixers, and everything of that sort. Perhaps Mr. Carey was above them. Mr. Miner, however, was not above undertaking to employ a man in some business of that kind, and he undertook to employ Mr. Carey to buy off Mr. Abbott from making remonstrances.

There is, in that connection, gentlemen, one rather remarkable thing that indicates rather suggestively Mr. Miner's opportunities and Mr. Miner's operations. You will see he says that he finds that S. H. Abbott is writing to the department that there is no necessity of a daily mail. Mr. Miner had access to that letter and knew its contents, if he did not have it in his possession. We cannot find that letter. There is no evidence on the records of the Post-Office Department that that letter was ever there. Is it not rather suggestive of the idea that when that letter came Mr. Brady said: "Why, here, John, this is rather a troublesome document; this may make trouble; I have run that route up for you to $52,000, and Mr. Vaile says he is getting at least $20,000 of profit; you are paying for running the route only $10,000; there is an odd $20,000 there; we won't discuss who gets that $20,000; but, however, it will all be stopped unless you can stop Mr. Abbott. Now take this letter and go and stop Mr. Abbott's mouth." And Mr. Miner went to work to try to stop Mr. Abbott's mouth, and he was so liberal that he directed Mr. Carey to pay him whatever was reasonable, and to report to Mr. R. C. Williamson, the gentleman who sat here. And if there had not been any transaction of that kind we probably should have had Mr. Williamson on the stand to inform you. They did start in for more business of that sort, but they did not carry out their little plan.

That was the transaction, and it was part and parcel of the same sort of business that led Mr. Dorsey to write to Mr. Joseph. (Page 1104.) He wrote to Mr. Joseph, who was complaining: "Now stop writing to the department; you are only making trouble for all of us there; you have no business to write to the department; talk to us; we are contractors, and you are a mere sub; you write to me, and we will settle it."

Mr. Miner wrote to Mr. French on the 22d of October, 1878, using the name of Mr. Peck, and in that letter he says, at page 668:

You can supply an office once a week by a side supply, provided the postmaster at that office is satisfied and don't kick. The department will not authorize it, but they will not find any fault unless reported.

And later than that Mr. Miner wrote, on the 10th of January, 1880:

The postmaster at Cedarville has sent a register which shows only two mails a week.

He is giving you away. Take care, he is giving us all away.

No register is required from Cedarville, as that is not a schedule point. Either furnish that office three mails per week, or see that the postmaster sends no more registers.

Honest Mr. Miner! He did not care whether the service was performed; he wanted pay for three trips a week. This postmaster at Cedarville was interfering, by sending the registers, with that little arrangement, and he says: "Don't have any registers come." As to the side supply, Mr. John W. Dorsey, it is in evidence, told Mr. French up there, before he made his contract, that he could do that thing. Mr. French considered that he was perfectly authorized to do it. They actually put a witness on the stand from the department to produce the papers to show that Mr. John R. Miner had been lying; that the department never had consented to a side supply or anything of the kind, and if they had known it they would have stopped it at once and would have fined the man for doing it. And yet Mr. Miner, in the name of Peck, admittedly wrote that letter to the contractor out there, confirming what Mr. John Dorsey had told him, that he might get up the side supply—cheat all around, as the department regards it—provided always he did not let it be known. The evidence of what Mr. Dorsey told Mr. French is found at page 697 :

I told him of my having to supply Cedarville before always by side supply, and we wanted he should do all he could to get this office from this next route. He said he would, but he would not promise to do it, but if I could make arrangements with the postmaster at Cedarville, they would never object to my supplying it by side supply.

Q. Did you arrange with the postmaster?—A. I did, and I always carried it that way, too.

As showing what kind of men these gentlemen were I only need to recur to that side post-office on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route. They were willing to go into that kind of a fraud. S. W. Dorsey, John W. Dorsey, Rerdell, all of them, were willing to go into that arrangement.

Now, as to these parties in another aspect. Take the Clendenning and Haycock letters. Let us see what they suggest as to such men, men who now undertake to set themselves up before you as better men than Rerdell, whom they educated. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that what gave rise to the Clendenning letter was this: The bids for mail service are required to have sureties. Mr. Ingersoll, in the course of the trial, undertook to say that the complaint about these bids and bonds which were sent in blank to Clendenning, Haycock, and Hadley was that the amount of the bid was not in, and he said that the bidders for mail contracts always kept the amount out of the bid until the last moment, because they did not want that disclosed, by some accident, to rival bidders. And he said that all that was done about these bonds which were sent West in blank was to leave out the amount of the bid. But in point of fact that is not the case. Colonel Ingersoll was a little economical of the truth there—of course, inadvertently. The forms were sent in blank with directions to fill up only the blanks, which were filled up with fictitious names; and the blanks which were filled up were the certificates of the postmasters that certain persons had sworn before him as sureties as required by an act of Congress, and the statement of the sureties that they were worth a certain sum, and a description of their property; and then that was to be certified by the postmaster. That left entirely blank the name of the person for whom they were to become surety. Men were to be asked to sign bonds as sureties that so-and-so, an unnamed person, or a blank person, would carry it according to the contract; that he would perform the service. Those bonds require not only that the bidder will enter into the contract, but that he shall perform the service, if awarded to him, during the entire four years. The obligation of the sureties was that the bidder would perform his contract, and was not merely for liability for the sum that might be named in the bid. Those bonds were directed to be sent West with those blanks, and they were accompanied by a memorandum, which memorandum is printed at page 1504, as follows :

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, ———, 187—.

DR. COL.: Two men, who will certify to $15,000, can make all these bonds. Have notary certify to them with seal, and you approve them and return them to me. You can fill out the bonds like the one sent. Only these blanks we have filled, and get some one to sign the whole lot at once.

I will pay any expense you may be to in this matter.

D.

Note the instructions carefully.

That is in Mr. Dorsey's handwriting. It was fastened to one of the blank forms sent. Mr. Dorsey admits the letter. That memorandum has the date left blank. There was a subsequent letter printed on the same page:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 9, 1879.

DEAR COL.: Long before you get this you will be confirmed, and I hope all right.

He sent this to a gentleman whose name, as is indicated, was before the Senate as nominee for postmaster, and his fate, he knew perfectly well, rested entirely with Mr. Dorsey, who was then a Senator from Arkansas, as to whether he should be confirmed or not.

Mr. HENKLE. That date, 1879, is wrong.

Mr. BLISS. It is 1879 here, but it is undoubtedly wrongly printed. Clearly it was not written in 1879. In the first place, he was not in the Senate in 1879, though he used Senate paper afterwards.

The COURT. The bids were put in before that.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; it is obviously December, 1877.

Mr. MERRICK. It is about this Clendenning matter.

Mr. BLISS. I can see how it has been misprinted, on account of the resemblance, probably, of the 9 to the 7, as is shown here in the original paper, 17 X.

Mr. MERRICK. All that correspondence was in 1877.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading from the original paper, 17 X:]

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 9, 1877.

DEAR COL.: Long before you get this you will be confirmed, and I hope all right.

I send you to-day a bundle of bonds to be made, which I hope you will have filled up and duly certified according to law.

The law does not allow him to certify in the way Mr. Dorsey wanted.

This is for an intimate friend of mine, and I ask you to do it as a special favor to me. Under no circumstances allow anybody to know that I have written on this subject; but I shall rely upon you to have it done. Return the bonds to me as soon as made, and certain by the 28th of this month.

Yours, truly,

S. W. DORSEY.

Hon. GEO. HAYCOCK,
Pine Bluff.

That is a letter written to Mr. Haycock, to whom another bundle of bonds was sent. Having sent those two letters off, we find that Mr. Clendenning has written to Mr. Dorsey, and Mr. Dorsey, on the 9th of December, the same day he wrote to Haycock, replies, at page 1504:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 9, 1877.

DEAR COLONEL: There is not a thing in the idea that I doubted your kindly regard for myself. I know as well, probably, as anybody who my friends are and who to trust. Whatever I have said about the officeholders at Fort Smith related solely to other parties, whose identity is as clear to you as to myself. I shall do what I can for those who treat me as I think I deserve to be treated—you can rely upon my aid which has saved you on more than one occasion. Keep your office straight, so it will bear inspection, and there will be no trouble.

I send you some bonds which I desire made for a friend—have it done, but under no possible circumstances allow any one to know from whom they came.

Make the bonds at once and return them to me here.

Then there is inserted and interlined :

Keep clear of Roots or Kerens or friends.

Faithfully,

S. W. DORSEY.

Col. J. H. CLENDENNING,
Fort Smith.

Those letters were undoubtedly written by Mr. Dorsey, admittedly written by him, though some experts whom they put upon the stand—and I do not know but both of them, those astonishing experts, Kellogg and the other gentleman!—were a little inclined to think they were not Mr. Dorsey's handwriting.

Mr. MERRICK. He admitted it.

Mr. BLISS. But when Mr. Dorsey came upon the stand he admitted that those letters were his, and then there came an explanation, or something that is called an explanation. Before that, however, Mr. Ingersoll had made an explanation, which is found on page 417 of the record, and that is the explanation to which I called your attention, when he sought to indicate to you, as it seems to me, that the only trouble about the bond was that the blank as to the bidder was not filled. He says distinctly that it is the blank for the amount of the bid that is not filled. That is not it at all; it is the blank for the name of the bidder that is not filled. Mr. Dorsey, having given his explanation, commencing, if I remember rightly, at page 3752, is asked by his counsel on direct examination—this letter, by the way, is printed at page 3747, and there has the date printed correctly—about the letter, and there is some discussion as to the right to go into an explanation of it. That goes on for some little length, and then he says that the reason why he wrote so to Mr. Clendenning was that—

In this town where Mr. Clendenning lived lived a Mr. Kerens, who was a very prominent mail contractor, and if he had known that these bonds had been sent there he would have known that he was to have additional competitors for the bidding at that letting at which he was one of the largest bidders. In the other town, if you want me to go to that—or do you want me to confine myself to this letter?

He then says :

So that he would not allow Mr. Roots, who was another great contractor there, in connection with Kerens and others, to know that they would have competition.

That is his explanation on page 3752. But further along, on page 3799, having called his attention to the first letter of Colonel Clendenning, he is asked :

You may state whether you remember writing any such note, or do you remember the circumstance?

I call your attention to this, because it will become important in another connection :

A. Yes, sir; I wrote that note. Mr. Boone brought down that bond, filled up as a sample bond, showing how the others should be filled up; that is, filling the blanks that Clendenning would have to fill, and asked me to attach that note to it. That is my recollection about it.

Q. And you did so?—A. I did so.

Then, after he had fallen into Mr. Merrick's hands, on cross-examination, we have considerable testimony upon that subject, commencing at page 3855 and extending to page 3863. He states that Mr. Clendenning declined to execute the bonds, because he thought it was unlawful for him to do so, as it clearly was. Then this, on page 3856 :

Q. Now, will you tell me why it was that in this note you instructed him that only those blanks were to be filled which were filled in the form sent to him?—A. Those bonds were prepared by Mr. Boone, who filled up, I suppose, the blanks just as he wanted them; I had never seen them. He brought them down to my office filled up in that way, and said that was the way he wanted them, and asked me to attach a note to them; I did so, and sent that out to Clendenning. I have no recollection what parts he filled up and what parts were left blank.

Q. You knew nothing on the subject?—A. Not a thing in the world.

Q. This was all done under Boone, and not under your directions?—A. Not under my directions; I did not know anything about it. Boone was an expert in all this post-office business; I had no knowledge of it.

Q. Why did you underline the words, "only these blanks we have filled?"—A. I presume that was all that should be filled.

Q. [Reading:]

"You can fill out the bonds like the one sent. Only these blanks we have filled, and get some one to sign the whole lot at once."

Was that all under Boone's direction?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were not this proposal and bond and oath all filled up by Boone at your house, and did you not direct him to do it?—A. I think not, sir.

Q. Have you any recollection about it?—A. No, I have not.

Q. You do not know whether they were or not?—A. I do not.

Q. And you do not know whether you instructed him or not?—A. I am quite certain I could not instruct him about a thing of which I had no knowledge. I had never seen a post-office bond at that time.

Q. You were familiar with the rules of law upon the subject of these blanks, were you not?—A. No, sir.

He says he sent the bonds to Mr. Hadley; he does not know whether they were in the same form. Mr. Hadley was postmaster at Little Rock. Mr. Dorsey claims that he did not know that he was doing an illegal thing. Clendenning having refused to sign the bonds, Dorsey told him he might send them back to him or send them to Adams, and he supposed he sent them to Adams. It turned out that Adams was a large mail contractor and had been for thirty years. And yet Dorsey did not want anybody else to know that any bidding was going on, and he had Mr. Clendenning send the bonds to Mr. John D. Adams after he had refused to sign them. On page 3860 he was questioned about that.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken about the Adams; it is another Adams. Turn to the letter and see.

Mr. BLISS. On page 3858 he says that he told Clendenning to send them to John D. Adams.

Mr. WILSON. I just wanted to call your attention to it, because you are mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. He says John D. Adams, who was a mail contractor for steamboat service, and had been for about thirty years. That is the John D. Adams I refer to.

Mr. WILSON. Turn to the letter he wrote subsequently, and you will see your mistake.

Mr. BLISS. There is possibly some question about the initials, as has been suggested to me. I see it is stated in the letter :

Send them to Sam B. Adams.

But on the stand he says :

I told him to send them to John B. Adams, I think.

Q. Where was he?—A. At Little Rock.

Mr. WILSON. It only shows how easily a man may be mistaken as to what he wrote.

Mr. BLISS. I presume that is so.

Mr. MERRICK. Especially a man who had no recollection of anything.

Mr. BLISS. He is questioned about these things, beginning at the bottom of page 3861 :

Q. Why, then, did you say, "Let no one know from whom they come" if your reason was that other possible contractors should not be informed that they were competing bidders, you yourself not being a bidder?—A. I think my answer yesterday is complete to all that.

Q. The one I read to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You think that is complete?—A. I do.

Q. Would you so have expressed yourself if that had been your reason at the time, do you think?—A. I think so. I do not see anything incongruous in what I say there.

Q. [Reading:]

"Have it done, but under no possible circumstances allow any one to know from whom they come."

That is, do not allow anybody to know that I, S. W. Dorsey, sent these to you. What did you mean by that?—A. I meant what I said yesterday.

Q. Would not this expression allow him to let other people know that he had the bonds provided he did not let them know who sent them?—A. No, sir; I do not construe it that way at all.

Q. You do not?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Let me read it again:

"Have it done, but under no possible circumstances allow any one to know from whom they come."

You do not construe it that way?—A. I do not.

Then he is asked about the letter to Haycock :

Under no circumstances allow anybody to know that I have written upon this subject.

And he is asked if he would not infer from that that his object was to not let it be known that he was concerned in the business, and did not refer to the question of endeavoring to show that there were no parties engaged in getting up bids; but he did not think so. Now, gentlemen, I ask you to apply your minds to that, and just see what Mr. Dorsey meant when he wrote it. He says in the one letter: "Under no possible circumstances allow anybody to know that I have written on this subject;" and in the other he says: "Under no possible circumstances allow any one to know from whom they come." Stephen W. Dorsey was in the Senate of the United States. He could not legally be a bidder upon post-office contracts. He was sending these contracts out there, and he gave directions to both of these parties: "Do not let anybody know you have got bonds or anything of that kind, because, as he says the meaning is if you let them know that they are bonds for you to certify, that will show that there are other bidders going in for these contracts." Did he not mean, "Do not let anybody know that I, Stephen W. Dorsey, wrote on the subject?" Why did he put it in that way, gentlemen, and why did he seek to have them conceal the fact that he not only was engaged in an illegality himself, or in the steps preliminary to an illegality, but that he was asking his dependents, as he supposed Mr. Clendenning and Colonel Haycock to be, to commit an illegality in certifying to the bond? Do you believe, gentlemen, that what was on his mind when he wrote those letters was the desire to conceal the fact that there were any bids being certified? Was it not, on the contrary, a desire to conceal the fact that Stephen W. Dorsey was engaged in getting bids certified? I submit to you, gentlemen, that that is the natural if not the necessary conclusion from that correspondence.

The statute says :

Any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract, before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Stephen W. Dorsey sent those bonds to Mr. Clendenning, asking him to certify to them before the name of the bidder was signed to them. These blank bonds produced here show that fact. He asked Mr. Clendenning to certify to the bids without the name of the bidder being signed, and Mr. Clendenning refused so to do. Mr. Clendenning wrote him back a letter, of which there is evidence here; and do you wonder, gentlemen, that Mr. Dorsey, though he four several times in the progress of this trial by himself or his counsel promised to search for the letter of Mr. Clendenning in reply to Mr. Dorsey's request to commit this illegality, has failed and never has produced it? And they never have accounted for it in any manner.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Ingersoll has said here several times that he has been unable to find it.

Mr. BLISS. He has never said he was unable to find it. He said he never looked for it. In point of fact, in my humble opinion, Colonel Ingersoll remembered to forget to look for it. If you undertake to say that he said he had looked for it and could not find it, I say you are mistaken, and you cannot find that statement in the record.

But the great question here is, why did Dorsey want Clendenning to commit an offense which, if found out, would put him into the penitentiary?

There is a letter of Mr. Dorsey's, which it is so late now that I have not time to look up and read, in which he undertook to write back to Mr. Clendenning and tell him that a gentleman now in his grave—and they have undertaken to prove it here—a gentleman whom I never had the pleasure of knowing, but who, I am told, was an honorable gentleman (Mr. Edmunds, late postmaster at Washington), had informed Mr. Dorsey that he was in the constant habit of doing that precise thing. Do you believe that, gentlemen? Do you believe anything of the kind? Mr. Edmunds had, no doubt, certified to the sureties on hundreds and thousands of bonds, but I do not believe anybody in this community is going to believe Mr. Dorsey's statement that Mr. Edmunds told him that he had committed this precise illegality thousands of times. It is not possible. I only refer to it simply as showing to what straits Mr. Dorsey is driven when he entered upon this course of illegality himself.

Shall I stop now, your honor?

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, the extraordinary attention and patience with which you listened to me yesterday makes me almost ashamed of myself in occupying your time any further. If the matter were one personal to me I certainly should not do so. Owing to engagements long made, I am here to-day at a personal sacrifice which I think should not be required of anybody except where matters of great importance are concerned. Being here, I must do my duty, and I must occupy your time somewhat further. I do not think it is owing to the fact that a lawyer when he gets on his feet always feels that he must continue so long as he has attentive listeners. It is owing in a great measure, as I flatter myself, to the fact that there is in this case a record consisting of over four thousand five hundred printed pages of testimony, probably the largest record of testimony that has ever been made in a jury case in this country, and that the analysis and examination of that testimony seems to impose a duty upon counsel and seems to require that there should be considerable attention paid to details. At any rate, that is the conclusion to which counsel for the Government have arrived, and they have been influenced in that conclusion somewhat by the fact that it may be in the course of this case that after I shall have closed the defendants will submit themselves to your verdict.

Before commencing the course of my argument let me call your attention to one or two things which I notice I omitted yesterday. When I spoke among other things of the intervention of these defendants in the matter of the petitions I failed to call your attention to the fact that Mr. S. W. Dorsey transmitted to Joseph two different forms of petitions to be circulated by him, he having prescribed the forms and taken care that they should differ one from the other so that the facts would not be known. As to the petition on the White River route, of which considerable was said, inasmuch as it had the military indorsement of the General of the Army or the Secretary of War, I only desire to call your attention to the fact that Mr. Rerdell states that when that petition came from White River by mail and arrived here, he went, in connection with Colonel Steele, the employé of Mr. Dorsey, up to the War Department, and there they procured that indorsement. With regard to the letter produced on the Tongue River route from the president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, Mr. Rerdell states that he got that through the letter of introduction given to him by Senator Dorsey, the writing of which letter of introduction Dorsey admits.

As having some bearing on the question of prearrangement or understanding I will also call your attention to the letter from Mr. S. W. Dorsey to Mr. Joseph, dated on the 30th of April, 1879, in which he says that he is confident that that route will be increased on the 1st of July, a confidence which was well sustained. The route was increased before the 1st of July.

I also ought to have called your attention to some evidence which there is in the case with regard to the number of men and horses employed. I intended to have done it in connection with the figures I gave you as to the men and horses used. I desire in this matter to be perfectly fair. Upon certain of the routes where I stated the number actually used the evidence shows that the time which Mr. Brady ordered, and for which the Government paid, was not made. Therefore, if they had complied with the contract that they entered into and performed the service for which they promptly drew the pay, it is quite possible that more men and horses would have been needed. For instance, take The Dalles and Baker City route. The time was originally one hundred and twenty hours, and it was reduced to seventy-two hours. The uncontradicted evidence of Baker, Pierce, and Cowne, the three carriers upon that route, is that for nearly a year after the expedition was ordered they did not make any such time; that they traveled only days and laid over nights, and that they took five days, which was the original schedule. There was no increased number of men and horses or diminution of time until the 14th of July, 1879, although the order took effect and the payments were made from the 15th of November, 1878. Therefore, to that extent the comparison that I made of the number of men and horses actually used with those that were called for by the affidavit may have been considered to have been defective, but it is a correction which hardly redounds to the advantage of these defendants. They drew pay for nearly a year's service which they did not perform.

One other matter of omission, and then I will have done. I had lying here yesterday, but I failed to call it to your attention, a very significant little paper as bearing upon the question of prearrangement and understanding by these defendants that they were to have expedition. I hold in my hand a paper, marked 22 I, being a letter signed John M. Peck, contractor, but admittedly in the hand-writing of Mr. Miner, dated Washington, D. C., October 23, 1879:

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to request that P. J. Wycoff, subcontractor on route 44140, be paid at the rate of $7,400 per annum on the increased service of July 14, 1879, without making any deduction for curtailing the service, so as to end at Mitchell; as it was understood that pro rata deduction should only be made while the service remained at one trip per week.

That is the letter. Then there comes the following passage, to which I desire to call your attention.

Mr. HENKLE. That is not admitted to be in the handwriting of Mr. Miner.

Mr. BLISS. I thought it was. At any rate the paper is in evidence. The passage to which I refer is this:

And when increased to three or more trips, his pay was to be as specified in the contract, and regardless of said curtailment.

Respectfully,

JOHN M. PECK,
Contractor.

The last two lines indicate a foreknowledge and prearrangement with reference to an increase of trips and diminution of time, and you will see that they have been stricken out. A pen has been drawn through them as being apparently unnecessary in the present communication. But they remain on the record, and I call attention to them. Mr. Merrick says I am wrong, and that the evidence is that this letter is in Rerdell's handwriting. That is a matter of unimportance. The paper was filed by these defendants on one of the routes belonging to this combination, and I submit to you it is entitled to the weight which I have suggested.

Mr. HENKLE. That is better.

Mr. MERRICK. It was written by one of the conspirators.

Mr. BLISS. The evidence shows that it was written by Rerdell. It makes no difference to us, gentlemen, in this case, which one of these conspirators did any particular act at that time. They will not ask you to believe that Mr. Rerdell, at that time a man on a salary of $3,000 a year, with no interest in the profits of this business whatever, was going into a little private operation of his own for swindling the Government for their benefit, and that he had a private understanding with Brady or that he had a private understanding with others for the benefit of these defendants. They will not ask you to believe that he was doing all this in connection with a salary of $3,000 a year while they knew nothing about it.

Now, gentlemen, returning to the matter which I was considering when we stopped yesterday, as to the operations of these defendants, and as showing what kind of men they were, I desire to call your attention to one or two little things. Slight as they are, yet they have some bearing upon the case. For instance, we find Stephen W. Dorsey writing to Mr. Brady on the 23d of May, 1879, the letter which I read from page 1323 of the record :

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith letters addressed to me in relation to an increase of mail service on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, Oreg., which please place on file in your department, and to request your early consideration of the same.

Very respectfully,

S. W. DORSEY.

He transmits then two or three letters addressed to him as a United States Senator, on the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, which was a route in which he was directly interested, and which were letters written to him by a Mr. Walker, a Mr. Finn, and Mr. Walton. You will notice the tone of these letters. For instance :

DEAR SIR: Having learned of your willingness to assist in procuring mail facilities, I take the liberty of addressing you and asking you to assist us in procuring an increased mail service on the route from Eugene to Bridge Creek.

Again :

You will confer a great favor on the citizens of this State by aiding to increase the mail service—

And so forth. Those letters were transmitted by Mr. Dorsey to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as having been addressed to him as a United States Senator, with no intimation upon the record that Mr. Dorsey had any interest in that route, or that he had anything to do with these letters, except, being a prominent public man, that he had received them and transmitted them to Mr. Brady. Yet that route was one of the routes that Mr. Dorsey had all through the time of his admitted connection with this business, and, as we think, from the commencement. There is a similar transaction on the Ojo Caliente route. There he sent letters with an entire concealment as to his interest. One of these letters, I ought to say, on the Oregon route, is noteworthy, from the fact that the writer does not seem to know his name, and addresses him as W. S. Dorsey.

Bearing upon the question before us, I desire also to call your attention to a few facts with reference to Mr. Brady and to his antecedents. They are briefly these: Mr. Brady tells you, on page 3401, that he studied law, and that then he was a school-teacher, and in 1865 he came out of the Army, published a newspaper, went as consul to St. Thomas, in the West Indies, from 1870 to 1875, became supervisor of internal revenue in 1875, and passed directly from that office to the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General. His salary as consul at St. Thomas was $4,000 a year, and his salary as supervisor of internal revenue was $3,000 a year. Those are the positions that Mr. Brady held, and indicate his financial condition when he came into the service of the Government as Second Assistant Postmaster-General. But now what do we find later on? We find, on pages 3563 and 3564, Mr. Brady writing to Walsh the famous "ginger" letter, and telling him that he is a little embarrassed temporarily :

The trouble with me is that my means are in Am. U. Tel., & the bonds & stock are not yet issued. When issued will give me 120 or $130,000, but this may not be for 60 or 90 days, & hence not available. My telephone bonds are already up as collateral. And with buying newspapers, a mine (rather part of a one, the P. & D.), running the lumber business, &c., I am a little cramped.

Mr. Brady had managed somehow or other and had been sufficiently lucky in the period between going into the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General and passing out of that office, with a salary of $3,000 a year, to get into the position of having all that amount of property. When he was questioned about it further on he goes on to say that it is true he bought the Republican, he bought the Capital, he bought the Critic, and he bought mining stock in the Pelican and Dives, and that he had, I think he states, some $300,000 in stock of the Chattanooga Railroad Company. Mr. Brady had been so lucky that he had acquired this property within two or three years after he went into the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

So, gentlemen, I have shown you what kind of people these defendants are and the acts in which they have been engaged, both prior to the conspiracy and during the early stages of it; not acts in every case which directly resulted in fraud upon the Government, but acts in connection with the conspiracy.

Now, we come to another class of testimony, and that is as to the witnesses whose evidence is denied and whose statements are disputed. As you know heretofore I have confined myself almost entirely to undisputed testimony. In considering the question of the truthfulness of these different witnesses who were before you, you will bear in mind in the first place that the defendants are all of them men who were greatly benefited by these orders which Mr. Brady made and that they put into their pockets that money which Mr. Brady took from the Treasury, less such sums as may have been used for those necessary expenses to which Mr. Dorsey referred as required to maintain their influence in the Post-Office Department and to which Mr. Miner referred as necessary to procure orders for expedition. They put all that money in their pockets. They prepared and presented to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General all these false, fraudulent, forged, and altered petitions which you have had laid before you. They presented also all these more innocent looking papers. You will find no evidence anywhere in this case of any paper having come from the locality of a route as the free-will request of the people along that route sent by them to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I think no instance of that kind can be found. We find remonstrances. We find a remonstrance from Mr. Beene out in Nevada, stating that the Mineral Park and Pioche route amounts to nothing, and that if it costs the Government anything he thinks the service out to be stopped. That is the route that cost the Government $52,000 a year, and on nineteen days not a letter went over it. We find remonstrances from citizens and no attention paid to them. We do not find, as I recollect, any free-will, so to speak, or unsolicited request from people along the routes. These papers came through the defendants, I think, almost without exception. There may be one or two exceptions that have escaped me in the mass of papers. They altered these petitions. They forged signatures; for instance, those on the petition where Hall's name appears. They prepared these affidavits covered all over with alterations, insertions, and erasures. They filed in the department the affidavit of Perkins and the other affidavits full of erasures and which were undoubtedly and indisputably altered after they were sworn to. There is no question about the evidence on that point. They employed and they recommended to others as trustworthy the very witnesses whom they now undertake to impugn and attack. They kept them in confidential positions. They gave them almost absolute power. They trusted them with their money. They trusted them with their railroad passes. They trusted them with authority to sign their names and to do everything. Mr. Dorsey introduced Mr. Rerdell to "Dear Mart" Paddock as a gentleman of the highest character and a man of first-rate ability; as a friend of his—not a mere employé, but a friend. He introduced him to Governor Routt as "an upright man in whom you can confide." Mr. Dorsey kept that upright man and that friend in his employment down to within a year. He claims that in the latter period of service he was influenced somewhat by fear of what Mr. Rerdell might do or tell. If Mr. Dorsey had been an innocent man and not engaged in any operation which would not bear the light of day, would Mr. Dorsey have kept in his employ a man as to whom he says he had the views which he has more recently announced? Would he not have said, "No; go and do your worst. I have done nothing that is dishonorable. I have done nothing that is dishonest. I will not submit to having you about me. I will not pay your expenses. I will not continue to pay your salary. I will not submit"—if he did, though there is no evidence of it except a general statement by him—"to your blackmailing." Mr. Dorsey claims that he was in that position, and that he kept that man in his employ in that way down to about the time when this trial commenced. It appears then that Mr. John W. Dorsey thought that the better way was to threaten, and thereupon he went to work and told Mr. Rerdell that if he testified against them he would have him prosecuted for forgery, and that if he would agree not to testify he would, so far as was within his power, compound a felony and conceal the knowledge that he had of the alleged crime. Now, gentlemen, those are the facts as to these people, in a measure. Boone's testimony they handle very gingerly. They think he is mistaken. Mr. Miner does not think certain conversations occurred. Yet when Mr. Boone testified to the same thing that Mr. Moore testified to, they say Moore is a liar and his stories are lies made out of whole cloth. Their difference in the treatment of those two men is something which I do not at present expect to make you understand. Rerdell and Moore are perjured scoundrels. Boone is mistaken when he swears to the same thing. Pennell, Cable, Lambert, and McLellan are all perjurers, deliberate perjurers, although they have no interest whatever in this case. They have come here and apparently for the pleasure of it have committed perjury. They want you to believe that those men came here and committed perjury just for the very motive under the influence of which Mr. Brady told Mr. Walsh he did not make expeditions—for the fun of the thing. Mr. Brady asked Mr. Walsh if he supposed he was making these orders for expedition and increase for the fun of the thing. This is not a case where there can be any misunderstanding or any misconception. It is not a case where Pennell could misunderstand what was said to him or fail to recollect it aright. It is not a case where any of these people could fail to recollect aright. It is a case where they have either told the truth or they have committed willful and deliberate perjury upon the stand. Their evidence stands here against the evidence of John W. Dorsey, who swore to two contradictory affidavits on the same day, and who admittedly was engaged in the swindle with regard to the fictitious side post-office at the very time he was talking to these people in the way they say he was.

Then, as to Walsh. Walsh comes here and makes a statement under oath. He makes it from the stand under subpoena. They do not dare to cross-examine him. His character is not impugned. No witness has said that Mr. Walsh is not a man of good character and not a man to be believed. Without cross-examining him they let him go from the stand, and in reply to him they put Mr. Thomas J. Brady on the stand to say that Walsh told a lie. I shall have occasion directly to analyze and compare the statements of those two gentlemen upon the subject. It is true that Walsh has a suit against Mr. Brady. I do not know as that is any reason why Mr. Walsh should not state the truth. The suit shows that Mr. Walsh has a claim against him wholly independent of this transaction and this indictment, and shows also the way in which he became known to the Government and became available to the Government as a witness. He has a suit against Mr. Brady, in which he claims that Mr. Brady owes him some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars for borrowed money, being the money he is seeking to recover, and which led to the conversation between him and Brady. Because he alleges that Mr. Brady owes him $25,000 you are, apparently, to be urged that he is not to be believed.

Now, as to Mr. Moore. Moore, of course, is not a very high style of a man. They did not select as their agents and as their partners and their associates men of very high style. Bear in mind that Moore was employed by them and commissioned with authority to make all their arrangements in the western country; that Moore was provided by Miner with large sums of money; that he was given an interest in certain routes; and that Moore therefore was not only their employé and their servant, but he was their partner. He was willing to aid them. It was for that purpose that they employed him. If Mr. Moore had not been willing to undertake to have bogus petitions and forged petitions gotten up—petitions which could be altered, petitions so drawn that Mr. Miner could get in his cunning handiwork—if Mr. Moore had not been willing to do that Mr. Moore would not have been an available tool for them and they would not have used him. It does not lie in their mouths to say that, having picked him out for the work for which they wanted him, and he having done it efficiently, when he comes to be brought here from the bedside of a sick and dying family under subpoena, and he testifies under oath to certain facts, that he has admitted that he was engaged in a business in which he ought not to have been engaged. He was engaged in a business in which he ought not to have been engaged; but, gentlemen, that does not necessarily render him an untruthful man when he is brought onto the stand. You must remember, gentlemen, that Mr. Miner, even Mr. Miner, says there is a great deal of difference. He says that when he wrote the letter to Hayes he was not under oath, and it did not apparently make much difference whether he told the truth or not; but when he was under oath he wanted you to believe it made a very great difference. Apply that rule to Mr. Moore.

There was a great parade, as I have already mentioned, of an intention to contradict Mr. Moore. You recollect how it fizzled out. They brought Betts, and they asked him questions which were clearly inadmissible, because they related to collateral matters. The court promptly ruled them out. They did not bring Pelham, as to whom they had laid the foundation for contradicting Moore by asking questions of him with regard to matters not collateral. If Mr. Moore had not told the truth, Mr. Pelham could have come here and convinced you that Mr. Moore was a venal and a lying witness. They did not dare to bring Pelham here. They knew Moore had spoken the truth, although at his examination they asked him as they went along "Did you not tell so and so, such and such a thing, on such a day? Now answer me, sir, did you not?" He said he did not, and that was all we heard of it in this case. Yet they want to make the impression on your mind that this witness somewhere or other at some other time told stories inconsistent with what he told here. Mr. Moore may have been in error in some minor details. I do not know whether he was or not. He may have been in error as to whether certain checks came to him direct or whether they came to him from Miner. But I submit, in view of his bearing on the stand and the circumstances surrounding the case and the corroboration that he got from Boone with regard to this business, that Mr. Moore was a truthful witness, desiring to tell the truth and the whole truth.

Bear in mind from whom the denials of the testimony of these parties come. They come from these defendants. Who has the most at stake here? If there has been any perjury here, who has the greatest inducement to commit perjury? These defendants have at stake not only liberty, but social and, some of them, political standing. They have everything at stake. On the other hand, what have Rerdell and Moore at stake? Rerdell has confessed his guilt, with no arrangement by which he is to be protected from punishment. He is ready to take his punishment, and I do not see how there can be any escape from his receiving it. I trust that that punishment will be less severe than the punishment of these other gentlemen who have stood out and have added other crimes to those they are charged with having committed. Moore passes out into the community, and so does Rerdell after he has suffered his punishment, and they disappear, unnoticed and unknown. These defendants, if convicted, are in an entirely different position. They never can become unknown. They never can be unnoticed. They therefore have every temptation to color the truth. If they were in a conspiracy to defraud the Government, if they were engaged in such a business, of course they are not coming on the stand to openly admit it. Of course they are going to seek to escape the result. The moral turpitude and degradation which would permit them to get up so gigantic a conspiracy to defraud the Government would carry them through any trial that they might be subjected to on the witness-stand or off of it. At the last trial they tried the policy of not coming on the stand.

Mr. HENKLE. Stop! You have no business to allude to that.

Mr. BLISS. Why not?

Mr. HENKLE. I insist that he has no right to allude to what transpired at the previous trial.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not object to it.

Mr. HENKLE. I do.

Mr. BLISS. At that time when the Government had much less evidence than it has now——

Mr. HENKLE. [Interposing.] I object to that, your honor.

The COURT. Now, Mr. Bliss——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] That has passed.

The COURT. That has passed, it is true; but Mr. Henkle puts in his protest, and I do not see how you can introduce a topic of that kind.

Mr. BLISS. If your honor considers that I have no right to speak of it I will not do so.

Mr. CARPENTER. It has been done all the time. We have had a great deal about the last trial. I do not object to it. I want to say something about it.

Mr. BLISS. I have not alluded to it once. You cannot find in the record one allusion of mine to that trial.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, I can.

Mr. BLISS. No, you cannot.

Mr. CARPENTER. You said we had enough of cross-examining Walsh at the last trial.

Mr. BLISS. That was not about the defendants going on the stand.

Mr. CARPENTER. The point Mr. Henkle makes is that you alluded to the last trial.

Mr. BLISS. I insist that I have that right inasmuch as the defense have offered evidence on that subject.

The COURT. The court excluded that.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not object. I will answer it.

Mr. BLISS. The court excluded part of the record offered, but we have in evidence what the verdict was.

The COURT. They have not given evidence of the other fact.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir.

The COURT. Make no further comment upon it.

Mr. BLISS. I will not, sir; I should have gotten way beyond it long ago if they had not interfered.

Mr. WILSON. Having violated the proprieties of this case he makes no further allusion to the matter. All I want is to have a like license.

Mr. BLISS. If I were to bandy words with anybody I certainly would not with Mr. Wilson. He is the one counsel on the other side who has up to the present time conducted himself as a gentleman.

The COURT. That is out of the record.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is very professional.

Mr. BLISS. I say that without the evidence of Rerdell the defendants failed of any acquittal at the last trial, and they have now, with the evidence of Rerdell, come before you and placed themselves upon the witness-stand, and they must be judged there in comparison with the other witnesses, precisely in the same way as other witnesses whose interests are involved and whose liberty is involved. Then let us consider where they stand.

As to Rerdell, we admit in the strongest terms that he is a guilty man, confessedly a guilty man. We admit that while the law gives you the right to believe him where even he is uncorroborated, yet we shall not ask you to do anything of that kind. We say that unless you believe, from all the circumstances of the case, that Mr. Rerdell intended here before you to tell the truth—though he may have made an error in a date here, or something there—we do not ask you to believe him, unless you find him corroborated by the evidence of others, by the record evidence in the case, and by the facts surrounding it. He has trained too long in the company of these defendants for us to ask you to believe him unless he is corroborated. We ask you to apply to these other defendants, however, precisely the same rule that you apply to him. They have trained together, he, however, working on an insignificant salary, insignificant in proportion to the profits and emoluments of these defendants, while they were working for the large profits which appear here in this case—$20,000 a year on the Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route; $80,000 profits during the four years' term. He had been doing their dirty work, admittedly, but because he has been doing their dirty work he is entitled to none the less confidence than they; he is entitled to no more than they.

The defendants have bestowed upon him the greatest possible compliment, for, almost from the moment he came upon the stand, they have devoted themselves to attacking his testimony, leaving almost untouched and uncontradicted the whole mass of the other testimony—testimony available to the Government before Mr. Rerdell was accepted as a witness on this trial. They have apparently sought to convince you, or to make an impression on your minds, that if Rerdell's testimony were out of the case there would not be any case against them. But is that so? I took occasion yesterday, in the course of my remarks, to call your attention to the condition of things on the uncontradicted, undisputed evidence down to that time, derived from the records and from the witnesses whom nobody questioned. Does not that make a case against these defendants such as, at least, requires a pretty clear and conclusive answer? And that is without Rerdell; and that is without Moore; and that is without Walsh and others, to whose testimony I am going to refer you.

Let me say here that if Rerdell had been manufacturing a story there were, all through his narrative, places where he would have manufactured an entirely different one. Take, for instance, this: Moore's interview with Dorsey admittedly took place in the presence of Rerdell. Rerdell let him into the room in Dorsey's house. Moore states the interview. Rerdell is asked about it, and he says, "I was present, but I was busy with my work; though sitting in the same room, I simply noticed that they were talking about the mail service, and I went on with my work." Now, gentlemen, if Rerdell had been manufacturing a story, how obviously natural it would have been for him to say at once, "Yes; I heard that conversation between Moore and Dorsey, and I heard every word of it, and it is just so," and have repeated it precisely as Moore gave it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Bliss, you say "admittedly." Dorsey never admitted any such thing. You cannot find it in the record.

Mr. BLISS. The defendants have admitted it, for the reason that there is an admission of an interview between Dorsey and Moore at that house at that time, and there is no denial of Rerdell's presence at that time.

Mr. CARPENTER. The record shows no much admission.

Mr. BLISS. There is not any denial of Rerdell's presence. Mr. Dorsey was on the stand and could have denied it, and how easy it would have been for him to say, "Mr. Rerdell was not there; this conversation took place between us alone." But he did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Dorsey said he had no recollection of any such interview.

Mr. BLISS. As I understood it, Mr. Dorsey admitted the interview.

Mr. CARPENTER. He did not.

Mr. MERRICK. He admitted that he saw Moore there.

Mr. BLISS. He subsequently stated that he might have had two interviews with him, and stated that he might have talked with him about the mail service and various things of that kind. If they can point me to any place in the record where I have said anything upon that subject or any subject that is incorrect, I will be obliged to them for doing it. I do not propose to accept their memory against mine, or their statements against mine. I make my statements with entire confidence that they are correct. If the record is against me I will accept that.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Carpenter is not yet the record in this case.

The COURT. This has gone entirely too far. It will not do for counsel, merely on his declaration of the character of the evidence, to repeat these interruptions; the jury must decide that matter. Let the contradiction be made and referred to the jury for their memory. I do not want any more interruptions.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not want to interrupt the counsel, but when he makes a statement that is not in the record I have the right to call the attention of the court and himself to it. And if the court please, I cannot show by the record what is not in it.

The COURT. We will stop now. While I have my own recollection about it, I do not propose to state it.

Mr. MERRICK. Let us find it.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think Mr. Dorsey did admit it, except by his silence.

The COURT. Now, we are going to have this point settled, because if the court allows these interruptions to go on without having them settled the matter will come to such a pass as to be uncontrollable.

Mr. WILSON. I think Mr. Bliss and Mr. Carpenter now agree.

The COURT. Of course, the jury will have to determine it; but we have the record and can get to it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Dorsey admitted that he saw Moore upon his return from the West; but he did not admit the interview. He said he had no recollection of it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There were two interviews, your honor will recollect.

The COURT. I am not depending upon recollection; that is not the record in the case.

Mr. MERRICK. I have found part of it, and I will read it. This is on direct examination, but it was brought out more fully on cross-examination. I read from page 3759:

Q. You may state whether you had at that time any conversation with Mr. Andrew W. Moore?

Mr. CARPENTER. What witness is that?

Mr. MERRICK. Dorsey.

A. Not a word.

Q. Do you remember to have seen him before that time?—A. I do not. It is possible, of course, that he may have called at my office, and I have forgotten it.

Q. You only remember the once?—A. I only remember the one time.

Then he goes on, at the bottom of the page:

Q. You may state whether you had at that time any conversation with Mr. Andrew W. Moore?—A. Not a word.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the conversation of July.

Mr. MERRICK. No, it is not.

Q. He also says that at that time you showed him a bundle of blank subcontracts.

* * * If you ever had any conversation with Mr. Moore in regard to making these subcontracts and making allowance for daily service, will you tell the jury what that conversation was?—A. I never had a conversation with Mr. Moore of three words in the world. That is a lie made out of whole cloth.

That is what he says there. Further on down, towards the bottom of the page, he says:

Q. You remember, as I understand, no conversation with this witness about making contracts or subcontracts?—A. None whatever.

Q. Or anything in regard to the per cent. that should be allowed for expedition or increase?—A. No, sir.

Q. Nothing of the kind?—A. No, sir; the only conversation I ever had with Mr. Moore was when he came to me some time in July with a letter from Mr. Miner requesting me to pay Moore $250, and I gave it to him.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will come to that in a little while.

Q. Do you remember advancing any money to Mr. Miner about that time?

The WITNESS. About what time?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Say about the 8th of April, 1878.

A. I think I did.

Q. Did you at that time give any checks to this Mr. Moore?—A. No, sir.

The COURT. That is Miner.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing to read:]

Q. To whom did you give the checks that were used by him?—A. I do not know what checks he used; I gave Miner checks if he asked me for them.

On page 3769 I think it is——

Mr. CARPENTER. [Interposing.] That relates to the July interview

Mr. MERRICK. It relates to the April interview.

Mr. BLISS. If you want the April interview, take page 3910:

Q. Do you know A. W. Moore?—A. I saw him once, possibly twice.

Q. When did you see him?—A. June or July, 1878, I think; possibly I saw him in the April previous.

Though he swore that he never had three words with him.

Q. You say you saw him possibly twice?—A. Possibly.

Q. Have you any recollection of seeing him more than once?—A. I have no recollection at all.

Q. When did you first become acquainted with him?—A. I just stated that I may have seen him in April, 1878, but I think I did not; still it is possible.

Then he goes on with questions as to the employment of Moore by Miner at that time. He says he knew nothing of him before 1878, and then he said, on page 3911, that he paid him in July—I think it is July—$250, without any inquiry whatever.

Mr. MERRICK. He says, further on in that cross-examination, that he may have had—I think his expression was “probably did have”—a conversation with him.

Mr. BLISS. Further along there is something about a conversation in July, but I do not find any other reference to the April interview, except that he says that he may have met him, but he does not remember it. If that is all there is, then I have stated it too strongly in saying that there was a direct admission.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is all that we want.

Mr. BLISS. But I wish to call your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that he is a witness swearing in his own interest in reference to a matter about which he says that he has no recollection, and about a thing that I think he could hardly fail to remember, and I would apply to him the language that Mr. Wilson applied in this case: “It has come to be a well-known fact in the history of the profession that witnesses in order to avoid impeachment make the convenient answer, “I don’t remember.”

Mr. MERRICK. At page 3918 I find this:

Q. You have testified, I believe, that although you took such an active interest in this business at that time in 1878, you did not ask Mr. Moore anything about it when he returned?—A. I did not say that. I said I might have asked him something about it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That has no relation to the first interview at all.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think we need to take any more time about that. I simply say precisely what it is—that he says he does not remember the interview. After starting off by saying he never had three words of conversation with him in the world, he is compelled to admit that he met him in July, did pay him money then, and he is also compelled to admit that he may have met him in April and he may have had such a conversation.

Now, gentlemen, my friend on the other side was exceedingly anxious to get in his denial of what I said, but he was not so anxious to get in that denial when he had the legal right to get it in. They consumed considerable time cross-examining Mr. Rerdell, and they consumed considerable time in arguing the question whether they had not the right to ask Mr. Rerdell if he had not said certain things to Mr. Carpenter during the last trial; and finally the court admitted it, so that they laid the basis for contradiction there. And yet, gentlemen, this case closed and Mr. Carpenter did not exercise his right to go upon the stand and say that Mr. Rerdell had not told the truth. They had considerable of an argument with the court as to the right to go into that, and they were allowed to go into it to a qualified extent. And then what happened? Mr. Carpenter did not interrupt.

While I am on that subject, let me call your attention to an extraordinary series of things in connection with Mr. Rerdell. They asked him in the first place if he did not have a conversation with somebody named Charles Thompson—"Thompson with a p," I think—in which he told Thompson certain things. Mr. Rerdell denied it. He was also asked whether he did not have a conversation with Mr. McSweeney, in which he told him certain things; Rerdell, as I recollect, denied it. He was also asked whether he did not have a conversation with John L. French, the former chief clerk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and they asked him that in various forms, going over several pages of testimony. Mr. Rerdell denied, or explained, as the case may be. He was also asked whether he did not have a conversation with James W. Bosler on very important matters; Mr. Rerdell denied it. Whether he did not have a conversation with Mr. Gilbert; Mr. Rerdell, as I recollect, denied that. Whether he did not have a conversation with Mr. Wall; Rerdell denied it. They took up not less, I think, than thirty or forty pages of the record in putting, at different times, questions to Mr. Rerdell as to whether he had not said certain things inconsistent with his testimony upon the stand; and being met by Mr. Rerdell's oath to the contrary, though they had named men and time, and conformed to the rule which would have enabled them to call every one of those men to contradict him, not one of them dared to come into this room and place himself on that stand and subject himself to the test of cross-examination. Not that some of them are not gentlemen who would have told the truth, and I do not know but all of them would; several of them I do not know—every one I know, I believe, would have told the truth. But they did not dare to undertake to put any one of them on the stand, and therefore, so far as all that is concerned, Rerdell stands unimpeached. Mr. Carpenter, if he could have impeached Rerdell, had abundant opportunity to go on the stand without any interruption of the regular course of proceedings.

Now, gentlemen, as to these defendants; and first as to Brady. It is necessary for me to say very little more as to Brady. His avowals on the stand of his utter disregard of the law; his avowals of the course he took in reference to expedition; his avowals of the rules which governed him; his acts, always leaning in favor of these contractors, always redounding to their benefit, never doing anything on behalf of the Government, sufficiently characterize Mr. Brady when we consider him in connection with the evidence to which I have called your attention this morning. The man who disobeyed his superior officer, Mr. James, in not revoking his order on the White River route; the man who exhausted the appropriations, made by his own estimate, within six months; the man who, pending that time, acquired sudden wealth—that man really needs from me very little further attention.

But I call your attention to one thing, gentlemen, as bearing upon his theories here in the most extraordinary way. He told you on the stand that his theory was that they should pay $30 a mile for service. And yet Mr. Miner tells you that before the 1st of July, 1878, the department was anxious to have service put on the Bismarck and Tongue River route, so anxious that they were asked to make a proposition for temporary service. And Boone tells you that in pursuance of that he did make a proposition for temporary service, which proposition was at the rate of $30 a mile, though the evidence is conclusive that temporary service is greatly more expensive than permanent service. And Miner tells you that Mr. Brady would not accept temporary service for $30 a mile upon a route which he was anxious to have commence, because $30 a mile was too large. And yet on the same route he subsequently paid at the rate of something like $37 or $38 a mile; and he wants you to believe that $30 a mile was his rule of action, though he never said anything about that during his entire examination before the Congressional committee in 1880, and nobody ever heard of it until he came on the stand here. How completely Mr. Miner by this little piece of testimony punctures that theory.

Now, as to Mr. Walsh——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Before you go into that, here is the answer of Mr. Dorsey, on cross-examination, which occurred, to my recollection, on page 3916:

Q. Did you inquire anything of him about his visit to the West?—A. I don't think I did. I don't remember.

Q. You have said you never had three words of conversation with him in your life?—A. Well, three words may be cutting it a little short, but I had no conversation to speak of with him.

Mr. CARPENTER. That refers to the interview of the 11th of July.

The COURT. Yes; in July. That was my recollection of his language, but I did not know just where to find it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Bliss referred to the interview in April.

The COURT. I understood that.

Mr. BLISS. My argument upon that subject will have just the same force in either case. I was directing your attention, gentlemen, to this: That if Mr. Rerdell had been making up a story he would have said that he heard that conversation, and he would have detailed it precisely as Moore did. He said honestly and squarely that he was there; that he let Moore in just as Moore said; that he heard the conversation about mail contracts, but that he was busy with his writing, sitting at his desk half a dozen feet away, looking up occasionally, but that he paid no attention to the conversation. So much for that.

Now, as to Walsh. Let us see about Walsh and Brady. The condition of things is this: Brady, while supervisor of internal revenue at New Orleans, first met and knew Walsh. After Brady became Second Assistant Postmaster-General he privately awarded to Walsh a contract for $18,000, which, by private orders for expedition, he ran up to $135,000 or $136,000. He admits that he had frequent conversations with Mr. Walsh; he admits that he met him at Sheridan's house constantly; that it was one of the loafing places of both of them. He says that Walsh was always professing a willingness to loan him money. They were on such terms as that. Now, gentlemen, how many friends has any one of you that are intimate enough to be always professing willingness to loan you money?

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have none such.

Mr. BLISS. I do not believe these gentlemen have, any of them, in their past lives, had any such intimate friends as that. But Mr. Brady was in such relation to Mr. Walsh that Walsh was always professing a willingness to loan him money. On Brady's advice Mr. Walsh put $24,000 of his money in cash, which Brady says he paid on the spot, into the purchase of some wild-cat railroad stock down in Chattanooga, and which Brady was engaged in an attempt to boom up, but which, like a good many other booms, Presidential and otherwise, did not boom worth a cent, and down it went. But Mr. Walsh and Mr. Brady were on such terms that, simply upon the advice of Brady, Walsh invested $24,000 in a certain stock.

Then we come to the "ginger" letter. In the "ginger" letter Brady addresses him as "My dear Walsh," and then he seeks to borrow from him the stock which, on his advice, Walsh had invested his $24,000 in. Walsh did not let him have it, fortunately for Walsh. But however that may be, those were the relations existing between those two men—relations of intimacy, closer intimacy apparently than is likely to exist between any two ordinary men whom we see in the world—Mr. Brady, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General seeking to borrow $24,000 worth of property of a contractor under him, to whom he had privately given a contract originally for $18,000, and which amount he had privately run up to $135,000 or $136,000. Those are the conditions of things as they stood at that time.

Mr. Walsh alleges that he wrote to Mr. Brady a letter, in which he asks him to appoint an interview at Sheridan's house, this congenial loafing place of the two. That letter is in the record at page 2206. It is dated December 28, and the year is left blank.

GENERAL: A fire will be made in Sheridan's office at 1 this p. m. Wish you would meet me there at that hour, or at any other time you find convenient.

Yours,

WALSH.

Send word by bearer.

That was written in ink. On the back this was written in pencil:

Will be there at 12.30.

Walsh says that he sent that letter to Mr. Brady, and he says that the answer came back, and that in pursuance of that he had the interview as to which he testifies. Mr. Brady was put upon the stand, gentlemen, but they did not ask him to deny the writing of that letter in any manner. Walsh having said that it was his, Mr. Brady comes on the stand, and by his silence—as I submit the court will instruct you—he admits that that statement is true.

That being the case, what then occurs, according to Walsh? And as it is not very long I can probably read it quite as shortly as I could state it. At page 2207 he says:

Q. Will you be so good as to detail all that passed at that interview, as nearly as you can recollect it, the language of General Brady, and, if you cannot recall his language, state it in substance, giving the exact meaning of the language he used?—

A. Agreeably to the terms expressed in that note General Brady met me at the house of General Sheridan, and after some desultory conversation, which just now I cannot recall, we touched on the subject of the difficulties that Jerome J. Hinds at that time was causing the Post-Office Department and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I expressed it as my opinion that Mr. Hinds would make a very great deal of trouble for Mr. Brady; that he had expressed a determination to do so, and I thought had every disposition. General Brady remarked that he did not care particularly about Mr. Hinds; that Mr. Hinds was powerless to affect him. We may have and probably did discuss some other subjects before coming to the point, which was the payment of the notes of General Brady that I held, amounting to about $25,000. General Brady asked me if I had the memoranda or data with me. I responded that I had. I had the notes in my pocket. I had also memoranda as to other amounts than expressed in the notes. Mr. Brady sat there listening to me. I told him that everything was pretty well determined except as to the matter of interest; that there was no interest expressed on the face of the notes; that that matter had been held in abeyance and that now would be a proper time to adjust it; that the time had come when I desired the payment of the notes, for the reason, among others, that I needed money. Mr. Brady sat there very calmly at the table turning the papers over in his hands and putting them down; he looked at me inquiringly and asked me if I was in earnest. I told him yes, I thought I was. He asked me if I did not think that that matter had been pretty well and fairly liquidated. I asked him to explain. He entered into an explanation without any sort of hesitation. He reminded me of the fact that I was in the enjoyment of a very remunerative contract.

Q. What contract was that?—A. From Albuquerque, New Mexico, to Prescott, Arizona.

Q. You held that contract?—A. Yes, sir; at that time. He informed me that he had expedited that very largely, had increased the service; the pay had been largely increased as the result, and that he did not really think that he owed me anything; that he did not see how I thought he could possibly owe me. I reminded him of the fact, as I had repeatedly told him, that the contract, even viewed from that standpoint, was unremunerative; that it had been a source of no profit to me; on the contrary, a loss; that he himself was largely instrumental in my ever having entered into it, and that I felt that such increase and expedition as had been accorded me was made under the law. He smiled at that, and asked me if I had not seen cases where petitions, &c., very numerous and largely signed, had not effected any result whatever. He then referred to the fact that after he had cut my trips down from 1876, that all the petitions that had come from that country had not succeeded. He said, in brief, that the matter of petitions was simply to enable him to act within the law, and that any man might have understood that, not seeing half as much as I had. I asked him what he meant by saying what I had seen. He referred me to the Price and Peterson drafts, and said that I ought to have been able to have divined from them what was the custom. I asked him what was the custom; that I still could not understand from those drafts; all I knew was the existence of the drafts, but how they came to be made, and what they were made for, was none of my affair and none of my business; that he had turned them over to me to his credit, and that it was not my province as a banker to inquire into the cause of their being made. He told me that my affectation of not knowing what the terms were was rather ridiculous; that I should know. I told him that I did not. He said that the amount that he exacted as a rule was 20 per cent. of the amount of the pay that was increased [the total increase of pay over the original contract]—20 per centum of that multiplied by the term of the contract.

Q. Twenty per centum per annum, do you mean?—A. Twenty per centum of the total pay minus the original pay [the increased pay] multiplied by the terms of the contract. For instance, in this case——

* * * * *

Mr. MERRICK. I ask you for the whole conversation. Did he proceed to figure on that expedition?—A. The contract that I held when I first had the increase accorded me was from Santa Fé, New Mexico, to Prescott, Arizona, Santa Fé being the eastern terminus. The eastern terminus was changed from Santa Fé to Albuquerque when I took the subcontract. This is not General Brady's language, however. I shall have to state it, and then if it is difficult of understanding I will have to explain my explanation. The difference between $74,000 in round numbers——

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. [Interposing.] Are you giving now what General Brady said?—A. Yes, sir. The difference between $74,000, in round numbers, the figure from which the pay had been last increased to $135,000, in round numbers, amounted to about $30,000.

It is printed $30,000, but I suppose it means $50,000.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. $74,000, originally?—A. $74,000. I take even numbers. The difference would be about $50,000 or $60,000.

Mr. MERRICK. $61,000, according to the figures.

The WITNESS. Amounting in round numbers to $60,000, and we were taking round numbers. 20 per cent. of that multiplied by 3——

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. [Interposing.] This is Brady's language you are using, is it?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

The WITNESS. Multiplied by 3 made, in his opinion, about $36,000.

By the COURT:

Q. Why multiply by 3?—A. The contract term.

Q. That is, three years?—A. Yes, sir; the contract had three years to run.

The COURT. So I understand; but I wish it made plain.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Had three years to run from the time of the increase?—A. Yes, sir. He told me that he did not feel that I was indebted to him for the increase from eleven thousand and odd dollars under the McDonough régime to $74,000.

Q. Why?—A. For the reason that he admitted that I had substantially been the instrument from whence the money had come to pay that to S. P. Brown, George McDonough, the contractor, having borrowed the money of me.

Q. Did George McDonough ever pay it back?—A. No, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Go on with the conversation.—A. He further informed me that I owed him $8,000, as my pro rata for the Congressional corruption fund. I do not know that he stated it that way.

You will bear in mind that that fund is alleged to have been used in procuring the passage of the bill which covered up Mr. Brady's extravagance, by giving him a sufficient amount of money to keep the service running, in the spring of 1880, for the remainder of the fiscal year. Mr. Wilson then calls upon him to state it precisely:

The WITNESS. That $8,000 was the amount of my part of the pro rata to contribute towards the passage of the appropriation bills, and the star route in Congress. I told him that I had not authorized any disbursement of money; that I had been a witness before the Congressional committee that was investigating the subject of star-route matters; that I felt that I had probably been as largely investigated as most any contractor, and that it had not cost me a cent; nobody had asked me for any money, and in a general way I expressed some doubts as to the money having been spent, and reminded him, further, that I had refused to contribute to Chase Andrews, who had approached me.

Chase Andrews was a witness on the stand, called by them. He was not questioned, however, on the subject as to whether he approached him or not.

He told me that that would not do; that I must not expect that those things could be done without some sort of effort, and that they always cost money. He then reminded me, further, that there had been a remission of fines and penalties in my case, and that the percentage that he was accustomed to receive on such occasions was 50, and that if I proceeded carefully to debit and credit his account, he thought that I would find that he did not owe me anything. I had remarked by that time the absence of the papers from the table.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. What papers?—A. My notes and memoranda that I had given him. When the conversation had assumed this shape, I thought perhaps the matter was getting pretty serious, and I asked General Brady what he meant by taking the notes. He said he meant to make a settlement of that in that way; that that was a settlement of it; that that account was audited, and was dismissed. I asked him if he thought that I was going to submit to that. He asked me what I could do. Well, I suggested mildly that I might go to the court. He remarked that I might go there, and perhaps it was all the good it would do me; that probably I ought to have learned enough by this time to find out that appeals to any of these tribunals were not productive of any great results.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. You are stating what he said?—A. Substantially. Perhaps he used the word "Congress" in connection with the word "courts." The idea was that appeal to anything in the District was something—

Q. [Interposing.] I want you to give his language as nearly as possible?—A. That I am doing; but it is very difficult to do that.

The COURT. You are not obliged to repeat his exact language, if you are able to swear to the substance of it.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all.

The WITNESS. I would like to do that. I do not wish to do him any injustice.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. What else transpired?—A. That was substantially an end to the interview. I talked to him further about my willingness to sell out in relation to my remark that the service had been unproductive of results to me; that I had lost money; that I had originally gone into the matter because he told me that the contractors were reputable people, and that I might loan them the money with safety; that my being a contractor was a matter of chance; that there was no solicitation on my part; it was really the result of necessity; and that, waiving the moralities of the matter altogether, it was not fair to treat me as he would his other contractors; that I did not come under that classification. He remarked that if I did not make money out of the contract it was because I did not know the business. I told him that that was possible. That I had accepted the contract and had attempted in good faith and to the best of my ability to perform the service; that I had performed the service; that I had stocked the route with the best mules and the best stock that had ever gone to the Territory, and that I felt convinced that there was absolutely no money in it; and I generally took occasion to doubt that contractors had agreed to pay any such money. He assured me that I was mistaken; that I was in error about it; that it was painfully obvious that I did not understand the business, and the best thing that I could do was to sell out.

Q. What else, if anything, passed at that interview, and how did you part?—A. We parted very much as philosophers. He seemed very philosophical and he seemed satisfied. I was very anxious to sell out then; more anxious than I was before.

Perhaps I ought to have read just before that. Walsh says that he found he was potent, certainly, with his contractors, and that he was willing to sell out at a sacrifice. Brady told him it was the best thing he could do, and then he said:

I do not suppose you want that part of it wherein I was approached by the contractors to sell out, do you?

I was very anxious to sell out then; more anxious than I was before.

Q. What did he say about other contracts than those and his relation to other contractors?

Mr. HENKLE. I object to that.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the witness.] I think you have stated that.

A. Yes, sir; he cited me the Price and Peterson drafts in substantiation of that, and also referred to the Price draft as particularly illustrative of the fact that everybody contributed.

Mr. WILSON. Never mind that. He is giving a running commentary.

The WITNESS. He referred to the Price draft in this way.

You will do the justice to remember, gentlemen, that if anything remains unexplained in reference to the Price and Peterson drafts it is not because we have not endeavored to get them before you.

Q. You have already stated that, and in a connection where it is appreciable, I think. Did he say anything about what you may have supposed to have been his reason for making these expeditions?—A. Oh, well, he said that he didn't think for a moment that I thought it afforded him any amusement to make expedition. I told him that I didn't know that I did, but I supposed the law directed him. He said that petitions simply enabled him to act within the law; that the petitions were matter of form. The petitions worked all right if it was all right; and when it was not, they didn't.

Q. He said that?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do not state anything but what he said.—A. I will refer to what he did say. He cited me petitions that produced no effect.

Q. Does anything else suggest itself to your recollection of what passed in that interview?—A. No, sir; not now.

Q. What further did you say to him about the notes, if anything, at that time?—A. You can readily imagine—

Mr. WILSON. [Interrupting.] No imagination.

The WITNESS. Well, I will say, then, briefly, that, of course, I remonstrated against that, and I said, as I stated before, that I would apply to the courts for such redress, and I was very confident that I could get that redress that I was entitled to. Then he made the response that I was at liberty to get all the redress I could, and that having gone as far as I had, I might have observed that investigations didn't generally result in much to him.

That is the evidence of Mr. Walsh. It stopped, and we took a recess. After recess the defendants came in and announced that they did not desire to ask Mr. Walsh any questions. That is the way it stands upon the record and the way it stands before you. Mr. Brady was on the intimate terms with Mr. Walsh such as are disclosed. Mr. Walsh came onto the stand with no interest in this prosecution. Mr. Walsh came here under a subpoena to testify to these facts. He was not a willing witness. Mr. Brady did not deny the interview. He did not deny the receipt of the letter. He did not deny indorsing it with the appointment for the interview. Mr. Brady does none of these things, but he comes here and says that the interview is not true. He admits the financial relations in the sense of the offers to lend him money; he admits his application to borrow of him; he admits all those intimate relations. His counsel does not dare to cross-examine Mr. Walsh, and yet Mr. Brady asks you to believe that Mr. Walsh was not speaking the truth, although he had no interest in the matter in any way except that he was trying to recover his debt. That recovery of his debt certainly is not to be promoted by shutting Mr. Brady up in the penitentiary. It is to his interest to have Mr. Brady at large that he may be able to apply some portion of this large fortune that he has acquired in the payment of this debt. Walsh comes and gives that testimony, which is unimpeached, nobody swearing against him other than Thomas J. Brady, and they not daring to ask him a single question on cross-examination, yet asking you to believe Mr. Brady in preference to him—Mr. Brady when he is swearing himself out of the penitentiary; Mr. Brady when his testimony shows that the statements made as to the petitions and the statements made upon other subjects in that conversation, according to Walsh, are consistent with the declarations of Mr. Brady upon the stand when he testified as to how he regarded the petitions and are consistent with Mr. Brady's action in reference to granting expedition and increase of trips. They are consistent with all the evidence in this case, and they are inconsistent with nothing that is before you.

As to Mr. Brady, let us go along a little further. Mr. Brady is alleged by Mr. Rerdell to have had a conversation with him at or about the time when this Congressional corruption fund was being brought into play. Mr. Rerdell testified on the subject—his testimony being quoted on page 3587, though that is not the place where he testified—that he had an interview with Mr. Brady. I have not the reference to the interview, but it is referred to in the letter which I have here. Mr. Rerdell testifies that there was a letter written by himself to Mr. James W. Bosler, the partner, the associate, and friend of some of these defendants, on the 22d of January, 1880, and that that letter correctly stated a transaction which occurred. We produced here a press-copy of that letter obviously taken from a letter-book, and having been on pages 358, 359, and 360 of the letter-book. Mr. Rerdell said that that letter was in one of Mr. Dorsey's letter-books, and was torn by him from the letter-book. We called upon Mr. Dorsey to produce his letter-books, and one of them was shown to have been in court during this trial. The evidence of various witnesses on the stand showed that they had seen those letter-books along through the trial. There was no pretense of denial that the letter-book which contained this letter was still in the possession of Mr. Dorsey. They refused absolutely to produce it, and I think Mr. Dorsey does expressly admit that at the pages in the letter-book where this letter would be there are missing sheets. We asked them if they would not show us the letter-book or let us see the index. Gibbs, the clerk at the Ebbitt House, swore that he indexed the three letter-books. We asked them to let us see simply the letter B in the index to see whether that letter which was copied there was not a letter to James W. Bosler. They refused to do it and refused to produce it. If there is any question that the letter that was on those pages of that letter-book was a letter covering three pages, addressed to James W. Bosler, and bearing date on the 22d of May, 1880, I think the court will tell you you are bound, from the mere fact of their failure to produce that letter-book, to draw from that fact the inference most strongly against them.

Mr. GILL (a juror). May I ask you a question?

Mr. BLISS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GILL. What is the length of the route from Santa Fé to Prescott?

Mr. BLISS. I do not know. I think it appears in the record, but I cannot tell you. I should say roughly in the neighborhood of between two and three hundred miles.

Mr. MERRICK. At least three hundred miles.

Mr. WILSON. That route is not in this case.

Mr. BLISS. No; not in this case; but there are some of the papers in the case. I think the route is from two to three hundred miles long.

Gentlemen, I will now read you this letter:

MAY 22, 1880.

J. W. BOSLER, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Yours of yesterday to hand, with inclosure of $500 for Steele to start West, and he will go to-night.

Steele, you remember, Mr. Dorsey testified, was one of his traveling agents who was engaged in attending to the service out West. That letter therefore acknowledges from Bosler the receipt of $500 for Steele to go West. If they had put Mr. Bosler on the stand; if they had dared to put their associate and partner on the stand, the gentleman who was in this city, and who was hanging around this court-room for a week or ten days, and if they had dared to produce that book by which Dorsey and Bosler settled in November last, they would have given us the opportunity to learn from Bosler and from the book that Dorsey had himself recognized whether that statement was true that at or about the 22d of May, 1880, Mr. Bosler had sent Mr. Rerdell $500 for Steele to use in going West. Then the letter continues:

On last night I was subpoenaed to go before the Appropriation Committee to-day at 10.30 a. m., and "to bring all books and papers relating to star mail route contracts belonging to S. W. Dorsey." I immediately telegraphed you to that effect, asking "what I should do." I am now just in receipt of your reply, saying no harm could come of the books being made public. In this we all here think very different, and for the following reasons:

1st. The books would show very large profits, and would be used by the committee as an additional argument that all expedited routes should be readvertised and relet.

2d. There are several entries giving D. credit for large cash payments made to John Smith and Saml. Jones.

3d. I understand the committee will try to show that he had an interest in mail routes before last April.

"He" there must mean Stephen W. Dorsey.

I appeared before the committee this morning and got excused until Monday morning; but before doing so I drew up an answer, after getting advice of counsel, that I could not produce the books and papers asked for until I had consulted with Mr.

Dorsey. This answer I shall hand to the committee on Monday, and endeavor by every means to delay any examination until I hear from Dorsey.

Gentlemen, if they had produced Mr. Bosler's books; if they had produced the book by which Mr. Dorsey settled; if they had produced the accounts rendered by Rerdell, testified to by Mr. Dorsey and by Mr. Rerdell as accounts which he rendered to Mr. Bosler showing his expenses every month, don't you believe there would have appeared in those accounts the fee paid to counsel for the advice that Rerdell got? And it would have been extraordinary, gentlemen, considering the large number of counsel who first and last have been in the employment of these defendants, if it did not happen to disclose some one of them.

There is much more in this than you think, and I would like to hear from you about it.

The indications are that they did not let Mr. Bosler into all the details of their rascality, and yet with what little Mr. Bosler knew they did not dare to put him on the stand.

Gen. B—

Meaning of course General Brady—is very much alarmed, and he and I had a long conversation to-day, during which he made several valuable suggestions, which I shall follow.

I will not produce the books until advised by you or Dorsey to do so, as I shall claim that I am his attorney, and as such am not required to divulge confidential matters.

I would be glad to hear from you by Monday morning.

Very truly,

M. C. RERDELL.

The date of that letter is May 22, 1880. At that time Mr. Dorsey was not in this vicinity, and Mr. Rerdell, faithful to his employer, refused to obey the subpoena of what these gentlemen call the highest court of the country, the court before which they allege Mr. Brady alone can be tried, the Congress of the United States.

Rerdell refused to obey that subpoena and consulted counsel, and as a means of getting a delay he stated that he would not produce the books in his possession until he was advised so to do by either Bosler or by Dorsey. Now, gentlemen, what do those facts involve? Do you suppose, will it be claimed before you, and if claimed will it gain a moment's credence from any one of you, that away back on the 22d of May, 1880, Rerdell was engaged in a scheme to get up evidence to pretend that these defendants were in a conspiracy to defraud the Government, and to write a letter detailing a fictitious interview with Thomas J. Brady with an idea that by and by, at some time or other after the investigation in Congress was over, this letter might be of use to him. Either this letter was written at that time or—but I will not put that contingency. The letter was written at that time. beyond all question, because it came, beyond all question, from the letter-book in use in Dorsey's mail business at that time. If it had not been there in the letter-book under date of May 22, 1880, how quickly that letter-book would have come in here. If there had been another letter there occupying those pages, how quickly that letter-book would have come in here. If there had been blank pages there, or if the index had shown, although the pages were gone, that there was a letter on those pages not to Bosler but to somebody else, how quickly that index would have been brought in here, and how quickly that letter-book would have been brought in here, and how Mr. Rerdell would have been crushed upon the stand. And yet, gentlemen, they have that letter-book and did not dare to produce it before you. Mr. Carpenter thinks that silence is not an admission. Could there be a more convincing admission that that letter was in that letter-book at that time, and upon those pages, and written on that day? You of course all know that letters go in consecutively by date. Rerdell swears that it was so, and swears that he wrote the letter on that day; swears that he had this interview with Mr. Brady at which these things occurred. Mr. Bosler, whom we put upon the stand for the purpose of getting the right to put that copy in instead of the original letter, states that he does not remember that he ever received that letter, and I think he goes further and finally on re-examination says he is very confident that he did not receive it. However that may be, Mr. Rerdell says he wrote that letter on that day, and he mailed it to James W. Bosler. Yet you are asked to believe that Mr. Rerdell tells a lie, when they do not dare to produce the book that was in their possession, and which would be convincing either one way or the other as to whether such a letter was written. Now, gentlemen, you will bear in mind that I have read this letter merely in connection with Mr. Brady. I shall have occasion to refer to the letter again with regard to what he says about Samuel Jones and Smith, as showing how completely that letter in its statements upon those subjects is borne out by other statements made by entirely unimpeachable witnesses. But as to Mr. Brady, the letter says that Rerdell had a conversation with Mr. Brady that morning.

The COURT. With General B.

Mr. BLISS. With General B.

General B. is very much alarmed, and he and I had a long conversation to-day, during which he made several valuable suggestions, which I shall follow.

I thought I had a reference to Mr. Rerdell's testimony upon that subject. I think I can state it, however, with sufficient accuracy. He says that he told Mr. Brady he had been subpoenaed, and told him that the books contained troublesome entries, and that Mr. Brady told him that "Dorsey was a damned fool for keeping books," and that he had no business to keep any books; and then there was arranged between them a scheme by which that set of books should be suppressed and a new set of books should be made, and Mr. Rerdell was in some way, by feigning sickness or shamming, to get sufficient time to have that new set of books made, and then they were to be put in before Congress. From that new set of books were to be omitted the troublesome entries which Mr. Rerdell had referred to in this letter. He then says that he went on and did procure that set of books to be made. I shall recur to that statement again. I simply now mention it in connection with Mr. Brady as showing that this statement of Mr. Rerdell of the interview with Mr. Brady which Mr. Brady denies, is not a thing hatched up after this prosecution has come, after Mr. Rerdell has become a defendant, and after Mr. Rerdell has confessed his guilt. It is not anything of that kind. It is a statement which Mr. Rerdell made referring to that conversation away back on the 22d of May, 1880, and therefore either that conversation must be true, or you have got to believe that Mr. Rerdell three years ago went to work to manufacture a fictitious interview with Mr. Brady, and wrote a letter in regard to it. Gentlemen, that that interview occurred is just as certain as that these defendants, or some of them, undertook to get up a fictitious post-office. That interview was genuine. There was nothing fictitious about it. It was Mr. Brady's outburst to Mr. Rerdell when he found that Dorsey had kept books and had done the business not in a way described by somebody in this case. I am not sure whether it was on this trial or the last; but Mr. Boone, I think, on one occasion when he was asked as to books and speaking of some concern that did not keep any books, said they did business on "graveyard principles."

Mr. DAVIDGE. What is the page of the record?

Mr. BLISS. On one trial or the other it was said by somebody, and they want you to believe——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Does not Mr. Bliss know perfectly well that there is not a word to that effect in this evidence?

Mr. BLISS. I am not saying it is in evidence.

The COURT. Mr. Vaile stated on this trial that they kept no books.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Vaile said they kept no books.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Bliss is using the expression "on graveyard principles" as an expression used by some one at some time to illustrate their habit of not keeping books.

The COURT. That is what Boone said on another occasion. Boone did not repeat those words here.

Mr. BLISS. I was careful to say that it was said by somebody, and I thought by Mr. Boone, either on this trial or the last. I do not care whether he said it in this court-room or out of doors. It was very expressive language. He said they did business, keeping no books, "on graveyard principles." If there is any objection to my quoting the language, I will adopt it, and I will say that they want you to believe that they did business on graveyard principles.

The COURT. You adopt it as your own language.

Mr. BLISS. Yes. There has already been enough of stealing in this case. I do not want to steal anybody's language.

Mr. HENKLE. You stole that from the former trial.

The COURT. A man has a right to make a quotation.

Mr. BLISS. I distinctly said it was not on this trial.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not object to any testimony coming from Mr. Bliss. I shall comment on it.

The COURT. Undoubtedly on this trial Mr. Vaile did state that he kept no books.

Mr. BLISS. Dorsey undertook to state it also.

The COURT. Vaile said so.

Mr. BLISS. Both of them. They undertook to tell you that they carried on this business in that way. As to these nineteen routes the business amounted to about half a million dollars a year, and they had one hundred and thirty-four routes altogether. You can see by making a calculation that if the other routes amounted to as much on an average as the routes in this indictment that their business involved something like $3,000,000 a year of receipts and expenditures, making $6,000,000 a year if you count both ways, and yet they carried on that large business and kept no books; that all the books they had were the books that the Government kept and the bank account. They ask you to believe that. I do not wonder that the gentlemen do not want it referred to and do not want it described in the expressive language of being on "graveyard principles." They did their business in that way and it remains for you, gentlemen, to say whether those principles shall not be carried out and they shall not find that they have done business on principles which will carry their characters down to the grave.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, with these remarks, calling your attention to Mr. Brady's avowals upon the stand; to Mr. Brady's action as shown by the papers; to the testimony of Mr. Rer-dell; to the letter produced, which very clearly, as we say, is genuine beyond all question and states correctly what occurred with reference to Mr. Brady, I for the time leave him and pass on to some of the other defendants in this case. Let us, in the first place, take Mr. Vaile, that innocent, confiding gentleman, who, having been educated as a lawyer, made a fortune as a mail contractor and then came on the stand to avow that he was carrying on business upon philanthropic principles, and that he was keeping books upon graveyard principles. This man who has grown rich in the sharp competition that exists among post-office contractors wanted you to believe, and so stated on the stand, that he had no previous acquaintance with Miner and never had seen him, unless, possibly, he might have been introduced to him at some time, or had him pointed out to him, until the spring of 1878 (Mr. Miner fixing the time of their first acquaintance as probably about the 23d or 24th of July, 1878); but he tells you that he found Miner here at that time in great trouble in connection with his inability to carry out the contracts which he had on hand. Mr. Miner says that he returned here from Denver, having met Stephen W. Dorsey in Saint Louis on his way back, and that he arrived here about the 21st, 22d, or 23d of July, and that at that time, or shortly after that, he casually met Mr. Vaile and confided his troubles to him, and that Mr. Vaile sympathized with him tangibly. Mr. Vaile says, upon page 4006 of his testimony:

As I have remarked, Mr. Miner was in great trouble. He came to me so frequently for advice that I at last became very much interested in him, and it was merely through sympathy to do him a kindly act. He seemed to be standing quite alone, with no one to go to, and perhaps I might be permitted to say that other contractors were standing about, as it were, anxious for him to fail, and to gobble up these contracts at a higher figure.

Now, gentlemen, consider right there how the question of time comes in to show that that statement cannot be correct. Mr. Miner says on page 4162, with regard to the time that he first came into connection with Mr. Vaile:

I probably met Mr. Vaile in the spring of 1878, though the acquaintance was merely casual, and made no great impression on my mind. I next met him about the 20th of July, when I returned from Denver; the 23d or 24th probably, according to some checks that are in evidence.

The 23d or 24th of July "probably" was the time when Miner says he first met Mr. Vaile. Mr. Vaile says that after he met him Miner came to him so frequently for advice that he at last became interested in him, and through sympathy he undertook to do him a kindly act! But Mr. Vaile also says that he left here about the 5th to the 8th of August to go home, and he says that twice after he met Miner and became interested in Miner he went to Brady and got from Brady a fortnight's extension of the time for them to commence their service. He did not meet Miner until the 23d or 24th of July. He left here before the 10th of August. The first extension of time was got about the 1st of August and was until the 16th, beyond all dispute. Yet Mr. Vaile tells you that Miner came to him so frequently for advice that he at last became very much interested in him, and it was merely through sympathy to do him a kindly act. Mr. Boone says that he got the extension from Mr. Brady; that he went to him and stated the case to him, and that he got the extension until the 16th of August, and he states the reason and all about it, which I think can leave no doubt in the minds of any one that the extension was obtained by Mr. Boone. There is a very significant fact in connection with the matter so far as Mr. Vaile is concerned. Mr. Vaile on direct examination only talked about obtaining one extension. I cannot be mistaken as to that. But when it came to cross-examination he found himself getting into some difficulties, and then, for the first time came up a claim, so far as Mr. Vaile was concerned, that he went once to Mr. Brady and got an extension and then went to Mr. Brady fifteen days afterwards and got another extension. That that cannot be true is shown by the mere question of the dates, for Mr. Miner says he did not meet him until the 23d or 24th of July, before the 16th of August, the time when the first extension ended, and Mr. Vaile had left to go home before the latter time. Mr. Vaile's story is that between the 23d or 24th of July and the time that he went home this casual acquaintance came to him so frequently for advice that at last his sympathy was excited and he went to work to see what he could do for him. Mr. Vaile says, in his direct examination, on page 4002, that he met him here in the last of July, and not very long after that he claimed that he went to Brady for an extension. Subsequent to that, on page 4051, he claims that he went and got a second extension. And not only that, but we find this condition of things: Mr. Vaile, by his own statement, knew Mr. Brady only casually. He had no intimacy with him. He had nothing to do with him that enabled him, as he says, to exercise any greater influence over Mr. Brady to secure an extension than any other person or any other contractor, and he only used arguments which it would have been just as easy for Mr. Miner to use as for Mr. Vaile. These arguments in point of fact Mr. Boone says neither of them used, and that he used them himself, and he himself obtained that extension from Mr. Brady. These are little details, gentlemen, and yet after all they are important as bearing upon the question of who is to be believed in connection with this case. I will read from page 1571:

Q. As a matter of fact, did you know that Mr. Brady had said that he would declare you people failing contractors unless the service was on by the 15th of August?

* * * * *

A. The first time that General Brady ever sent for me in his life was on that occasion. Mr. Miner was absent. John W. Dorsey was absent. Peck was absent.

Miner was out in Denver.

He showed me the telegram from the postmistress at The Dalles. He says, "All that Dalles service is down, and it is very important that that service should be put on. It cannot be put on at your contract price, and my advice would be for you to telegraph there and have that service put on at any price." I told him I would. And he further said to me that unless that service was on, and unless all of our service was on by the 15th of August, he would declare the contractor a failing contractor on every route that the service was down. I think the thing ran along then until the latter part of July, when I wrote a letter, which is on the files of the department, asking for the outside limit of indulgence of the department owing to our time being engaged in that investigation by Congress. Fully a month and a half of our time was taken up by that investigation, and we did not know what to do with the service. We did not dare to move. We expected that the contracts would be taken from us. Ninety-nine times out of one hundred the contracts would have been taken from us.

Mr. MERRICK. That was the condition of things at that time?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. Your time had been taken up by the investigation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the outside limit given to you?—A. The 15th day of August.

There is his statement of what the outside limit given to him was and that he got the service extended until that time. He says that Mr. Brady showed him a telegram that the service was down, and insisted upon it that the service should be put on. I thought I could refer to the telegram upon that subject in the record as to the service being down, but I cannot lay my hand upon it and I am not sure that it is in evidence, though I am under that impression. However, that is unimportant. Mr. Boone got the extension to the 16th of August beyond all question. All this story of Vaile's about having gone to get that first extension is beyond doubt a mistake. That Vaile went and got the second extension I think is true. Mr. Vaile thus influenced by pity for Miner, whom he found here at the mercy of the other contractors, interested himself in behalf of Miner, and he thought he would protect this poor, unsophisticated, innocent dove, who was here surrounded by all these hawks. He said he must have a champion, and he would be that champion; and yet when we get along a little further in the case we find Mr. Vaile admitting that he knew at that time that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was interested in behalf of Mr. Miner and in behalf of that service, and that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey had by loans or in some other way become pecuniarily interested in it, and so there certainly was not any necessity, taking the then existing condition of things, for Vaile's assistance. Dorsey was a Senator of the United States, a leading member of important committees, a leading member of the dominant party in power to which the Second Assistant Postmaster-General belonged. Was there any necessity that these parties to whom he had advanced his money, and whose success he was interested in, and for whom he had obtained bondsmen, should go to others for help? Was there any reason why this gentleman from Western Missouri, never having seen Mr. Dorsey himself, never having known John W. Dorsey, never in his life having seen John M. Peck, and never having met Mr. Miner until he casually met him on the 23d or 24th of July, 1878, should go on and interest himself on behalf of this man because he was here unprotected and unsupported, when Stephen W. Dorsey was interested with him, although Stephen W. Dorsey might not have been here for the moment on the spot? Is it to be believed that there would be any trouble in securing the aid and the support and the assistance of Mr. Dorsey on behalf of these gentlemen, and that it would be much more powerful, in the nature of things, than any assistance which this casual acquaintance from Western Missouri could give? Is not this true, gentlemen, unless there existed between Mr. Vaile and Mr. Brady relations which enabled him to exercise a more powerful influence than the circumstances on the surface would seem to suggest? Now, Mr. Vaile, having been thus interested in behalf of his casual acquaintance and having gone twice, as he says, to the Post-Office Department, and using the arguments which must have occurred at once to Mr. Brady as far as he stated them, arguments the substance of which Mr. Brady must have known better than he did, although he was an experienced contractor, having done this, Mr. Vaile wants you to believe that he carried his sympathies still further, and that just prior to going home, early in August, he left written offers in Mr. Miner's hands to be used in case Mr. Brady undertook to declare them failing contractors. They were offers that he would perform the service at the very rate at which it was being performed. He says that he had no security that those offers would be accepted; no security whatever that Mr. Brady would accept them. There were offers upon each route separately, and Mr. Brady might accept his offers as to the routes which were a loss to the contractors, and might refuse as to the routes which paid a profit to the contractors. He had no security whatever that the offers would be accepted at all, but he says that he left these offers with Mr. Miner. Miner says that it was something of a trick, and that these offers were left with the idea that if they should be accepted then they would get in that way, I think he said, fifty or sixty days additional time, because if the contractor failed and a new person came in and offered to take up the service, the argument in favor of giving him additional time in which to put the service on would be very strong. Vaile says he left those offers here to take up the service, and there were offers upon all the routes except those that were being successfully run. He did not make any offer upon those routes, neither did he take any security, if his object was to prevent these defendants from becoming failing contractors, to protect them in another respect. There were subcontracts which had been made and which were being executed, but contracts might at any time have been thrown upon routes which he had not offered to take. He had no security that while he was taking the routes which were then down some subcontractor might not the day he left here throw up the service on another route belonging to these parties, and then these parties would be declared failing contractors, and, as failing contractors on one route, it would extend along over all the contracts, in the sense that the pay upon all the routes would be stopped until the loss to the Government upon the route which had failed was made up. You will remember, gentlemen, that, so far as these nineteen routes are concerned, Mr. Vaile says, not only upon these routes but upon the others, that it was the long and expensive routes, on which, even though they were taken low, the aggregate was considerable, that the service was down. The Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route and The Dalles and Baker City route were among that number. He left offers to take those up, but he had no certainty that even if those offers were accepted the very next day there might not be a subcontract thrown up on a route also in the name of Miner, and then his pay would be stopped on all the routes. Then what would have been the result? Mr. Vaile would have taken up, if Mr. Brady had chosen to give it to him, all of the service of Miner, or he would have taken up such portion of the service of Miner as Mr. Brady, if he had been an honest officer, would have seen it was for the interest of the Government to give him. He had no certainty, according to his account, that he would get any. Somebody else might have come in with a lower offer, and then Mr. Vaile's offers would have been of no avail. Somebody might have come in with a lower offer on the routes on which there was a profit, and then they would not have gone to Mr. Vaile, and he would simply have been given the routes upon which there was no profit. Mr. Vaile having made this arrangement, as he says, went to his home in Western Missouri. About the 22d of August Brady telegraphed him to know what service of Miner, Dorsey, Peck, and Watts he would take up. After two or three days Mr. Vaile says that he telegraphed back that he would take it all up excepting Watts. He was asked why he excepted Watts, and he said he thought he was taking a sufficient load to take the rest. He says distinctly he knew nothing about the routes, he knew nothing about the trips, and he knew nothing about the pay. He did know that as an aggregate the prices were too low. He did know that the contracts as a whole were losing contracts. Now, stop here and consider it. This man Vaile, the experienced mail contractor who had made a fortune in the sharp competition of the business, makes a casual acquaintance on the 23d or 24th of July, and is here for ten days or a fortnight, possibly. I think he states he got home about the middle of August.

On the 23d of August he telegraphed back that he would become responsible for all the service of Peck, Miner, and John W. Dorsey, though he knew it was a losing service as a whole, and though he did not know the routes, the trips, the pay, or anything in detail. He says that he did that, and that he did it solely out of compassion for Mr. Miner, who was the only one of the lot he ever saw. He says, too, that he did not want that the United States should suffer. He did not expect to get much credit for that. You remember I suggested to him that if he wanted to benefit the United States the wise way, instead of taking up losing contracts and making a donation in that manner, would have been to have let somebody else carry out the contracts, or to have let these parties be held upon their bonds and the United States be made good in that way, while he, the philanthropist from Western Missouri, could have made a contribution directly to the payment of the national debt. He admitted on the stand that that would perhaps have been a little more practical way of applying his money, according to the view he was trying to urge.

The moment he telegraphed back that he would assume these contracts, that moment he says he commenced spending money. He had no agreement with Miner, with Peck, or with Dorsey as to anything about it, but he commenced spending money, and before he entered into any contract or agreement with any of them, he had spent or incurred liabilities to an amount greatly in excess of $50,000, and he had incurred those liabilities on the basis of a dispatch from Brady to him to know what service he would take up, and upon his reply that he would take up the service of the three men named, leaving out Watts, he gave no reason why he left him out, except that he thought he was taking too big a burden. Then he went on and spent all this money. He had no contract whatever with these parties by which he was to share in the profits, and they had not been declared failing contractors. The contracts were theirs then, and the service was being put on. The excuse for declaring them failing contractors was being taken away from Mr. Brady by the expenditure of Mr. Vaile's money, and Mr. Vaile had not a particle of security from anybody that after they had got the service on, and ceased to be in danger of being declared failing contractors, he would benefit in any way by the fifty or sixty thousand dollars which he had expended. It does not even appear that anybody, except possibly Miner, can be considered as having given an implied recognition to him to spend that money for their benefit. But, however that may be, Mr. Vaile went on. That is not all, gentlemen. He had no security from Mr. Brady in any manner, as he says he did not know that Mr. Brady might not on any morning wake up and, having one of his moods, declare them failing contractors. The service had not all been put on. The Canyon City and Fort McDermitt route was not commenced until the January following, and on a large number of the routes it was not commenced for about a month, several of the routes in the indictment being included. Mr. Brady had not only abundant excuse, but abundant considerations of duty, if he was an honest officer, to declare them failing contractors. Mr. Vaile had not a particle of security that he might not wake up some morning and find that these men for whose benefit he had been playing the philanthropist had been declared failing contractors by Mr. Brady, and his money gone. He had not on the one side any assurance that they would not be declared failing contractors, and he had no security that they would allow him the benefit from the expenditure of his money on their behalf, and on the other hand he had no security on Mr. Brady's side! If Mr. Brady had declared them failing contractors his money would have been gone. He tells you, too, that he knew they were irresponsible men. Gentlemen, if ever there was a thin story invented on the stand or off the stand, in the witness-box or in the theater, that is one of those stories. It is an insult to your intelligence, gentlemen, to ask you to believe that any business man of sufficient acuteness to keep out of the poor-house, to say nothing about making a fortune in the business of mail contracting, would do business in that way.

Then, again, Mr. Vaile tells you that he never made any agreement or got any security until he came here, he thinks, on the 30th of September, and then, the first quarter's pay being about to mature, he made an arrangement. Though that agreement bears date the 16th day of August as made between these parties, yet by their own evidence it was not executed until way down in October. All this was done out of sympathy for Mr. Miner, and he did not desire that Mr. Miner's associates, Mr. Peck and Mr. Dorsey, whom he had never seen, should suffer. Yet getting here on the 30th of September, before he had any arrangements made with anybody, the first thing he did was to go to work and file subcontracts in the Post-Office Department to cut out the drafts that these men had been giving to Stephen W. Dorsey, who was their backer and helper. Vaile was operating out of sympathy for these men. Mr. John W. Dorsey tells you on the stand that he was exceedingly anxious to do anything to protect his brother, whom he had drawn into the business. And yet the very first thing that Mr. Vaile did, who was brought in by sympathy for Miner and these other gentlemen, was to file subcontracts to prevent Stephen W. Dorsey from getting his money. Now, gentlemen, he never had seen Peck and Dorsey. The bowels of his sympathy had never been excited by any personal interest in Peck and John W. Dorsey. Mr. Miner, with that magnetic air which you saw upon the stand here, had won his sympathy and had won a way not only to his heart but to his pocket, and he was desirous of benefiting Mr. Miner. Why did he not take up Mr. Miner's contracts alone? He staggered along under a load so heavy that he had to throw off the bag that contained the contracts of Watts; went on with the bags containing the Dorsey and the Peck contracts, and he did it out of sympathy for Miner. If he had taken Miner's contracts up Miner never could have been declared a failing contractor, and to have declared the others failing contractors would not have had any influence or effect whatever upon Mr. Miner's contracts. All this he did out of sympathy for Mr. Miner. Now, gentlemen, what need was Mr. Miner in for sympathy? Vaile says that Mr. Miner was here in danger of being gobbled up by the other contractors, but Mr. Miner tells you, I think, a very different story. He tells it under circumstances which I want to call to your attention. Mr. Vaile says that Mr. Miner was here depressed, his service not on, and he had an endless sympathy for him. Mr. Miner says that he arrived here on the 23d or 24th of July from Denver, and he says that it was immediately afterwards that this condition of things occurred. Now, what does Mr. Miner say was the knowledge that he brought with him from Denver? Mr. Miner's attention was called by Mr. Ingersoll to the fact that the witness Moore, referring to the conversation with Miner at Denver, had made the following statement:

In our conversations we concluded that if the Eastern Oregon service was carried according to the subcontracts—

Then this question was asked:

Q. What was said by you, and what was said by him?—A. I told him if the Eastern Oregon service that was sublet to Hutchinson was carried out the contracts were in good shape; but I had my doubts in regard to that service.

Then his counsel goes on:

That is a conversation which purports to have occurred between you and Moore at Denver?—A. I understand that.

Q. What do you say as to that?—A. He said the exact opposite. I feared that in consequence of his having let so many routes to one man there was danger of their not being started, but he assured me that Hutchinson certainly would start that service, and would carry it. And he assured me that he had the best bonds that could be made in the State of Oregon. There was no question at all, so far as he stated, of that service starting.

That was the information which Mr. Miner got from Mr. Moore, according to his statement, in Denver, and he came right from Denver here, arriving here on the 23d or 24th of July, and at once was plunged into a state of deep depression on account of the failure of the service on these identical Oregon routes, which led the sympathetic heart of Mr. Vaile to act upon his pocket and led him to incur liabilities to the extent of over $50,000 without one dollar of security or one particle of certainty that he would ever see his money back. Mr. Vaile says, as I have already called to your attention, that though he had this sympathy for Miner, and incidentally and vicariously for Miner's associates, he filed subcontracts and cut out Dorsey's drafts, and he not only did that, but he antedated his subcontracts and deliberately perpetrated a fraud. He says he did it. The subcontract law had been recently passed permitting subcontractors, with the consent and permission of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to file subcontracts. He says he did not know but there might be some other subcontracts on file and he did not know but what there might be other drafts on file. But he was going to make a clean thing of it anyhow. He was going to be the first in. He was going to get in on the ground-layer, and was going to be on the bed-rock, he was so careful of his money; he, this man who had spent $50,000 without a particle of security that it would not be entirely lost. He turned around, on the 30th of September, and proceeded to file subcontracts to cut out the drafts drawn in favor of the man he was sympathizing with, and antedated those subcontracts back to the 1st day of April, 1878, the contracts having been awarded some time in March, 1878, so that he might get subcontracts away back, and they should be ahead of any other subcontracts and ahead of any other drafts, and that they should be so fixed that no question could be raised, by pretending that they were made before the new law was passed. He admits that he did all that. Now, gentlemen, that is Mr. Vaile's story. That is the story which he insults your intelligence by asking you to believe. There are in connection with that story one or two other things that it is just as well to call to your attention. We find, for instance, that Mr. Miner is alleged to have stated, on page 2233, that Mr. Vaile was very close to Mr. Brady. There is another very significant fact: Mr. Boone tells you that he was frozen out for the purpose of letting somebody come in who had money. He says he was told by some of these defendants that Brady would not do anything for them so long as he, Boone, was interested in the business, and that it was a matter of life or death to them that they should get somebody in who could furnish money, and somebody who stood well with Brady, and therefore he, Boone, must go out, because otherwise they would be declared failing contractors, and if they were declared failing contractors it would react upon all the bondsmen, Boone having given some of the same bondsmen on these contracts that were upon his other eleven hundred contracts, and his service would be destroyed. Therefore he must go out. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey says that he knew nothing of Vaile's coming in and Boone's being frozen out, but it appears incidentally, I think by Mr. Boone's testimony, that before Mr. Dorsey left here to go West Mr. Dorsey asked Boone about Vaile and his responsibility, his experience as a contractor, and so forth. Now here comes the great question of dates, the question of dates which led Stephen W. Dorsey upon the stand to remember as little as possible. The dates were pitfalls for them on the one side and the other. Harvey M. Vaile tells you that he took no interest in this business until after the 22d of August, when in some way that he cannot account for Mr. Brady got it into his head that Mr. Vaile was going to take up some of that service, and he so telegraphed him. But, gentlemen, it appears by the undisputed evidence of a written paper in the case that Boone was frozen out of this business on the 8th day of August. On the 8th day of August Mr. Boone was driven out of the business to enable Vaile to be brought in with his money, although in the story they told you here Mr. Vaile entered into no obligation whatever with anybody to go into it until two or three days after the 22d day of August, and then he only entered into the obligation by a telegram to Mr. Brady which these other parties had no possibility and no right to enforce against him. The story, gentlemen, you see, is surrounded with difficulties. It is surrounded with improbabilities. It is surrounded with impossibilities. It cannot be true.

Then, again, as to Mr. Vaile, let us take him as he appears in connection with another transaction and see how this simplicity that seems to have pervaded his acts accompanied him there. He says that he as subcontractor made the oath upon the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route. That is a transaction to which I shall have occasion directly to call your attention as to the fact of its being the oath of the subcontractor, and the regulations calling for the contractor's oath. The question now is as to how he came to make the oath upon that route, he being only the subcontractor. I read from page 4059:

Q. Why did you not get an affidavit from John W. Dorsey?—A. I wanted no communication with him or with the party. I don't think I would have had it expedited if it had been necessary to get their affidavit.

Q. How long did that condition of mind continue?—A. Up to the last trial. It was a little that way at the last trial, but we have gotten over it somewhat now.

Q. Was your feeling against John W. Dorsey particularly?—A. Not all.

Q. It was a feeling against the whole combination, was it?—A. That was it.

For that reason Mr. Vaile made the oath as subcontractor upon that route. He made the oath before Stephen W. Dorsey's book-keeper. He was the notary public whom he selected to make it before. He would not have anything to do with any of that combination, and yet he made the oath before W. F. Kellogg, Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey's book-keeper, as the notary public of all others in the city of Washington, for the oath was made here. Mr. Vaile, with his undying hostility to the whole party, selected him as the man before whom he swore to that affidavit, and which he was making solely because he would not have an affidavit from any of them. He was violating the law, and asking Brady to violate the law by accepting the oath of a subcontractor, and he picked out this man as the man before whom that affidavit should be made. Now, gentlemen, Mr. Vaile on the stand did not remember before whom that oath was taken. He had to have some excuse for that, and therefore enunciated that theory. But that is not all, gentlemen. Mr. Vaile would not have any benefit from their oaths because he had such a hostility to them all. I have been looking for a memorandum which I have made, and which has escaped me for the moment, but I say with entire confidence that within three months of that time, both before and afterwards, Mr. Vaile was accepting the benefit from two, if not three, other oaths made within those three months by members of this party whom he hated so much, and whom he would not derive any benefit from. That is true, I think, upon The Dalles and Baker City route, and true, if I mistake not, upon one other route certainly. I have a memorandum somewhere which will show it.

This oath on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route is the oath of a subcontractor in violation of the regulations. Mr. Rerdell, I think it is, says that the transaction was this: Vaile was at "outs," according to the expression of one of the defendants, with Stephen W. Dorsey, and he wanted to get along without the oath of the contractor and he undertook to see whether Brady would accept the oath of the subcontractor. After a little time Mr. Vaile came back and said that Mr. Brady would accept the oath of the subcontractor. Mr. Brady on the stand was asked about it, and he did not seem to remember the transaction particularly, but he said "of course I would take the oath of the subcontractor. Why should I not take the oath of the subcontractor if he was the man who was performing the service?" Vaile did not happen to be performing the service, but Mr. Brady still took his oath. Gentlemen, Mr. Brewer, the clerk, told you on the stand that he called Mr. Brady's attention to that oath, it being the first subcontractor's oath which had been taken within his knowledge. He called Mr. Brady's attention to the fact that it was an exceptional thing, and Mr. Brady paid no attention to it, and, therefore, thinking there might hereafter be some question arising from that illegality, and Mr. Brewer being determined at any rate that his skirts should be clear from the stain of what he saw going on in the Post-Office Department around him, filed with the papers his own memorandum stating that he had called the attention of Mr. Brady to the fact that it was the subcontractor's oath, and he thus put a stopper to the theory which otherwise would undoubtedly have been brought into this case, as it has so often been, that it was a mere pro forma matter, and Mr. Brady did not know anything about it, the responsibility all resting with the clerk in charge. Mr. Brewer by his honesty and by his foresight prevented any such theory as that.

But Mr. Vaile is involved in more difficulties still with reference to the statements that he makes upon the stand. You must consider the one statement and the other as to the question whether Mr. Vaile is to be believed where he comes in conflict with other witnesses. On page 4025 there is quoted a paper which appears at an earlier stage in the case. By that paper it appears that early in May, 1879, Mr. Rerdell had commenced a suit against Vaile and Miner for money alleged to be due him for services, and he set out that they had employed him and that they had not paid him. Thereupon Mr. Vaile, after he was sued, on the 29th day of May, 1879, wrote Mr. Dorsey a letter. I call your attention to this now as bearing upon Mr. Vaile's other statement upon the stand that Stephen W. Dorsey originally had nothing to do with these contracts, and came into them some time along in March or April, 1879, when he could safely do so openly and avoid the effect of the statute which forbids a Senator to be interested in contracts. Now, see what light this letter of Mr. Vaile's, written before it was supposed there would be any question of this kind as to who was interested in these contracts, throws upon the case. It was written away back before any Congressional investigation had been had. The letter is dated May 29, 1879. I will read it:

S. W. DORSEY, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Rerdell has to-day sued us, "Vaile, Miner & Co.," though alleging the firm to be only "Vaile & Miner," for what he claims wages. He certainly has not properly considered this action of his, as you will readily see.

How was Mr. Dorsey, if he had no interest in this business, to know anything about it?

If it goes on it will expose, to an extent, our private matters—

Whose private matters? Our private matters—

in which you are interested.

Our private matters in which you are interested. Not our matters, but our private matters that must be kept out of sight.

It will draw forth who are the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co., and it cannot be helped.

What was the objection in Vaile's mind to having drawn forth who were the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co., on the 29th of May, 1879, when he swears on the stand here that Vaile and Miner were the only parties interested? What was the objection in Vaile's mind to having that drawn forth? What was the reason that led Mr. Vaile to say to Mr. Dorsey anything about that? What did Mr. Dorsey care as to who the real parties composing the firm of Vaile, Miner & Co. were? Is it not obvious, gentlemen, that Mr. Vaile meant "this will draw out our dealings among ourselves. It is a fight among the conspirators, and the devil will take the hindmost. You will be exposed, and your relations to us, illegal and improper, will be exposed. This thing must be stopped."

In view of all the facts in the case, he cannot recover anything and will draw himself into serious difficulties.

Mr. Vaile was not troubled about any money that he would have to pay Mr. Rerdell. That did not trouble him. It was clear to his mind that Rerdell could not recover anything.

It seems to me you had better advise him to dismiss his action at once, as we must answer in twenty days. I do not suggest this fearing that he could ever get a judgment against us, for he cannot—

Here comes the great sympathetic heart of Mr. Vaile again—but to save the poor fellow himself from trouble.

Poor fellow!

He was in the employ of the District government at the time he claims to have been in our employ, and this may involve him in trouble. A man cannot serve two masters at one and the same time.

What does Mr. Brady think of that? Did Mr. Brady think he could not serve two masters at one and the same time, to wit, the United States and these contractors?

Having written that letter to Mr. Dorsey on the 29th of May, 1879, he did not get any satisfaction from Mr. Dorsey, and so by and by, along in June, Messrs. Vaile and Miner both went to work to do some swearing. I mean swearing in court, legal swearing. We have on page 4025 of the record sufficient of the affidavit quoted for me to read, although I do not find the affiants' names. I am certain that Mr. Vaile swore to it, and I think that it was sworn to also by Mr. Miner.

Mr. HENKLE. Both swore to it.

Mr. BLISS. I thought so.

The defendants Vaile and Miner—

This is the sworn statement they put into court—each speaking for himself, on oath say that they are not indebted to the plaintiff on any account whatever—

Not indebted to Rerdell on any account whatever—and that they never had any business transactions with him of any kind or nature.

We will show you about that directly:

That true it is the defendants Vaile and Miner, with one Stephen W. Dorsey, at one time employed him for a short time to aid in certain mail routes—

Vaile and Miner with one Stephen W. Dorsey employed him to aid in certain mail routes. Now, gentlemen, you see why it was that Mr. Vaile wrote to Mr. Dorsey that that suit would expose their private interests, and it would expose who were the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co. They were Vaile, Miner, and Stephen W. Dorsey—but say that he was fully paid for his said services; that they not only paid him the full amount he claimed to the time he discontinued his services, but, at his request, paid Charles T. Perkins two hundred dollars on his account, and said plaintiff is indebted to them in said sum, with interest thereon from the 1st day of May, 1879, exclusive of all offsets and just grounds of defense.

They swear that Vaile and Miner never employed Rerdell, but that Vaile and Miner and Dorsey did employ Rerdell, and that he was paid in full, and therefore, to be entirely consistent, when the suit was about to be tried they paid Mr. Rerdell $200 more. That is the statement as it stands upon the record undenied. Of course, Mr. Vaile was able to explain all this. Of course it can be done in the most refreshing manner. Without going into the details, it is sufficient to say that it is to the effect that somehow or other, when they divided up the contracts, these services of Rerdell's being upon the White River route, which they did not take unto themselves at all, which they left entirely out of the division, which had nothing to do with the subsequent distribution whatever, it being treated, he says, as Rerdell's route, not included in the lots that they drew, or anything of the kind, but, he says, inasmuch as, somehow or other, in some way or other, Mr. Dorsey had become responsible for his share of all the debts upon the routes which they did distribute and divide among themselves, therefore Mr. Dorsey was in some way responsible, through Miner and Vaile apparently, for services rendered on a route which they did not count, which they did not distribute, which they had nothing to do with in either way, which Mr. S. W. Dorsey was not interested in before the 4th of March, because he could not legally be interested in any Government contract before that time, and which Mr. Vaile was not interested in, because they had transferred it all to Rerdell long beforehand—that in consequence of all that, in some way or other, that transaction rendered it right for him to swear that Stephen W. Dorsey, with Vaile and Miner, employed Rerdell to render services, before Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate, and, therefore, he swore to this thing. Now, that is a pretty muddy statement. I think my statement of it is quite as clear as Mr. Vaile's, and a little clearer, and it is all there is about it. And he asks you to believe that when he swore to that statement, before any question had arisen on this subject, when he wrote that letter to Mr. Dorsey before any question had arisen on that subject, that that is the reason—he thinks the lawyer did not state it quite right. The poor lawyers have to be responsible for a great many sins of others, probably because they have so few of their own. Mr. Vaile did not use his usual perspicacity of statement there. I do not remember who his lawyer was.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Hine.

Mr. BLISS. His lawyer was Mr. Hine. He does not appear on this trial. He says, "Lawyers are very careless. Has not that been your experience?" Mr. Vaile is a lawyer himself, gentlemen. But I have given you the reason why he says he swore to it. It is not, perhaps, quite ship-shape, but what it means is that S. W. Dorsey had done things which he never did do, and holds him responsible for liability which never existed, according to Mr. Vaile's statement.

But that is not enough. Mr. Vaile did other things before any question arose on this subject. He was liable on one, and he was liable on the other, and he was interested in these contracts. On page 4065 there is a letter which he addressed to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, Mr. McGrew, dated July 9, 1880, relating to an entirely different route, in which it seems that there had been some money recouped. Money having been paid out for service on a route which it appeared afterwards should not have been paid out, the Government stopped it or sought to stop it; and Mr. Vaile having had that money the Government called upon him to refund it, and, in a vigorous way which they have, they not only called upon him to refund it, but they took care that it should be refunded, by stopping that amount out of other moneys coming to Vaile. And thereupon Mr. Vaile writes to explain the subject. He says:

Although I was subcontractor of record on said route at the time named, I was not subcontractor on my own behalf.

"As subcontractor I got this money, which you want to make me pay back, but I was only subcontractor in form; I was not subcontractor for my own benefit; I was subcontractor for the benefit of somebody else, and you should go to those other parties and get back this money, for I paid it right over to them; those men are in your control, and you can get the money from them; don't plunder me in this way—me, the poor, innocent, unsophisticated, large-hearted, sympathizing Vaile—don't plunder me, but go to the parties who are interested and for whom I was trustee." And then, for the purpose of aiding the Government in securing this thing and doing justice all around, he goes on and tells for whom he was trustee:

I was not a subcontractor in my own behalf, but as trustee for J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, Isaac Jennings, and others, to collect said money and pay it over as said parties should direct. I further state that all money that ever came into my hands from said route I did pay over to the parties named as trustee, as by them directed.

I further state that all the money collected on said route not paid to said Jennings was paid to liquidate the debts of J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, and others previously contracted, and not one dollar ever remained in my hands.

I further state, I believe both J. W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible—

Now you see why Mr. Vaile wrote this letter. He was not dealing, as he believed, with a responsible man, to whom he could go and say, "I, as subcontractor, received from the Government so much money, but I was merely your trustee; I paid it right over to you; now give it back to me, for the Government has called upon me to refund it, and I have got to do it." That would have been the way he would have done with responsible persons, but he was not in a position to do that. He says:

I further state both J. W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible, and it would be impossible for me to collect any part of said money from them. As above stated, said money came into my hands only as their agent or trustee, and at once paid out as they directed. * * * Said Jennings agreed to perform the service on said route strictly—

After referring to the fact of Jennings being a sub-sub—in accordance with the laws and regulations of the department for the annual sum of $12,600, the duplicate of which contract was delivered over to S. W. Dorsey by myself, and which I believe is now in the hands of M. C. Rerdell.

He then goes on to say :

Therefore I request you not to compel me to pay the sum of money asked, but if I am liable at all, let the parties seek their redress at law, where all the facts can be obtained and justice rendered me. And it is also well known that I am a man of means, and any judgment rendered against me could and would be collected, dollar for dollar.

I am, very respectfully,

H. M. VAILE.

The amount sought to be recovered, as appears from papers on page 4066, was $4,870.08, apparently.

Now, gentlemen, that is the state of things there. Mr. Vaile comes on the stand and tells you that Mr. S. W. Dorsey was not interested with him, had nothing to do with him, was not interested in these contracts, and asks you to believe it in the face of his letter to Dorsey which I have read to you, in the face of the sworn statement of himself and Miner. And Miner puts the same strain upon your credulity in asking you to believe him after he had sworn to that plea which I have read to you. Mr. Vaile asks you to believe it in the face of that letter written to Mr. McGrew as long ago as 1880, in which he says three times over that he received that money, which was for mail service on the Mineral Park route, as trustee for Stephen W. Dorsey, J. W. Dorsey, and others, and paid it out as they directed. Now, after that exhibition of Mr. Vaile, can you believe, gentlemen, that his memory is good? Can you believe that his judgment is good, when he asks you to believe him when he comes in conflict with others? Has he so large a stock of confidence laid up in your minds that you can accept from him his statement of the origin and progress of his dealings with Miner as the true and correct one?

Bear in mind that this is the man who when he came to put his subcontracts on file antedated them all, avowedly to avoid the law, and therefore in violation of it; that he is the man who puts into his partnership agreement with J. W. Dorsey and Miner a provision that certain subcontracts (not including any of these that I have been referring to, but subcontracts on the Caldwell route, I think it is, and one or two others) are bona fide. When, in an agreement with reference to subcontracts on file, you specify that two of them are bona fide, what is the inference as to the others? Is not the inference that the others are shams? And when Mr. Vaile is asked upon the stand what he means about those bona-fide contracts, he scratches his head and puts out his hand in that confiding way of his, and says he cannot tell.

Mr. Vaile, on the stand, repeats in the face of this evidence that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey had no interest in these contracts until after he went out of the Senate. When I was cross examining him—I am sorry to say that counsel was not sufficiently shrewd, or sufficiently in the confidence of Mr. Vaile, to get it from him—the court intervened with a curiosity which, I presume, the court thought was justifiable, but its results must be very offensive to Vaile and Dorsey. After the examination had been going on about the division of the contracts which they made early in the spring of 1879, the witness said :

I have no recollection of meeting him again—

That is S. W. Dorsey—until about the 5th or 6th of March; it is possible I may have met him during the winter, but I have no recollection of it.

Q. March, 1879?—A. 1879.

Q. Where was that?—A. At his house.

Q. What took place between you then?

No; I believe that did not come out in my examination. Mr. Henkle could not get it out. Now I feel better. Afterwards he said:

Then we added up the values and adjusted those values—I taking 40 per cent., Mr. Miner 40 per cent., and S. W. Dorsey 30 per cent.

The COURT. That is wrong; you have two forties and thirty there.

Mr. BLISS. You corrected him before; do not correct me now. I am reading the record correctly:

The COURT. You taking 40, Miner 40, and S. W. Dorsey 30?

The WITNESS. I should say I took 40 per cent., Miner 30, and S. W. Dorsey 30.

I was reading the record correctly.

Q. How did you happen to go to Senator Dorsey's house at that time?—A. For the purpose of a division.

By the COURT:

Q. What time was this, did you say?—A. About the 6th of March, immediately after Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate; I think it was on the 6th of March. I know I intended to reach here immediately after the 4th and get it fixed in some way.

By Mr. HENKLE:

Q. I want to know, from the state of feeling between you and Senator Dorsey, whether you had determined that you would not go on in business with him or not?

He was then in business, Mr. Henkle assumes, with S. W. Dorsey, and the question is: "Had you determined that you would not go on in business with him?"

He says:

I know I intended to reach here immediately after the 4th and get it fixed in some way.

And he got here, and then on the 6th he went to S. W. Dorsey's house, and Mr. Henkle then asks him about that:

Q. I want to know from the state of feeling between you and Senator Dorsey, whether you had determined that you would not go on in business with him or not?—

A. I had; nothing on earth could have made me go on with him.

Q. Then you were determined to have a separation?—A. That was my determination.

Q. And you say it was with that view that you called upon him at his house?—A. It was.

Q. And you made him a proposition which he accepted?—A. He at first refused, but subsequently accepted it.

Q. Who were present when this final settlement and division was made?—A. Mr. Miner, S. W. Dorsey, and myself.

Q. Anybody else?—A. Nobody else that I recollect of. I don't think there was.

Mr. Vaile came here, arriving just after Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate, when he would have time to settle up the business and arrange matters. He was determined to arrive here promptly after the 4th of March, intending to close up the business, because nothing on earth would have induced him to go on in business with Stephen W. Dorsey.

A little further along Mr. Vaile drops into hyperbole. He says that Mr. Dorsey never had anything to do with the business; he was not interested in the business, except he had loaned some money to these other parties. He was not going along in business with him; they had had a row which was not ended. This question was put to him, on page 4018:

Q. What took place between you?—A. A separation.

Q. I want to know whether you quarreled or not?—A. We did.

Q. Had a high old quarrel, had you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. What sort of a quarrel was the other one?

Mr. BLISS. A low quarrel, probably.

Q. What was the result of it?—A. We divided the routes and divided the debts.

Having had a quarrel with Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, his associate and partner in business, he came here determined that he would end that relation and that connection. Nothing on earth could induce him to go on with him. And so they sat down and divided up their business. That division was made on the basis of 40 per cent. to Vaile, 30 per cent. to Miner, and 30 per cent. to S. W. Dorsey.

I shall have something more to say with reference to that division before I get through, but let me say in passing, are not those proportions suggestive?

Do you believe that Miner, having put in no money, having gone along in the business five or six months, got 30 per cent. for that; while Peck, who had apparently not put in any money—it does not appear that he had—and John W. Dorsey, who had put in a considerable amount of money, their interests were each counted as worth $10,000, and that Mr. S. W. Dorsey paid them that $10,000 each, and for that $20,000 he got secured to him the money which he had advanced, and he got the 30 per cent. interest? I merely mention that in passing as one of the improbabilities which surround the theories of these defendants upon the stand. So much for Mr. Vaile, who comes in collision with some other parties in evidence, to which I shall have occasion to call your attention further on. But it is sufficient now to leave him where his own evidence and his own admitted acts place him.

Now, as to John W. Dorsey. I say broadly, gentlemen, as to him, that it is impossible for anybody to read the record which he has made before you without coming to the conclusion that it is the testimony of a weak, not shrewd, man, who came on the stand with a story to tell, but who, amid the troubles into which a sharp cross-examination led him—and if any of you have ever been witnesses you know how cross-examination may lead even an honest witness into trouble, through failure of memory or from accident—made one statement after another to account for the immediate difficulties in which he was involved, without looking ahead to see into what further difficulties the new statement would involve him. And he came out in just that way. The evidence of that is to be derived from little facts, little things in the testimony, some of which I propose to call your attention to in some detail. But before I go to those directly, let me call your attention to one statement of his on the stand which, I think, is sufficient, as the index, as the guide-post on the road, to show in what direction all his evidence leads, to wit: in the direction of untruth. John W. Dorsey, gentlemen, is the champion affidavit maker, so far as numbers are concerned, of these gentlemen, to whose ability in that direction Mr. Miner gave so strong a certificate. On the 21st of April, 1879, up in Vermont, he made certain affidavits, which are worth a moment's consideration at your hands. He made two affidavits, 4 C and 5 C, upon route 38134; he made one affidavit, 6 Q, upon route 38156, Silverton to Parrott City; and he made another affidavit, 4 O, upon 40113, Tres Alamos to Clifton. All those affidavits, gentlemen, were made on the 21st of April, 1879, and sworn to before Rufus Wainright, clerk of Addison County. Now, in the first place, let us take the first two affidavits, on route No. 38134. Those affidavits were sworn to on the same day. The first one is:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mails on route 38134, on the present schedule, is three men and twelve animals. The number necessary on a schedule of ten hours, seven times a week, is seven men and thirty-eight animals.

That is 4 C. 5 C, is:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mails on route 38134, on the present schedule, seven times a week, is two men and six animals. The number necessary on the schedule of ten hours, seven times a week, is six men and eighteen animals.

In the first half of 5 C, the "seven times a week" is interlined. He swore to both of those affidavits on the same day. One was filed here in the department on the 6th of May, and the other was filed on the 8th of May. He is asked upon the stand to account for them, and here is his explanation, at page 4137:

Q. On the same day you swore that the number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on that same route was two men and six animals. Both of those statements could not be true. Which was a lie? [After a pause.] Which was the lie and which was the truth? Take the papers and look at them and tell the jury?—A. [After examining the papers.] If I made a mistake I probably corrected it, as far as that was concerned.

Q. You did not say you corrected it. Both were made on the same day, and both could not be true. Take your choice and tell us which is the truth.—A. I had not observed before that these were both on the same route. I would like to make an explanation.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly, sir; you are entitled to make any you can.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want any information except what took place then. You swore to them up in Vermont.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Q. Was Rerdell there?—A. No, sir. One came in the early morning mail at 3 o'clock, and I went out and acknowledged that one and put it in the next mail, as he wanted it right off.

Q. Do you recollect that?—A. Yes, sir.

Now, on page 4139:

The WITNESS. My memory was refreshed when you called my attention to the fact that they were both on the same route. I went up and had one acknowledged, which came in the morning mail, because he said he wanted it immediately, and I mailed it in the 11 o'clock mail. In the afternoon at 2.40 another one came, saying that there was an error, and he wanted to have me acknowledge that, and he would destroy the other one, and so I went up and acknowledged that and sent it on the next mail. It came on the night mail.

Q. Do you recollect that fact?—A. I recollect it from my memory being refreshed.

Q. Refreshed or unrefreshed, do you recollect that fact?—A. Yes, sir; I think I do very thoroughly.

Q. Is it because you made two affidavits on that route that your memory is refreshed?—A. No, sir; it is refreshed, as I told you, from the conversation that I had last summer.

By the COURT:

Q. You say the letter was from Rerdell?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. A letter written by Rerdell?—A. That is the way it seems to me.

Q. Both those letters were from Rerdell in Washington, were they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is what Rerdell told you?—A. Yes, sir; and they were, too.

Q. They were received on the days that you swore to those affidavits?—A. I think they were; yes, sir.

Then there are presented to him two other affidavits, one on route No. 38156, Silverton to Parrott City, and the other on 40113, Tres Alamos to Clifton, both sworn to on the same day, the 21st of April, up in Vermont. In undertaking to account for the discrepancy between them he refers to another affidavit which he had also sworn to, which I have not taken out here (6 E, Trinidad to Madison), and he will not say that he swore to that at Rerdell's request.

But he says that he received these others from Rerdell by letter from Washington; that Mr. Rerdell, having sent him one letter which came in the morning mail, discovered his mistake, and sent another letter covering another affidavit, which arrived in the afternoon mail; that Mr. Dorsey had used so much expedition in swearing that he had sworn to the first one and put it in the mail before the second one arrived; and so he swore to the second one and sent it back. And that is the way, according to his story, that he came to make those two inconsistent affidavits. And yet, gentlemen, it is beyond dispute that as early as the 15th of April, 1879, Mr. Rerdell had left this city and gone West. We placed upon the witness-stand here the three hotel-keepers, one from Sidney, in Nebraska, one from Greeley, in Colorado, and the other from Denver. They produced their hotel books, showing Mr. Rerdell's presence at those places respectively on or about the 19th or 20th of April, and he swore to his presence out there, so that it was absolutely and physically impossible that Mr. Dorsey's statement could be correct. He did not receive those affidavits from Mr. Rerdell by letters written in Washington in that way. It is absolutely impossible. He puts Mr. Rerdell in this city as late as the 19th or 20th of April; there is no escape from that; and, at that time, beyond all dispute, without any question whatever, Mr. Rerdell was away west of the Mississippi River. There is no doubt about it; there can be no question about it.

Now, what sort of a man is this who comes upon the stand and asks you to regard him as a truthful witness, when he swears in that way? Mr. Rerdell tells you, gentlemen, that he sent those affidavits to Vermont at a certain time in blank, and with directions to have them sworn to in blank, and that they came back here sworn to in blank, and were subsequently filed here.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Whose handwriting is this on these affidavits?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Rerdell's, I think.

Mr. CRANE. If Mr. Rerdell was in the West at that time they could not have been made out and sent to Mr. Dorsey in Vermont unless they were made here previously and sent from the West.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; they were a lot of blanks that had been made up without the filling in here, and they were sent from this city. Mr. Rerdell says a lot of them were sent from this city in blank to Mr. Dorsey in Vermont to swear to, so that they could come back here and be ready for use when they were wanted. He says that before he went West he sent a whole batch of them up there, and that they came back in that way. But Dorsey says, "I never swore to any affidavits in blank; I am not any such man; I would not do it; I swore to them all filled up."

But, gentlemen, that is not all about these affidavits. Mr. Dorsey also swore here, on the 26th of April, to three other affidavits—one of them on route 38140, one on 38145, and the other on 38113. He says that Mr. Rerdell procured him to swear to these in Washington on the 26th of April, when at that time Mr. Rerdell was away west of the Mississippi; that is beyond all dispute; there cannot be any doubt upon that subject. But Dorsey swore to it broadly, located the time, and gave his reasons. And yet his only way of accounting for his making such affidavits is that he was influenced to do it in that manner. I think that he does not say absolutely, with reference to one of the affidavits which I have produced to you, that he swore to it under the influence of Mr. Rerdell. I think, when his attention was called to that, he hesitated. There is certainly one such affidavit. It is 6 E, route 38140. He does not distinctly say, with reference to that, that Mr. Rerdell influenced him.

Mr. MERRICK. 4 C is in Kellogg's handwriting, but 5 C, according to Boone and Rerdell, was written by Rerdell; that is one of the original blanks.

Mr. BLISS. At any rate Mr. Dorsey says he got them in Vermont, from Rerdell, by letters from Washington, the two letters arriving on the same day, and each containing one affidavit. At that time Mr. Rerdell was not in Washington or anywhere near it. There is no escape, gentlemen, from the position in which Dorsey has placed himself by his failure to remember that it is sometimes wise not to have any memory.

Mr. CRANE. Were both of them written by Kellogg?

Mr. MERRICK. The body of 4 C is written by Kellogg, and the second oath (5 C) of John W. Dorsey is written by Rerdell, according to Boone's testimony and Rerdell's.

Mr. BLISS. However that may be, the great fact in connection with them is Mr. Dorsey's statement of the way in which he came to swear to them, in pursuance of the policy of these defendants, to put all the rascality of the case upon Mr. Rerdell. His statement is not true, and is conclusively shown not to be true. All the evidence goes to sustain much more strongly the statement of Mr. Rerdell that he sent a package of blank affidavits to Mr. Dorsey in Vermont, and that Dorsey signed them in blank and sent them back here, and they were used as necessity arose.

Again, as to Mr. John W. Dorsey, let us take another little matter, and it is just as well to note it as we go along. He says that he paid S. W. Dorsey money under a private arrangement; that at the time Mr. S. W. Dorsey was claiming to advance the money for these others he was paying Mr. S. W. Dorsey money under a private arrangement. Mr. Dorsey, when on the stand, detailed his arrangement with Peck about going into it, how dependent they were upon Peck, upon his knowledge of the business, Peck's ability to get bonds, his ability to put up certified checks on the routes where they were required; then when Mr. Peck went to New Mexico, and found that his health was so broken up that he could not go on with the business, and having learned that he could not come back, Mr. Merrick pressed upon him the question: "If you found out that Mr. Peck could not go on with the business; if this was before you had put in any bids, all this was before you had assumed any liability, why did you not then abandon the business and retire when you learned that he was no longer able to fulfill his part of the business?" He answered, at page 4111:

I had gone so far I did not feel like doing it.

Q. Had you sent a cent?

That should be, "Had you spent a cent?"

A. I had put some money in the business.

Q. What did you pay in money for prior to the 1st of January, 1878?—A. For advertising, postage-stamps—not advertising, but printing.

Q. Printing what?—A. These circulars.

Q. What circulars?—A. Circulars to be sent out to postmasters.

Q. Were you here during the fall of 1877 at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had you yourself furnished any money?—A. Yes, sir.

Bear in mind that Mr. Boone swore that he received all the money to pay for these circulars and all such expenses from S. W. Dorsey.

Q. To whom did you give it?—A. I sent to S. W. Dorsey.

Q. I may be mistaken, but I understood S. W. Dorsey to say that he advanced the money.—A. That was a private arrangement between him and me; there was to be nothing said about it at all.

Q. What was a private arrangement?—A. My furnishing that money.

Q. How much did you furnish him?—A. I don't know; I paid different sums at different times.

Q. As much as $5?—A. As much as $500.

Q. When?—A. Some of it was sent in about the 1st of December.

Q. How much?—A. I think it was $500.

Q. How sent?—A. By draft.

Q. On what?—A. I could not say now; it was a draft on New York.

Then he continues, and states that he took some money out to Chicago with him; had had that money in his house up in Vermont for the purpose of keeping it from unjust creditors. Being in Chicago on other business, he sent from Chicago $500 by draft of some Chicago bank, which bank he did not know, to S. W. Dorsey under this private arrangement.

Q. How much do you say it was?—A. I think it was $500; I won't be certain about it.

Q. And you bought a draft and sent it on here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long after you bought the draft was it that you came here?—A. It was about three weeks, I think.

He then went back to Vermont, he says, before he came here, and he sent this money to S. W. Dorsey. I shall have something to say directly about his story upon that subject, but I want, for a moment, to call your attention to another statement as bearing upon that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Bliss you will hardly be able to get through to-day?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; I do not expect to.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I was going to suggest that we adjourn, as it is within two minutes of the time.

Mr. BLISS. That is why I wish to give just this precise reference I am looking for, and then we can adjourn.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I have a bad headache.

Mr. BLISS. I thought I had the reference here, but it is sufficient for me now to state it without the reference, as Mr. Davidge wants to adjourn, and in the morning I will give you a reference to the page. Mr. John W. Dorsey swore that he sent this money to Mr. S. W. Dorsey under private arrangement, and that statement, being surrounded by all sorts of difficulties, to which I shall call your attention, is, however, met by the square and distinct statement of Stephen W. Dorsey on the stand that, so far as he knows, Mr. John W. Dorsey never put a dollar into the business. Stephen W. Dorsey swears that he does not know of a dollar ever having been paid by John W. Dorsey, and yet John W. Dorsey asks you to believe that at a time when all these parties were borrowing money of S. W. Dorsey, because they were impecunious, he, J. W. Dorsey, under a private arrangement, sent this money to Stephen W. Dorsey. Stephen W. Dorsey says, in another connection, that he has no knowledge that John W. Dorsey ever paid a cent.

Shall I stop now?

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, just previous to the adjournment yesterday we were considering the question of Mr. John W. Dorsey's connection with certain papers which we allege he signed, and there arose some little confusion apparently as to the question of the handwriting of certain of the papers. As I was myself probably a little at fault for the confusion I recur to the matter now before passing on with the course of my argument. The papers which were signed in Vermont were 4 C and 5 C, upon the Pueblo and Rosita route; 4 O upon the Tres Alamos and Clifton route, and 6 Q upon the Silverton route. There were two affidavits upon the Pueblo and Rosita route, one affidavit upon the Tres Alamos and Clifton route, and one affidavit upon the route from Silverton to Parrott City; all four being executed in Vermont under date of 21st of April, and sworn to there before the notary. The evidence of Mr. Rerdell is that the body of 4 C was written by Mr. Kellogg, that the body of 5 C was written by Mr. Rerdell, that the body of 4 O was written by Mr. Rerdell, and the body of 6 Q was written by Mr. Rerdell. Some question apparently arose from a similarity in the handwriting of the affidavits 4 C and 5 C, one being stated to be written by Kellogg and the other being stated to be written by Rerdell. The evidence on that point of both Rerdell and Boone is uncontradicted.

As to Mr. Kellogg's handwriting, there are in the record several letters admitted by him upon the stand to have been written by him. Among others are 20 D and 43 F. I do not know whether 6 T is admitted to be in his handwriting or not, but it is signed by Mr. Boone, and Mr. Boone says it was written by Mr. Kellogg in his presence. I therefore take the liberty of handing you, gentlemen, the three papers which are undoubtedly in Kellogg's handwriting, and then I hand you the two affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route, as to which the question arose. The body of one is stated to be in the handwriting of Mr. Kellogg and the body of the other in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell. If you will look more particularly at the first line of the affidavit, comparing it with the paper signed by Mr. Boone, I think you will have no question whatever as to the correctness of the evidence in that respect. There is no dispute about it in fact on the record, and nobody denies it. Mr. Boone swears to it and Mr. Rerdell swears to it, and the other papers are admitted by Mr. Kellogg. Of course you understand that the filling up in several of those papers is by Rerdell. When I say the filling up, I mean of course the numbers and the figures. The filling up in both 4 C and 5 C is in Rerdell's handwriting, and the same is true of the figures in the other affidavit made in Vermont on the 21st of April. Those affidavits [handing two others to jury] are sworn to as being in Rerdell's handwriting, including the filling up and everything else. Here is another affidavit, 6 E [submitting affidavit to jury].

Mr. CRANE (the foreman). This one [indicating] you gave me yesterday as written by Kellogg.

Mr. BLISS. 4 C was written by Kellogg and 5 C by Rerdell. 6 E, which I now hand you, is sworn to be in the handwriting of Kellogg. 22 F, which I now hand you, is also sworn to be in Kellogg's handwriting. I am now speaking of the body of the last two that I handed you, and not of the filling up, which is in a different handwriting.

Mr. GILL (a juror). Who wrote 6 Q?

Mr. BLISS. That was written by Rerdell, according to the evidence, except the signature. The body of 25 S is also sworn to as being in the handwriting of Kellogg. The filling up is by somebody else. Now, in reference to these papers you will bear in mind that those dated on the 21st of April, which are 4 C, 5 C, 4 O, and 6 Q, were all sworn to by Dorsey in Vermont on the 21st of April, and he says as to all of them that he acted upon the statement of Mr. Rerdell contained in a letter sent to him from Washington. In point of fact it appears beyond dispute that at that time Mr. Rerdell was not in Washington and nowhere near Washington, but was west of the Mississippi. Mr. Rerdell said that in point of fact before leaving Washington to go West he sent to Mr. J. W. Dorsey a lot of affidavits in blank, and when he came back here on the 5th of May he found those affidavits here, and they were subsequently filled up. That is the statement made by him in that connection.

Now, let us go to another matter which I have commented upon. I stated to you, as testing the truth of the evidence given before you by John W. Dorsey, that John W. Dorsey swore that he paid money to his brother Stephen under a private arrangement. He alleged that he sent him money from Chicago, it being money which he had taken from home, having gone temporarily to Chicago, and being absent about three weeks. He says he sent the money from Chicago to Stephen W. Dorsey here by a draft on a bank in Chicago, the name of the bank he being unable to state. He said that having sent it he returned home. He thought he sent $500 from Chicago, and subsequently he came here and paid him a sum which, with what he sent from Chicago, made the total amount, $2,000 and that that was under a private and confidential arrangement with his brother. He was forced into that statement because Mr. Merrick plied him suddenly with the question why, when he learned that Mr. Peck was unable to go on with what he had undertaken, he having said the important thing to him was Peck's ability to get bonds and Peck's ability to get the checks on the route which required certified checks, he still went on; why he did not stop then, as he learned that as early as September or October, 1877. Mr. Dorsey to get out of that difficulty said, "Because I had gone too far." "What had you done?" "I had paid money." "What money had you paid?" "I had sent my brother $500." He then went on and made that statement. He was then asked why, if this was the condition of things, he sent the money to his brother; why, having gone into an arrangement in which Miner was interested, and in which Boone was performing the duties here, he sent the money to his brother. He then raised some question as to whether there had been any partnership or papers actually signed, and yet he admitted that they practically had closed things, and as to the money that he alleged he paid in Washington after he came here he could not give any very good reason, or any reason practically, why he gave that money to his brother, and why he did not give it directly to Miner or to Boone, who were managing the business here, and with whom he admitted by that time he had entered into partnership. He could not give any excuse for that, but he said he wanted to save the money that he gave his brother for his own use; that he expected to have something to do in putting on service, and in contracts that he was going to get under some arrangement.

At that time, gentlemen, they had not got a contract and they had not put in a bid. There was not anything of that sort done. He said that under a private and confidential arrangement with his brother he was keeping this $2,000, while they were, according to their theory and Stephen's theory, borrowing money from Stephen to carry on the preliminary operations. John W. Dorsey undertakes to tell you that at that time, under a private and confidential agreement with his brother, he was giving of his own money to Stephen W. Dorsey not less than $2,000, and he states expressly that Stephen W. Dorsey was ostensibly advancing the money to the parties, but he in fact was doing it, and he accounts for how he got that money which he claims he sent from Chicago, not telling what the bank was, in order to give us an opportunity to verify his statement by the statement that he had it for a year or two in his house up in Vermont, and he was keeping it there against creditors who had claims against him and judgments against him which he felt in equity he ought not to pay. He took that money and brought it down here and he says that he gave it under this private and confidential arrangement to his brother Stephen, and he did not mean to let any of his partners know anything about it. Now, let us see just how that story hangs together with the evidence of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey upon the subject. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was not examined in that immediate connection, however.

I read from page 3880:

Q. Did Miner or John W. Dorsey know anything about the contract business and carrying the mail?—A. That I could not answer, but from my best knowledge I should not think they did know much about it.

Q. Did Boone, at any time, tell you to keep Miner and Dorsey away from here; that they were stupid and did not know what they were doing?

That question referred to the fact that Boone stated that when the Congressional investigation was going on he told Stephen W. Dorsey to keep Miner and John W. Dorsey away from here or the committee would get at the whole thing.

A. I don't remember whether he did or not.

Q. You don't remember whether he did or not?—A. No; I don't think that that applied to either one of them, though.

Q. That is not my question. Do you recollect whether he told you anything of that kind?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Can you say he did not tell you?—A. I do not say that.

Q. You furnished the money, I understood you, to Boone, on account of these other parties?—A. Yes, sir; these checks that they had here yesterday.

Q. Money for printing and all the expenses?—A. I do not know what it was for. Whenever he brought me an account I gave him a check for it.

Q. Was there any money provided at all up to the time of the awarding of the contracts except what you furnished?

Up to the time of the awarding of the contracts in March, 1878; and John W. Dorsey says he sent the first of this money from the West in November, 1877, and gave him the balance when he came here in January, 1878.

A. I presume Mr. Miner and J. W. Dorsey furnished their part.

Q. Do you know anything about it?—A. I do not.

This is the man to whom John W. Dorsey says he had paid $2,000 which was to be used for these expenses, Stephen W. Dorsey ostensibly paying expenses, but he in fact doing it. He gives the testimony which I have read. John W. Dorsey's testimony will be found on page 4119. When Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey comes on the stand he says he does not know that John W. Dorsey furnished any money.

Q. How much did you furnish from the time the contracts were awarded up to the time they were to go into operation, the 1st of July, 1878?—A. I could not tell that without looking at my books.

The books that he would not let us look at.

Q. Can't you give us an approximate estimate?—A. Oh, I should say from seven to nine thousand dollars, as an estimate.

Q. Was any money paid you at that time?

Mind you, up to the 1st of July, 1878.

The WITNESS. By them?

Mr. MERRICK. By any of these parties that were liable to pay it?

The WITNESS. During that period?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; the 1st of July, 1878? Was any paid to you?—A. None of it was paid to me.

Now, in that condition of things, which man are you going to believe? Are you going to believe that John W. Dorsey was forced on the stand, in the endeavor to save himself from one trouble, to manufacture at the moment a lie and to say that he had invested money, and when asked how, to say that he had given it to his brother Stephen; or are you going to believe Stephen W. Dorsey, who swears that he never received any money from any of these parties until the 1st of July, 1878? As between those two parties, if you come to the question of weighing the evidence, you are dealing on one side with a man who was admittedly capable of making two affidavits on the same day and of swearing that he did it at the instigation of a man who was not accessible to have instigated him to do it. He is the same man who swears that he is guilty of the attempted fraud of establishing a side post-office on the Tongue River route.

As to John W. Dorsey, let me refer to one other little discrepancy, which indicates the kind of man he is. He says that while he was in Chicago for two or three weeks in the fall of 1877, Peck, who had gone to New Mexico, wrote him to write Stephen W. Dorsey to get bonds for him. Stephen W. Dorsey says nothing about that whatever, but says that Peck wrote him directly. There is no pretense of Peck's going around through John W. Dorsey or anything of that kind. As another indication of the kind of evidence which Mr. John W. Dorsey gave to you, I ask you to consider the evidence as to the alleged selling out. He alleges that some time in November, 1878, he was here for a couple of days. We had heard nothing in any manner of any negotiations for selling out, I think, until after we put in and called attention to Mr. John W. Dorsey's letter from Bismarck, dated on the 25th of December, 1878, in which there was a reference to Vaile's having bought him out. Mr. John W. Dorsey's attention was called to that in some way in the course of the examination by Mr. Merrick, and why John W. Dorsey had so written. He said, "Well, I came here for a couple of days in November, 1878, and I had a conversation with Vaile as to selling out, and left a letter for my brother." He says he found at that time he wanted to get out. He did not tell us why he wanted to get out. The service up there was going on. He knew nothing about the subcontracts which Vaile had filed. He says expressly that he knew nothing of the subcontracts which Vaile filed, and which were the source of trouble between the other parties. But he says he had some negotiations, and he wanted to get out, and he left a letter to his brother. He did, on the whole, stick to it that there was a letter. That letter, gentlemen, we could not get at. We could get at no papers in their possession. But we disclosed in our examination that we had in our possession, as they thought, a copy of a letter written by Stephen W. Dorsey from here and dated the 9th of December, 1877; the letter of John Dorsey of December 25 being avowedly an answer to Stephen Dorsey's letter of the 9th of December. We called upon them for that letter and they did not produce it, but John W. Dorsey went on and undertook to give an account of an alleged letter of the 7th of December, which letter he said was destroyed by having been left in a garret into which the snow came during a season of inclement weather. The letter of December 7th they admitted that they had, and it appeared affirmatively that John W. Dorsey had read a written copy—not a press-copy—but a written copy, within a short time before he testified. That letter they did not produce, and that letter they did not tell us anything about. But Mr. John W. Dorsey did think there was another letter of the 9th of December, as well as one of the 7th, and he went on and gave in some detail what he claimed to be contents of those letters; the effort on his part being to account for the language of his own letter, which is on page 2239. The letter is dated Bismarck, December 25, 1878. It is addressed “Dear Senator.” I will read some of it to you:

Your favor of the 9th is received, and I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out, though I have no doubt but this route alone—will pay him or some one else $100,000 clear of all expense within the life of the contract.

The Bismarck and Fort Keogh route—

You may think that I am oversanguine, but I would be willing to take my chances on it. I did not expect to suit every one when I came here, and have succeeded in not doing it. Mr. Vaile, nor any one else, knows anything about the difficulties one has to contend with here till he tries it. I thank you very much for your offer, and will be pleased to accept it and do the best I can. I would be glad to leave here at once, but Mr. Vaile writes me to start the mail three trips a week January 1, on horseback. I don't want anything to do with it, as he will not be pleased if I do ever so well. I have done all the hard work, and he talks as if it was fun to do it. I will do the best I can while I remain, but hope to leave soon after Jan'y 1st.

Now you notice, gentlemen, that that letter says, referring to a letter of Stephen W. Dorsey of the 9th:

I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out.

Not that Mr. Vaile is negotiating to buy out, not that Mr. Vaile shows a willingness to buy out, but—

I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out.

An absolute fact is stated there. That, gentlemen, is important in connection with the fact that when you get down to the evidence of the others in connection with the division, it is alleged by Stephen W. Dorsey that he paid $10,000 to John W. Dorsey, not to Vaile, for his interest in the following May. If Vaile had bought out in December, 1878, what becomes of the story of the payment of $10,000 to John W. Dorsey for an interest he had sold out four months previously? Mr. Dorsey undertakes to account for that, and he goes on and states the contents of the letter of the 7th, of which they admittedly had a copy but would not produce it. He gave his recollection of it, although we tried to have them produce it and claimed that we must have the best evidence. With regard to the letter of the 7th, he says that Vaile had filed his subcontracts and had cut out Peck's interest and his, and had by that transaction made worthless the security which S. W. Dorsey held for money loaned. He says Mr. Dorsey stated in this letter to him, which he did not produce, that if these subcontracts proved to be on file his interest and Peck's would be entirely absorbed, as well as Stephen W. Dorsey's. He said, “You need not feel bad about it. I will give you a ranch to have charge of and an interest in the business.” That was all of the letter of the 7th. He had acknowledged here a letter of the 9th, in which there was a completed transaction stated. Then he went on and undertook to state the contents of the letter of the 9th.

He said it said, "Mr. Vaile proposes to give you and Peck each $10,000 for your interest in this business. He proposes to pay me my money also." Then he was asked if as a matter of fact he sold out, and he said he eventually sold out to Stephen W. Dorsey. Although Mr. Dorsey notified him in December that Vaile had then bought out, he undertakes to say that he sold out to Stephen W. Dorsey in the following May.

It is recurred to on page 4127. After telling that he had seen the copy there, he is asked various questions, and persists in the same story; suggests also that Peck had been bought out; that "Peck and I united our means;" and goes on claiming that there was no sale, though he says he wrote that letter of the 25th of December, referring to the letter of the 9th, in which he says he is "glad Mr. Vaile has bought out;" then he also says, as showing the authority of Mr. Vaile in the matter, that Mr. Vaile directed him to remain there—not dealing with a partner—but he says, "I want to get away as soon as I can; I have no desire to remain here taking care of Mr. Vaile's interest, and I hope to leave here immediately after the 1st of January." And yet all that he can say is that the interpretation of that letter of the 9th, as he gives it, is that "Mr. Vaile proposes to buy you out;" not that Mr. Vaile has done so. And yet he says that he has no doubt that Mr. Vaile has so good a thing that there will be $100,000 profit on that route alone. He states that in the letter of the 25th of December, and yet he tells you that when he was here in November he was so disgusted with the business, so disgusted with the look of things, that he was anxious, as he says, to save something from the business, and he left a letter for his brother, authorizing him to sell. He was here on the 23d of November, and left on the 26th, and yet a brief month afterwards he says that Mr. Vaile "will make $100,000 profit on that route alone." Why did he want to sell out in November? Why did he want to save something from the business then? What change had occurred in that short month which made the difference between wanting to sell out to save something from the business and Mr. Vaile making a profit of $100,000?

In the preceding September or at the end of October he had signed a partnership agreement antedated August 16, and he says in the same way that he signed that because he was willing to do almost anything to save something from the business. And, if I mistake not, in that connection he admits then a knowledge of the filing of the post-office drafts, which he says afterwards he did not learn until away down to the letter of the 9th of December. At any rate, whether he admits it or not, he says that by that agreement which he signed he knew that it was giving to Vaile the absolute power to do anything—to file post-office drafts which should cut them entirely out.

You see, gentlemen, how thoroughly Mr. Dorsey involves himself in contradictions, involves himself in falsehoods, from beginning to end of his testimony.

I ought to say, by the way, gentlemen, with reference to those affidavits which I handed to you, those which are dated and sworn to on the 26th of April were sworn to before Kellogg here in Washington, and as to all of them except one Mr. John W. Dorsey swears that he swore to them under the instigation of Mr. Rerdell here in Washington, relying upon Mr. Rerdell not only for the number of men and horses to put in, but also upon his statement that he was subcontractor, when he never was subcontractor on that route; that he did all that in reliance upon Rerdell.

And that matter of the subcontract reminds me of one thing that I have omitted to say. He says Mr. Rerdell wrote the word "subcontractor" after he signed it. And he says, "I never signed an affidavit where I appeared as subcontractor in that way." But he pretty soon found out where he was landed, and he could not explain it. Then Mr. Merrick said to him in substance: "Then you swore to this affidavit as contractor, knowing perfectly well that you were not contractor, did you not?" And he finally had to say that he could not explain it. He either swore to that affidavit as a contractor, or he swore to it as a subcontractor. But he stated that in whichever case he did it he swore to it on the instigation of Mr. Rerdell. And yet, with reference to those affidavits of the 21st and 26th of April, it is shown to you that beyond all question Mr. Rerdell left Washington on the 17th of April, was at Sidney, Nebraska, on the 21st, was at Greeley, Colorado, on the morning of the 24th, and was at Denver, Colorado, on the evening of the 24th, and remained there until the 25th. And yet Mr. Dorsey undertook to tell you that he swore to an affidavit in Washington on the 26th at the instigation of Mr. Rerdell. As to one of these affidavits I ought to say that he does subsequently say that he will not say that he did swear to it on the instigation of Mr. Rerdell. But he makes no change as to the others.

These are John W. Dorsey's statements before you. You have his statement as to the money which he claims to have transmitted to his brother—his statement as to the manner of sending it, and the attempted explanation of that. And yet he comes on the stand and asks you not only to believe that Mr. Rerdell is a liar and has made a story out of the whole cloth, but that Mr. Pennell is a liar, that Mr. McLellan is a liar, that Mr. Lambert is a liar, that Mr. Cable is a liar, that all these men, with no earthly interest in the matter, are liars. I do not know whether Mr. Swift came into the category or not. But, at any rate, he says all those men are liars, and he asks you to believe him in preference to them. I devote no more attention to Mr. John W. Dorsey.

The only other of the defendants who was admittedly, at the outset, interested in this mail service was John R. Miner. Miner is the gentleman who comes before you admitting that, having been indicted for frauds upon the revenue, he paid $1,800 rather than stand his trial. He is the man who, substantially by his own admission, and by the evidence of his own witness, Mr. Waugh, forged the six names on that Hall petition that was presented to you; by his own admission practically, because he did not dare say that he did not. While he says he does not remember whether he did it or not, yet he says if he did it, it is the only time he ever did anything of that kind. He says, at page 4191:

Q. What is your explanation of it?—A. If those six names are in my handwriting, a petition came to me exactly like that, and I copied it with the names, for I had no means of knowing those men or knowing their names other than as I have explained. They are proven to be genuine men, living there, and the balance of the petition contains genuine names. Two of them were witnesses in this case, and they have testified that it is their handwriting.

Only one witness, I think.

I have no recollection that I did copy the petition, but I could not have done it in any other way.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that competent? It is a matter of logic, from the testimony. It is not an explanation.

The COURT. It is an explanation, but how it holds together I do not see exactly.

Mr. HENKLE. That is a question for the jury.

The COURT. His explanation implies, in the first place, that this is a copy of another paper, so far as the first half dozen names are concerned. It implies that the balance of the names are genuine and original to the same paper. The explanation will go for what it is worth.

That is Mr. Miner's statement: "If he did it" he did it under those circumstances, but he does not remember whether he did it or not. Again, at page 4273:

Q. You stated something about your having written the four or five or six names that first appear on that petition?—A. I stated that I was in doubt as to whether I had so written or not. That resembles my handwriting.

Q. You don't recollect of having done it?—A. I do not recollect it.

Q. They are all on one piece of paper, and another piece is apparently pasted on to that?—A. That is the appearance.

Q. You said that if you wrote those names you copied them from some other petition.—A. I said so because they are genuine names, and I had not any possible means of knowing those men's names other than to have copied them from a petition. Those same names appear on other petitions asking for the same thing.

He could commit forgery, could forge men's names, because he found their names upon another piece of paper. He could forge a note for $3,000, and a man's signature to it, because he found the man had signed another note for $3,000. Then, further along, at page 4281, he says:

Q. You said, at page 4207, that possibly you copied the six signatures to the Hall petition. Were you in the habit of copying petitions and signatures?—A. I never copied any other petition and signature, so far as I know, and I am not certain that I did that.

Q. If you were not in the habit of copying petitions and writing signatures, and this was the only one, would you not recollect it and be able to say whether you wrote those names or not?—A. I do not recollect whether I did or not.

Q. Don't you think if this was the only case and you did act in that way that you would recollect it?—A. I do not recollect it.

Q. You are not willing to say that you did not write those names?—A. I have not yet said that I did not write them.

Q. You are not willing to say that you did not?—A. I do not propose to say so.

Q. You do not propose to say so?—A. I am in doubt as to whether I did or did not.

Q. Although it was the only case in which you ever did it, if you did it in that case?—A. I never did it in any other case. That is certain.

Q. You are willing to swear that you never did it in any other case?—A. I am willing to swear that I never saw a petition on which I did it, and have not seen a petition on which I did it.

This man, who is not able to say whether he forged those names on that petition, is perfectly confident that he never forged any other petition. Now, gentlemen, if a man went into the business of forging any paper, and if he never had done it before or afterwards, do you not believe that the recollection of that fact would make a lodgment in his mind, and when the paper was presented to him, if he was testifying truthfully, he would say frankly: "Yes; I remember I did forge that paper?" The trouble was that Mr. Miner, all the way through his testimony on the stand, showed a knowledge of law, and a care, if possible, to keep out of the four walls of a criminal statute, which indicated to him that it was necessary not to admit that he forged that petition, at the same time that he saw how strong the evidence was against him. And after Mr. Miner had testified to that, Mr. Henkle, anxious that Mr. Miner should have no doubt on the subject—for it could not be that you had any doubt, gentlemen—put Mr. Waugh on the stand, and Mr. Waugh under oath said he was fully acquainted with the handwriting of Mr. Miner, and he had no doubt those six names were in Miner's handwriting.

Mr. Miner also is the man who admits that in the petition on the Mineral Park and Ehrenberg route, which is identical in form and names with the petition on the Mineral Park and Pioche route (both pretending to be signed by the same persons, and both lies on their face, because their statements are shown beyond question to be untrue), he did interline the operative word "Ehrenberg," which was the name of the terminus of the route, and that it is in his handwriting. He says it is over some kind of an erasure, and he wants you to believe that it is over another word "Ehrenberg," as if there was going to be any writing of Ehrenberg over Ehrenberg!

Mr. Miner is the gentleman who wrote to Mr. French that they could cheat the Post-Office Department by giving a side supply out there, if they only did not let the Government know it. And he wrote to him also to stop the postmaster up there from sending registers on here, because these registers told that the service was not being performed properly. That is the honest, straightforward man engaged in this business—the same man, who being asked on the stand about a letter which he wrote to Hayes, says, "Oh, well, that is not under oath." No matter about that. But he wants you to believe that he would not tell a falsehood under oath.

Mr. Miner is the same man, gentlemen, who undertook to employ Mr. Carey, an honest Frenchman in Oregon, as a sort of jury-fixer, to fix Mr. Abbott up there and prevent him from sending complaints here that there was no through mail on that route; that the thing was utterly unnecessary, though the Government was paying $52,000, and though Vaile says he got $20,000 of profit out of it. He is the man who was trying to stop the mouth of Mr. Abbott.

He is the man who told Mr. Boone that when these bids were to be signed before a notary, some one would come and acknowledge those bids before him, as being Peck. Somebody did come, Mr. Boone accepted that man as Peck, and yet he tells you now that he has no doubt that he was imposed upon. They got part of those bids probably signed by Peck, but they had to be acknowledged, and Mr. Peck had not done it, and so they put somebody up here to personate Peck, and Miner is the only man who is shown to be directly concerned in it, because he it was who told Boone that the man would come, and the man did come.

John R. Miner is the man who, when one of Peck's bids, on the night before the bids were to be put in, got spoiled in some way, and there was no way to get another bid, took it out of the room, returned in a few minutes with it signed in the name of John M. Peck, though admittedly John M. Peck was not in Washington and had not been in Washington for weeks before the signing of those bids, and has not been here from that time down to the present. At one stage of this matter Miner undertook to deny the Peck proposal, but at another time he moderates it down and says he does not remember.

Miner, gentlemen, is the same man who made two affidavits on the Tongue River route, in one of which he stated that one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals would be necessary, and in the other of which he stated that thirty-seven men and seventy-three animals would be necessary to perform the same service upon the same time. And Miner is the man who had such relations, direct or indirect, with Thomas J. Brady as to induce Mr. Brady to accept the larger statement and to squelch the smaller.

Miner is the man who told the Congressional investigating committee that he made oaths as estimates; that he knew nothing about the facts. He told you here that he knew nothing about the facts.

Mr. Miner is the man who writes to one of his subcontractors out there in a very significant way: "We make no boast of being solid."

Miner is the man who writes to Hayes out in California that "route 46132, Julian to Colton, is the best route for you and for me, and we must work together." When Mr. Hayes wants a little more money than Miner and his associates were willing to give him, and he writes about it, Miner writes to Hayes: "You do not seem to understand this business; this getting expedition requires active work in Washington, and it requires large expenses." When he comes on the stand and is asked what that means, he says, "Why, didn't I have to incur expenses in living in Washington?" A large portion of the time he seems to have lived at the house of Stephen W. Dorsey, and apparently without any very great expense. But no matter what expense he may have been to for living, why did he say "the expense of getting expedition is very great"—not "the expense of getting mail service," "increase of trips," or "the expense of living here," but "the expense of getting expedition is great in Washington." Does not that mean precisely what S. W. Dorsey told to Moore—that they must take out of the gross receipts of the business, before they divided the profits, the expense of keeping the influence which they had in the Post-Office Department?

I have a memorandum here of some discrepancies in which Mr. Miner involves himself, but I will not stop to call attention to more than a single one of them. At page 4164 he is asked about the partnership contract:

Q. When was it signed?—A. It was signed by Mr. Dorsey at Bismarck, and by Peck in New Mexico. It was sent to them for their signatures, which took some time.

Admitting that it was not executed until October, though it was dated the 16th of August.

Q. Did you consult Mr. Dorsey and Mr. Peck about making that contract?—A. I wrote to them immediately after Mr. Vaile gave me these propositions to put in—

Those are the propositions given him to put in for the purpose of preventing their being declared failing contractors—asking their assent to such an arrangement if I could effect it, and they responded favorably.

You remember he had a power of attorney, and therefore he had a right to bind them to anything.

Q. Did John W. Dorsey and Peck know anything about—

Referring to some arrangement with Vaile as to whether they were going into this business of putting subcontracts on file—the execution of those subcontracts, or did you do it in fraud of their interest?—A. I do not remember whether they knew anything of it or not. I did it by virtue of the power of attorney which they had given to me for the purpose of protecting Mr. Vaile's interests. [Page 4225.]

Both of those statements, gentlemen, cannot be true. I have here a memorandum of some other things about Mr. Miner, but I will pass those until I take them up in connection with the same matter in reference to Stephen W. Dorsey.

We come now to Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey, differing from the other defendants, stands in this position: that he was not, by his own admission, interested in these contracts until some time early in March or April, 1879, having gone out of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1879. On that identical day he writes to Brady a letter in which he claims to be operating under a power of attorney from the other defendants aside from Miner and Vaile, and shortly afterwards he admittedly became interested in the contracts. So long as he was a Senator there was a very binding statute of the United States which would have prevented him from having any interest in mail contracts, and would have sent him to the penitentiary if he had. Therefore Mr. Dorsey appears before you in the condition of a man claiming that he was not originally interested in these contracts. We say that he was; that the whole scheme originated in his fertile and ingenious brain, and that John W.

Dorsey, Miner, and Peck were simply the puppets that he used, and that when, at a later period, more money was needed than it turned out he could or cared to advance, then Vaile was brought into the transaction.

What did S. W. Dorsey do in the early stages? He gave up his house to the preparation of bids. He gave up a room for an office for Miner. He took so much interest in Miner that, though John W. Dorsey was in the city here, yet, not being the man of business that Miner was, John W. Dorsey was left to room somewhere else. John R. Miner roomed in his house, and there the bids were prepared. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was undoubtedly at times present while the bids were being prepared. I think there is no dispute about that. Boone had been preparing bids upon all the routes, and when they learned, in the progress of their scheme, that that involved the getting of more certified checks than they had or were able to secure, Mr. Dorsey is apparently the man who directed the destruction of those bids which had been already prepared on these routes. Mr. Dorsey, by his own admission, altered the bids or advised their alteration, and his advice was taken, to the injury, as they say, of themselves. But his advice was promptly taken by the others. He advised the alteration of the bids upon two of the routes in this indictment, and they were altered after the sums had been fixed. And how had those sums been fixed? You remember that Mr. Boone had gone to the elaborate preparation of sending out circulars asking information from postmasters at the termini of every mail route that was to be included in the letting, and he had received in reply a large amount of detailed information. One of those circulars was produced to you here. Anybody can see that that information would be very valuable to anybody engaged in bidding. It gave the nature of the country, the number of streams to cross, the amount of mail to be carried, cost of hay and other expenses, and a great many details. On the basis of those circulars he had made up what is called the bidding-book, which was simply the book of advertisements produced here. Boone had put upon that bidding-book—he, the expert brought into this business to advise all these ignorant persons—the amounts which he thought were fairly to be bid, and he tells you that the amounts on all the routes they bid upon were below the prices indicated by the circulars which had been received. Admittedly Mr. Dorsey suggested the alteration of that bidding-book as to two routes in this indictment, and Mr. Boone tells you, I think, that it had been altered in S. W. Dorsey's handwriting upon several more of the routes.

The amount of it all was that all that preparation, all that expense to which Mr. John W. Dorsey was contributing—the only evidence of what was done with money for those preliminary expenses revolves around post-office business, sending out those circulars and getting them back, and paying $150 postage, to which Mr. John W. Dorsey was contributing in this confidential manner through his brother Stephen—all that was cast aside, and cast aside against the advice of Boone, cast aside, so far as the evidence shows, at the instigation of Stephen W. Dorsey, a man who had no interest, but who, from having been in the Senate and having had some investigations there in connection with the Western country, was supposed to know all about it. And yet that very circular had been gone into by Boone, after information, from Stephen W. Dorsey; and if he had known all about it, if he was in a shape to give all that advice intelligently, he might have saved that money. I have no doubt that when Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey came to look these bids over he was so confident that the money was to be made, as he told Moore, as John W. Dorsey told various people, by increase of trips and by expedition; that the important thing for them to do was to get the contracts; that the way to get the contracts was to bid so low that they would come under others; that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, the master spirit in this business, took that bidding-book and cut all prices down below what Mr. Boone had advised. And there was the beginning of their temporary trouble which rendered it necessary to take Mr. Vaile in, and rendered it necessary to share with him a portion of their large profits; because they got the bids so low that they could not get subcontractors to take the service off their hands, and they had to stock many routes, and the capital was not forthcoming with which to do it.

But it is sufficient for me here to call your attention to the intervention of Stephen W. Dorsey—this man claiming not to be interested in the contracts or the bids—in cutting down the prices. He cut down The Dalles and Baker City route from $11,888, I think it was, to $8,888. And I think Miner said, with some regret, that they could have got it at the $11,888, for the next bidder was above that price. But S. W. Dorsey admittedly cut down that route. He was very anxious to get a long route like that, which could be expedited and increased, and that route having been let at $8,888, was made to take from the Treasury $72,000 before the contract term closed.

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey is the man who paid all the preliminary expenses, save, of course, that extraordinary confidential contribution of John W. Dorsey's. He was the only man that was known to Boone or anybody outside as having anything to do with it. Miner had no money. Nobody apparently had any money but Stephen W. Dorsey.

But, gentlemen, Stephen W. Dorsey did more than that. All these things I have told you about were done before the contracts were awarded. The evidence is uncontradicted, so far as I can find, that Stephen W. Dorsey signed the name of John M. Peck to at least two of the bids on routes named in this indictment. He signed upon the Canyon City route, and he signed another one which is known in this case as 2 P, I think, and is also marked proposal 4. He signed the name of John M. Peck to those bids. And it is sworn to here by Boone, and I think also by Rerdell, certainly by Boone, that that signature was put there by Stephen W. Dorsey. Stephen W. Dorsey was on the stand, and so far as I can find he did not contradict that testimony. His attention, I think, was directed to one of these bids, and he made some criticism upon it, but I do not understand that he denied signing it; and as to the other there is no pretense that he denied the signing of it.

Here, then, is this Senator of the United States, not interested in these contracts, and yet he did all these things. He was not interested in these bids, and yet he signed the name of John M. Peck to the bids. There is no evidence before you that John M. Peck ever gave him any authority to sign his name to any such thing.

Not only that, the contracts were awarded early in March, and on the 4th of March, 1878, just one year before Mr. S. W. Dorsey went out of the Senate of the United States, upon a piece of abbreviated paper, such as we have seen in other exhibits in this case, identified as being United States Senate paper, where something has been torn off above, we find this, 8 A:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1878.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
2d Asst. P. M. Gen'l:

SIR: I have to request that all contracts intended for me be forwarded to the postmaster at Washington, D. C., and all acceptances, communications be addressed to me, care lock box 714—

Of which we have heard so much—

Washington, D. C., until otherwise ordered.

And oblige,

J. M. PECK.

And the evidence of Mr. Boone is that he wrote that letter, and that Stephen W. Dorsey signed the name of John M. Peck to it, and Mr. Dorsey did not deny that fact. So that he was not only interested in the bids, not only signed Peck's name to bids, but he signed Peck's name to that request to have sent to the particular box that he designated all the contracts and all the papers relating to this service.

Mr. MERRICK. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. BLISS. 4th of March, 1878.

Into his hands were to go all the papers relating to every contract that John M. Peck got. Yet he wants you to believe that he was not interested in any way in that business; that he, a Senator of the United States, was doing that business in connection with all these things here that I have narrated, and more—some of which I am going to call your attention to directly—and yet he had no interest in the matter!

As early as June 10, 1878, he was writing a letter (10 F, page 1079) as to the Ojo Caliente route, making suggestions of changes there. He apparently had learned that there was a talk of affecting one route at the expense of another, and he writes a letter to Brady in connection with that.

Somewhat earlier, I think, than that, he was interested to find out the length of the route from Bismarck to Fort Keogh, and thereupon he writes from the Senate of the United States, and upon Senate paper, a letter to General Rosser. In reply, General Rosser tells him that the route is three hundred and three miles long, though advertised as two hundred and fifty. That letter to Stephen W. Dorsey is taken to Thomas J. Brady, and Mr. Brady immediately goes to work and restates the distance over that route, and from that time on treats the route as three hundred and three miles long. And in all his increases, in all his expeditions, in all his changes of schedule—for that schedule he extended from eighty-four to one hundred and eight hours, directly in violation of the stipulation of the contract and indirectly in the face of what he refused to do in other cases, because he said he could not legally do it—he takes as the true length of that route what was stated by General Rosser to Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). One of the jury would like to see that paper.

[The paper was handed to the jury.]

Mr. BLISS. Mr. S. W. Dorsey, having no interest in this business—we all understand that, of course, because he says so—by 18 B (page 789), a subcontract in this case—became a subcontractor upon the route from Pueblo to Greenhorn. That subcontract is dated April 1, 1879. The rate of pay upon that route, then, was not the rate of pay existing subsequently when they claim they were antedating contracts, but he became subcontractor for a rate of pay which shows that when that subcontract was drawn it was not antedated, as they have endeavored to make out that so many of their other subcontracts were.

Mr. S. W. Dorsey not only signed this paper that the jury now have, and signed the bids of Peck, and did all these other things I have stated to you, but he, beyond all question, dealt with Moore. Whether

Mr. Dorsey had an interview with Moore before he went West early in the spring of 1878, or whether his only interview was after Mr. Moore came back in July, 1878, admittedly he dealt with Moore. He says on one occasion that he never spoke three words to Moore, but later on he goes so far as to say that he may have had two interviews with him, one of them being in April and the other in July. He says he does not remember the April interview. He says that he may have had some conversation with him about the mail service and things of that kind. Moore says that he was sent to him by Miner; that Dorsey received him in such a manner as to show that Dorsey knew that he was coming; that Rerdell was present. Rerdell says he was present. Then Moore goes on and details the conversation that he had with Dorsey, in which Dorsey told him what was to be done; told him how the routes were to be expedited; told him also about what he was to do, what directions he was to give, what encouragements he was to give to subcontractors as to the routes being expedited and increased, and all of that detail which it is unnecessary for me to go over again. But I simply call your attention to the fact that this is not an invention of Moore's now made for the first time, as they apparently would wish you to think, but that Moore did go and tell McBean the precise things that Stephen W. Dorsey told him he might tell to subcontractors; told him precisely what would happen; told him precisely what McBean says did happen, except that when he told him there would be two orders, one for increase and the other for expedition, what did in fact happen was that one order included both increase and expedition. Moore told Major that there would be an increase before the 1st of July, 1878, and the increase came. He told him there would be another increase; that other increase came.

Mr. Dorsey beyond all question paid Moore more or less money directly or indirectly; I do not care whether it went directly into the hands of Moore, or whether it went from Dorsey to Miner and from Miner to Moore.

Mr. Moore says that he had a conversation with Miner at Denver, in July, 1878, in which Moore told Miner that he could not work any longer for a mere salary; that he must have an interest. Miner told him he could not make any such arrangement to give him an interest without S. W. Dorsey's approval. Moore comes on to Washington, sees Mr. S. W. Dorsey here, apparently about the 10th or 11th of July, 1878—Mr. Dorsey leaving Washington almost directly after that—and when he opens the matter to Mr. Dorsey about having an interest, Mr. Dorsey says that he cannot make any such arrangement without the approval of Miner.

Mr. GILL (a juror). Mr. Bliss, I would like a little information. You say that on the Bismarck and Tongue River route the petition called for three trips a week on a schedule of eighty-four hours. I cannot understand how the trips can be performed.

Mr. BLISS. I do not remember that I said that the petitions called for three trips a week on a schedule of eighty-four hours. As I recollect it, the petitions upon that route asked for fifty hours.

Mr. HENKLE. Sixty-five hours.

Mr. BLISS. Sixty-five hours, Mr. Henkle says. You cannot understand how they can be performed. In point of fact, the only evidence there is of the performance of the service prior to the increase of trips and expedition, is that the service was not performed within the schedule time; that it took seven, eight, or nine days to perform the trips, though at that time the schedule time did not exceed one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. GILL. I cannot see how the three round trips could be made in eighty-four hours.

Mr. MERRICK. His difficulty is, that he cannot understand how he could make three times eighty-four hours in one week.

Mr. BLISS. One man might start on Monday, another on Wednesday, and another on Friday, each making his round trip in a week.

Mr. GILL. I do not see then how he could make it in the week.

Mr. BLISS. In a week from the time he started.

Mr. GILL. Oh, I see it now.

Mr. BLISS. I think S. W. Dorsey's evidence, as well as that of Boone, is that Dorsey paid Moore's salary while he was gone, or a portion of it, by sending a check to Moore's wife, at Chicago. The arrangement with Moore before he went away was that Mrs. Moore should be paid, that arrangement having been made by Boone. Mrs. Moore not receiving her pay, Boone goes to S. W. Dorsey as the proper person to apply to, and tells him that it has not been done. Mr. S. W. Dorsey thereupon promptly sends a check to Mrs. Moore. And yet Mr. Dorsey has not any interest in this business at all, gentlemen.

Prior to that time, as Boone says, Mr. Dorsey employed him early in November, I think it was, on behalf of these parties, and Mr. Boone refusing to be employed simply upon a salary, Dorsey agreed to give him an interest. Mr. Boone swears that that was so. Mr. Dorsey tries to make it appear that he did not agree to give him an interest, but he left that in sort of a state of suspended animation as to whether he was to have an interest. But in the mean time, till the other parties came here and they made their own arrangement, he was to work along upon a salary, with no suggestion of any rate being fixed. But he says plainly and distinctly that he refused to have anything to do with it upon a salary; that he must have an interest. Dorsey was the man who was parceling out interests in these proposed contracts and assigning an interest in them to Boone. Mr. Dorsey is the man who Miner says must be consulted before an interest in the business can be given to Moore, and Mr. Dorsey is consulted by Moore as to getting an interest in the business, and Mr. Dorsey agrees to give it to him. Mr. Dorsey is the man, who, with no interest in these contracts, procured the bonds, Mr. Peck having, as we used to say at school, "flunked" and not being able to furnish the bonds. Mr. Dorsey went to work and got one of the bondsmen, and then he went to Boone and asked Boone to get another of the bondsmen. Boone got one bondsman and Dorsey got the other. Miner had not sufficient responsibility to get a bondsman, as he told you himself. Peck either had not sufficient responsibility or sufficient physical ability to get bonds, and so Dorsey went to work and got bonds here from his personal friends in Washington. He also sent out to Arkansas to five separate postmasters, each one of them holding his position substantially at Dorsey's beck and will, the letters showing that one or two of them had been directly appointed at his request, and one of them but just confirmed. He sent out to five postmasters packages of bonds, and asked them to execute the bonds without having put into them at the time of execution the name of the bidder. They were sent to be executed without the name of the bidder, and yet the postmasters were to certify to the sureties. The statute says that every bond shall be certified by the postmaster, and also says that if any postmaster certifies to a bond without the name of the bidder being in it he shall be liable to punishment by, I think, five years in the penitentiary. Mr. Dorsey admittedly was the man who made this request as to these bonds of five postmasters. We have shown you affirmatively on this stand that two of them were honest enough to refuse to do it. What was the case with the other three there is no evidence before you, but Mr. Dorsey was the man who was engaged in attempting to get these parties, his dependents, into an illegal business. Yet he asks you to believe that he had no interest in the business. He, a Senator of the United States, was trying to entice others into the violation of a direct statute of the United States, and he was doing it only for friendship. He was not even doing it for fun, as Mr. Brady seemed to be afraid he might be thought to be making expedition for. He was doing it simply for friendship.

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, still a Senator, employed Mr. Rerdell to go into this business. He sent Mr. Rerdell, who was acting as his clerk, up-stairs in his own house to help fill up the bids the night before they were put in. He gave Mr. Rerdell a lot of post-office papers, consisting of contracts, and so forth, and asked him to examine them and wanted to know whether he thought he could wrestle with them, and was competent to manage that business. He found Mr. Rerdell a clerk under the District government, drawing a salary there, and he asked Mr. Rerdell whether he would not like to go West, to the Bismarck route, for the purpose of arranging things there, which apparently John W. Dorsey was not competent to arrange. He did not seem to have overmuch confidence in John W. Dorsey, if the statement is correct that he subsequently said that John W. Dorsey was too stupid to attend to the business in California. He sent Rerdell out there to attend to that business, and he told Rerdell if he had any trouble in getting leave of absence he would arrange with the District commissioners to get him leave of absence. At a later stage of the case he tells you that, according to his best recollection, Mr. Rerdell remained, through his influence presumably, drawing his pay from the District government down to the 1st of May, 1879, though engaged very largely in attending to the business of Mr. Dorsey in connection with these routes. Mr. Dorsey wants you to understand that he had no knowledge that Mr. Boone was to be frozen out, and the plan of Mr. Vaile's coming in was something that occurred after he left here, and with which he had nothing to do. Yet he asked about Mr. Vaile and his responsibility before he left here. He sent Mr. Rerdell to Mr. Boone. He told Mr. Rerdell that Mr. Boone was to be put out, and he sent him to Mr. Boone to get from Mr. Boone the pigeon-holes and the papers and everything of that sort, and they were brought to his own house. Promptly on the 8th day of August Mr. Boone was frozen out of those contracts and compelled to sign a discharge and release; and yet these same gentlemen, Vaile, Dorsey, and all of them, want you to believe that there was nothing known about Vaile's coming into this business until Brady in some mysterious way telegraphed to Vaile on the 22d day of August, fourteen days after Boone had been frozen out, and then about the 24th of August Vaile came in in that self-sacrificing way to which I called your attention yesterday. Stephen W. Dorsey sent Rerdell West, and he gave Mr. Rerdell $3,000, I think, which was deposited to the credit of the firm of John W. Dorsey & Co. in bank, and he, Stephen W. Dorsey, John W. Dorsey not being here, John M. Peck not being here, nobody being here who was avowedly concerned with that business, gives him authority to draw that money from the bank in the name of the firm of John W. Dorsey & Co., going apparently to the bank with him and giving such instructions. He admitted he did it, and when asked why he did it said, "Why should I not have done it? It was my own money." Of course it was his own money, deposited to the credit of one of his own firms, and of course he had a right to draw it. But it does not do, having done that, to come here and ask you to believe that he had no interest in these contracts at that time.

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey arranged the clauses in the subcontracts. Mr. Boone, under the general directions given him, had prepared subcontracts which contained such clauses as he had been in the habit of seeing, and such clauses as he thought were proper, and, having had them printed, when they came to Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey's eye he said, "Those will not do. You must have that clause stricken out, and you must put in another clause." To save reprinting the whole of the documents they were sent back to the printing office and black lines were run through the clause which Mr. Dorsey directed to be taken out, and the new clause was printed in underneath where there was a blank space. Those subcontracts were thus gotten up, and one or more of them, certainly more than one, I think, appeared before you as papers used in this case, filed in the Post-Office Department and becoming exhibits here. Yet Mr. Dorsey had not anything to do with these contracts, except from friendship. Mr. Dorsey could tell Mr. Moore that the profits of the business were in the expedition. He could tell Mr. Rerdell that the profits were in the expedition. He could astonish Mr. Boone, who had been in the mail service for years, and who at that time had one-tenth of all the contracts for star routes in the country. He never had seen a clause for expedition such as that. He knew nothing about expedition. And yet Mr. Dorsey was able, although entirely disinterested and with no interest in this matter, to get up this form of subcontract. He got up the provision in the subcontract which was the basis of their system of profits; because, having taken the service so much below the figures fixed by Boone, their only chance for profit was in expedition. If they made the ordinary subcontracts providing that the subcontractor should do the work for so much and should have all the subsequent increase, then the system would not have been profitable. They would have sowed the seed and the subcontractor would have reaped the harvest. But Stephen W. Dorsey went on and put in a clause which provided that of expedition the subcontractor should get 65 per cent. for doing all the work and 35 per cent. should be reserved for the people here whose heads conceived the scheme. In fact, gentlemen, as you have all seen, all the profits were in the expedition. In fact the 35 per cent. or more reserved to the contractors here was the profit of these conspirators. Moore knew nothing about those rates. Moore was told to make the best contracts he could with reference to expedition, but with a suggestion that 40 per cent. given to the subcontractor and 60 per cent. reserved to the parties here would be a very good arrangement for Mr. Dorsey and his associates. Mr. Moore operated in a measure upon that plan, because we find that he made a contract with Mr. Major on the route from Redding to Alturas, by which if they got expedition there was to be paid to Major only an additional sum of $4,000. In point of fact they got expedition, and there was allowed by Brady for expedition just about $20,000. Mr. Moore worked upon the very principle which Mr. Dorsey suggested to him of 40 per cent. That seems to have been cutting deeper than they were able to cut with most of their subcontractors.

Stephen W. Dorsey, by the evidence of Mr. Rerdell, gave the instructions and handed over the papers provided by the Post-Office Department for the establishment of post-offices in order to get up that side post-office sixty miles off the line, at a fictitious place, with a fictitious postmaster, with fictitious inhabitants, and with a fictitious petition signed by the gang of men who were putting up the ranches upon that route. He gave Rerdell the papers and the instructions which were to result in the getting up of that side post-office—an arrangement which, if it had been carried out, would have cost the Government, in view of the subsequent expedition, about $12,000 a year, and would have bridged over the difference between the two hundred and fifty miles that they took the route at and the three hundred and three miles which General Rosser said was its actual length. Mr. Rerdell says that Dorsey gave him those papers and those instructions, and Mr. John W. Dorsey says he heard of it from Rerdell. Mr. John W. Dorsey admits that he heard of it, and admits that he undertook to carry out the instructions, and would have carried them out if it had not been that he found Pennell and Lounsberry out there too honest to do it. And yet they want you to believe that this man Rerdell, who at that time was a mere clerk under the District government, who never had had anything to do with the mail service, and who knew nothing about it, except that he had been employed by Dorsey one night in filling up the bids, conceived that scheme of the side post-office and conceived it for the benefit of Miner and Dorsey. At that time, gentlemen, Mr. Vaile had not appeared publicly in the matter, for that was in July, 1878. They want you to believe that Mr. Rerdell was engaged in that fraudulent scheme, not even being under a salary except what he was getting from the District government, using his vacation to go out there to render this service to Mr. Dorsey; that he, wholly ignorant of the mail service, conceived that scheme of a side post-office, and that he got from the Post-Office Department the blanks which are required when a new post-office is added, and did this thing. Gentlemen, that story will not be accepted as true. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, carrying out his own personal interest, was not only concerned in attempting to seduce these postmasters into an illegality, but he was concerned in attempting through Rerdell and John W. Dorsey to seduce the postmaster at Bismarck, and such other persons as could be got into the scheme, into a fraud upon the United States. And yet he wants you to believe he had no interest in this business. He was engaged in procuring illegal acts. He was engaged in procuring money fraudulently from the Treasury, but that was all done for the benefit of persons other than himself. Stephen W. Dorsey also employed Mr. Hodges out in Colorado as a traveling agent for these parties. Mr. Miner did not know him. Mr. Dorsey suggested his employment, and Mr. Dorsey gave him the letters of introduction with which he operated. Mr. Dorsey gave him the railroad passes under which he traveled. Right here let me say that you will remember that Stephen W. Dorsey gave the railroad passes to Moore. He gave Moore his brother John's railroad pass, John being up at Bismarck and not needing a railroad pass to the Pacific. The result was that he, Stephen W. Dorsey, somehow or other having that pass, gave it to Mr. Moore to use. When Mr. Moore returned here in July Mr. Dorsey, according to Mr. Moore's statement, had that interview. Dorsey himself admits it. When Mr. Moore returned here in July Moore says that Mr. Dorsey had a conversation with him with reference to the service, and wanted to know about it and how it was getting along, and asked him to go and telegraph to The Dalles to find out whether the service from The Dalles to Baker City had been commenced and put on, because he said if that service was on everything would be all right. How did Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey know anything about the service? What was his interest in having Moore telegraph to The Dalles to find out whether the service was on? Later on, gentlemen, but very little later on, as I recollect it, Miner writes to Mr. Joseph, out in New Mexico, saying that he writes at the request of Stephen W. Dorsey, and asking Mr. Joseph to take the subcontract on that route. Of course he has to say that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey cannot claim to be acting for himself, for he is still a Senator of the United States. Therefore he says he does it on behalf of John W. Dorsey. Stephen W. Dorsey was interested in getting the subcontract upon that route down in New Mexico, the Ojo Caliente route. That was the same route, gentlemen, by the way, as to which he wrote with reference to some addition of service and change of service to the Postmaster-General on the 10th of June previous. Stephen W. Dorsey is the man who, according to the evidence of Boone, and I think, also, according to the evidence of Rerdell, but certainly according to the evidence of Boone, gave as a reason why Mr. Boone could not remain in the business, that Mr. Brady was hostile to him, Boone—as Boone tells you was in point of fact the case—and that Mr. Brady would not do them any favors and would not do anything for them so long as Mr. Boone remained in the combination. So Mr. Boone was promptly frozen out on the 8th of August. Stephen W. Dorsey says that he had no interest in it. Harvey M. Vaile swore under oath in a plea filed in court that Stephen W. Dorsey was interested with him and Miner. Whom do you believe, gentlemen, the oath of Mr. Vaile, taken at that time when there was no likelihood of any question of this sort arising, or the statement of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, swearing to keep himself out of the penitentiary? Mr. Vaile not only swore to that, but Mr. Vaile wrote a letter to Mr. Dorsey and he told him about this suit and said it would expose all their relations. He asked him to exercise his influence with Mr. Rerdell to prevent that suit from going on. Mr. Vaile, when no question had arisen about Dorsey's interest, wrote to Mr. McGrew, the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, that Stephen W. Dorsey was interested with him in these contracts long before the period when Mr. Dorsey is willing to admit that he became interested in them. He dares not admit that he was interested in them until after the 4th of March, 1879. Mr. Vaile, one of these defendants, one of these gentlemen sitting here and acting with the rest, tells you a different story. If the counsel can manage to agree upon a theory upon which they can present their case to you without crossing each other's track—without Mr. Brady saying, "I was deceived by Dorsey; I acted in good faith, and Dorsey is the rascal;" and without Mr. Dorsey saying, "I hadn't anything to do with this business, Mr. Brady and Mr. Miner and the others are the rascals"—if they can manage to get up a theory on which the counsel can agree in presenting their case to you without severing that combination which has existed so beautifully between them hitherto, Mr. Vaile, this man who made that statement under oath and before he went on the stand, who wrote that letter to Mr. Dorsey, and who wrote that letter to Mr. McGrew, will, by the mouth of his eloquent counsel, Judge Henkle, ask you to believe that he lied under oath when there was nothing at stake, and that he has told you the truth here in the extraordinary story that he has told you. I say they will do it if they can manage to do it without crossing each other's track; but I have never been able to convince myself that they would dare successively to get up and argue this case to you.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] I was considering, gentlemen, the relations of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey to these contracts and to this case, and I now call your attention to another passage in the testimony. I have referred to the involuntary testimony which was derived from Mr. Vaile, and Mr. Vaile's actions and declarations off the stand and under oath before any question arose here. I now pass to a passage in the testimony of Mr. Miner, which appears on page 4280. He had been questioned as to his testimony before a Congressional committee which was engaged in investigating these contracts in the spring of 1880. After having been questioned as to the affidavit to which I have already referred, and as to the number of men and horses, and its being a jumping estimate, this passage was read to him from his testimony before the Congressional committee:

Q. Did you ever understand in any way that Mr. Dorsey was interested, directly or indirectly, in the Peck and Miner contracts?—A. Not until this transfer which I speak of was made.

Q. That was the first intimation you ever had of his interest?—A. That was the first knowledge that I had of it.

Q. Had you any intimation of it?—A. No intimation. What exists in a man's mind without any evidence, I do not consider an intimation.

Q. Was there anything existing in your mind on that subject?—A. Yes; but I had no evidence of it.

Q. Let us have what was on your mind?—A. I supposed that when he had finished his Senatorial career he would probably take these Peck routes; but I had no evidence of it. I had not the slightest evidence to make me think so.

And then he was asked:

Did you so testify?—A. I don't know whether I did or not.

Q. Have you no recollection about it?—A. I have none.

Q. None whatever?—A. None whatever.

Q. You do not recollect being asked anything about that subject?—A. I do not remember anything about it.

Q. Did you testify as follows:

"Q. You say that you supposed when he quit the Senate he would take a share in those routes?—A. Yes, sir; in the Peck routes."

"Q. Why did you think that when he got out of the Senate he would take a share in those routes?—A. Because Mr. Peck is his brother-in-law, and had been connected with him in business matters, in building railroads, &c., and I presumed that Mr. Dorsey would join with Peck in this business."

"Q. You felt all the while as though you had a man in the United States Senate?—A. I felt that there was a man in the United States Senate with whom I had been intimately acquainted for a dozen years."

"Q. Did you not feel further that there was a man in the United States Senate who was interested with your partner?—A. No."

"Q. Did I not understand you to say a while ago that you had always had it in your mind that when Dorsey got out of the Senate he would take his share of the contracts?—A. What I said does not bear the interpretation that you give it."

"Q. You do not know anything about the expedition on Dorsey's and Peck's routes?—A. No; it is a matter of record. Of course I have not access to the record."

"Q. You had always expected that Dorsey, as soon as he got out of the Senate, would take his share in those routes?—A. I said that I supposed he would."

"Q. It was in your mind that he would?—A. It was in my mind."

"Q. And the very thing that was in your mind happened shortly after Dorsey left the Senate?—A. Yes, sir."

Did you so testify?—A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

Q. You don't remember anything about it?—A. I do not.

Q. You don't remember whether the questions I have read were asked you?—A. I do not.

Q. And you do not know whether the answers you gave were as I read them?—A. I do not.

Q. Your mind is a perfect blank on that subject?—A. I have never looked at that testimony since it was delivered, and I have no recollection as to what it was.

In that way Mr. Miner escaped being brought face to face with some rather troublesome testimony that he had already given before Congress. At another place on this record, in the examination of Miner by his counsel, Judge Henkle, on page 4169, I find the following testimony:

Q. What were the relations between you and Mr. Vaile and Senator Dorsey during the winter of 1878-'79?—A. They did not improve after December.

Q. They got no better fast?—A. We let each other alone very severely.

Q. I want to know now if you had any conversation with Senator Dorsey late in the winter, or at any time in the winter, in which he said anything about what he proposed to do with Vaile when he got out of the Senate.

Anything of what he, Stephen W. Dorsey, proposed to do with Vaile when he got out of the Senate.

Mr. MERRICK. I object.

The COURT. Have you any proof on that subject?

Mr. MERRICK. Not a particle.

Mr. HENKLE. No, sir; but it is in the same line. I want to show that Dorsey in the winter said to Miner that when he got out of the Senate he was going to kick Vaile out of this whole concern.

Mr. MERRICK. Well, you may prove it.

General Henkle offered here to show that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, a United States Senator, with no interest in these contracts and with no power over them, with no relations to them, except that of having been a lender of money to some of the parties concerned in them, was going to kick out Mr. Vaile, who was in them, who was a partner, who was a subcontractor upon all of the routes, who had the power in the matter, and who had the interest. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, the United States Senator, as soon as he got out of the Senate and had a little time and the statute did not interfere with his appearing in his real character, was going to kick Mr. Vaile out! And yet Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey had not any interest in these contracts. Following this along a little further, gentlemen, and with reference to the relations of Mr. Dorsey to this business, we find that on the 4th of March, 1879, the very day that Mr. Dorsey's Senatorial career ended, he addressed a letter to Mr. Brady, in which he says:

SIR: Being duly empowered to act for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, mail contractors, I hereby enter in their behalf my protest against the acknowledgment of any subcontracts or powers of attorney now on file in your department, or which may hereafter be filed in the name of H. M. Vaile, or in the name of any other person.

These subcontracts or powers of attorney were made and filed without the knowledge, authority, or consent of said Peck and Dorsey, and in their behalf I demand that they be canceled on the first day of April, and that no other subcontracts to any person whatsoever shall be accepted by you upon any mail routes in the names of said Peck and Dorsey, except those in the Indian Territory, unless such subcontract shall be accompanied by a power of attorney given by said Peck and Dorsey after the date of this letter.

I am, respectfully yours,

S. W. DORSEY,
For JOHN M. PECK,
JOHN W. DORSEY.

You see, gentlemen, the kicking-out process commenced promptly on the 4th day of March. There Mr. Dorsey put on record a statement that he was duly empowered to act for John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, and yet he on the stand and John W. Dorsey on the stand are neither of them able to indicate in any way how he got such a power from either one of them. Mr. John W. Dorsey was in trouble; he did at one time start in to say that there was a power of attorney, but as it happened so promptly he was just then met by the question which Mr. Merrick put to him, "Then Mr. Dorsey was taking an interest in this thing while he was still in the Senate?" and Mr. John W. Dorsey took the back track and paddled in again. He was not prepared to say that there was any power of attorney. He did not know exactly what it was, but Stephen W. Dorsey did this, and he for one did not propose to repudiate his act. All the way through, as he says on another occasion, he was embarrassed by the fact that he had got his brother into this business. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey tells you on the stand that he did all this, and that he knew of this condition of things, which led him to write that letter on the 4th of March, written, I assume, after 12 o'clock noon when his term expired. He knew of the condition of things which led to his writing that letter as early as the previous December, but, sensitive and careful man that he was, he was not willing to interfere in any manner with the contracts of anybody else, not willing to even have the appearance of wrong-doing, not having done any of these things which somebody in the guise of Stephen W. Dorsey had been doing since the previous November, signing Peck's name, demanding that all Peck's contracts and papers should be sent from the Post-Office Department to him, employing the different persons, arranging how they were to be paid, paying them, attending to the whole business, and having it all conducted at his house. This gentleman, wishing to save even the appearance of wrong-doing, says he did not do this, though he knew of the condition of things as early as December which led him to write the letter on the 4th of March, and he said in his testimony, "I know now what you are trying to reach, and I will give it to you." The question was why he did not do it earlier. He said:

For the simple reason that John W. Dorsey not being here, and Peck not being here, and I being in the Senate, I thought it would be an improper thing for me to act for them when I was in that position.

That is the reason. It was an improper thing for Stephen W. Dorsey to act for them while he was in the Senate, as their representative, under the form of a power of attorney, placing on record in the Post-Office Department their objection to the subcontracts which Vaile had filed; but it was a perfectly proper thing for Stephen W. Dorsey to do all of these things which I have related to you, for the simple reason, gentlemen, that the one became a matter of record and could be brought up against Stephen W. Dorsey face to face with the section of the statute which forbid him to be interested in such things, while the others were secret matters, done out of sight, done without a record, known only to few, and known only to those who were either his coconspirators, his dependents, or his employés. Those things he was willing to do; but he was not willing to act as the attorney on the record of John W. Dorsey or John M. Peck, because it was an improper thing while he was in the Senate of the United States. Gentlemen, that is the story that comes to you from the lips of the man who dared not produce to you the book which he admittedly had in his own possession, showing the correspondence, showing the accounts that he admittedly has and which he does not want read. Leaving the books testified by Rerdell out of the question, he admittedly has some books containing the accounts of this mail service. He is the man who dared not produce the letter-books and dared not produce the books and accounts by which he settled with Bosler only in November last. He says to you that he was so sensitive that he could not act as the attorney for somebody who had a post-office contract. Bear in mind, gentlemen, in this case that John W. Dorsey told all through the western country, to the two Johnsons at Toquerville, along up at Bismarck and Fort Keogh, and I think in one or two other places, that his brother, a United States Senator, was interested with them and that they relied upon him to carry on the business. He made those declarations out there when there was no anticipation that trouble would arise and when their interests were to be promoted by it. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that through the whole correspondence both before and since Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate, the paper with the stamp of the United States Senate was used for that correspondence and was sent broadcast over the country to give at least the appearance of the fact to people who knew nothing about statutes upon that subject that these conspirators were backed by and associated with a Senator of the United States. Bear in mind, gentlemen, Mr. John W. Dorsey's private arrangement in money matters with Stephen W. Dorsey. If you believe John W. Dorsey, where were Stephen W. Dorsey's sensibilities upon this subject? He was having a private and confidential arrangement with John W. Dorsey in connection with these contracts, receiving money and ostensibly giving it out, although really Mr. John W. Dorsey was furnishing it. Bear in mind that Mr. John W. Dorsey was so considerate that Stephen W. Dorsey should not be brought into it that when he had money to furnish for these contracts, and when Mr. Miner was admittedly his partner and associate, he would not trust it to Mr. Miner, his partner and associate, but trusted it to his brother, the Senator, who was so careful about having anything to do with the contracts. Bear in mind that Mr. John W. Dorsey actually gives that as a reason why he would not be concerned. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that Stephen W. Dorsey tells you himself that Mr. Peck wrote him about getting bonds. He would not be concerned in doing anything with reference to aiding them. He would not be concerned in being their attorney of record, but he would be concerned in getting their bondsmen for them. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that on the 6th day of March, two days after the kicking-out process commenced by that letter which Dorsey wrote to Brady you find Stephen W. Dorsey, by his own admission and by the evidence of Mr. Vaile, engaged in negotiating with Mr. Vaile, who had come here "hell-bent," as the expression used to be in our boyish days, to get rid of Stephen W. Dorsey. Vaile declared that nothing on earth would induce him to go on longer with Stephen W. Dorsey, and he hurried here, and thinks he arrived here on the very day after Mr. Dorsey's Senatorial term ceased, and on the 6th of March, at Mr. Dorsey's own house, he entered into a negotiation with Vaile by which this condition of things was to terminate and by which Mr. Vaile should get out of the hell in which he was in going along with Stephen W. Dorsey. Dorsey entered into that negotiation acting solely by himself. Peck was in New Mexico. John W. Dorsey was in this city, but John W. Dorsey, by his own statement and by the statement of the others, took no part in it. John W. Dorsey did not dare to say that he had ventured to give any paper or power of attorney, any authority, to Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey to do these things, and there is no suggestion any where that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey during the progress of this business consulted John W. Dorsey or anybody else. He acted as and for himself and as and for his own. It cannot be said that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey so acted because he had made an arrangement with Peck, because Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey tells you himself on the stand that after he had gone thus far with Mr. Vaile he was summoned to New Mexico by the sickness of John M. Peck, and went out there, and then and there in New Mexico he made the arrangement which he claims to have made with John M. Peck, buying him out and paying him $10,000 for his interest in these losing contracts and in this losing business to which Peck never had contributed a dollar. He paid him $10,000, or agreed to pay him $10,000, and then came back here and perfected the matter. So that Mr. Dorsey was operating, making his arrangements, negotiating, bargaining, closing, substantially and in fact though not in form, this whole business and relieving Vaile from the trouble in which he was and from being obliged to keep on with him. All this he did, commencing within two days after he went out of the Senate, and in that way apparently John W. Dorsey was allowing him tacitly to go on, because John W. Dorsey felt very bad that he had got him into the business, as he stated. That expression of John W. Dorsey's dropped out in the course of an answer to some question that was put him on cross-examination as to why he acted so and so. He had got him into the business. After the cross-examination closed Colonel Ingersoll took him up and he tried to get some kind of an explanation out of him as to what he meant by getting him into the business, and it turned out that he meant getting him to advance the money; a considerable portion of which, by Mr. John W. Dorsey's own account, he had himself given to Stephen W. Dorsey, that Stephen W. Dorsey might ostensibly advance it, while in fact John W. Dorsey did.

Now, gentlemen, as to the relations of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey to these contracts there are one or two little scattered items of proof which it would be well for you to bear in mind. Mr. Boone tells you that while the Congressional investigation was going on he went to Mr. Dorsey and told him, "Get your brother John out of the way; he will make trouble if he is here during the investigation; get him out of the way." That investigation was not the investigation consequent upon Mr. Brady's demand for the additional appropriation, but the earlier investigation made in 1878, where these contracts were to a considerable extent the subject of an examination. Boone said, "Get him out of the way," and the result was, I say, because it was post hoc and therefore I say propter hoc, John W. Dorsey promptly went to Bismarck. As to Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey another isolated fact is entitled to some consideration here and that is that on the 17th of April, 1879, Mr. Dorsey started Mr. Rerdell West with letters certifying to his character and capacity, and certifying also that he was his friend. He gave him two letters, one to Governor Routt, and the other to a man named Paddock, whom he calls "Dear Mart." He not only certified to him as his friend, but put together, gentlemen, what I am afraid Mr. Merrick will not agree with me in saying do go together, and what after the developments of this trial I am afraid I cannot claim always go together. He said, "He is not only an upright man, but a thorough-going republican." He put those two together, and then he went on and said:

He has, together with Colonel Peck, a great many mail routes in your State, and if you can aid him in any way I shall be grateful to you.

In his letter to Paddock he said:

Mr. Rerdell has large interests in Colorado.

In the letter to Routt he said:

Colonel Peck has a great many mail routes in the State.

When asked what interests Rerdell had in Colorado he said he did not know. "Rerdell's interest was simply the interest he had, I suppose, in these contracts as the employé of myself." This was on the 14th of April, 1879. So on that date Mr. Dorsey recognizes the fact that he was interested in these contracts. He was then asked in regard to his statement that Colonel Peck had a great many mail routes in that State. I read from pages 3931, 3932 :

Q. Had Colonel Peck any interest in any route in that State on April 14, 1879?—A. There were routes in his name.

Q. Had Colonel Peck any interest in any route in that State on April 14, 1879?—A. I say there were some that stood in his name.

Q. Had he any interest in any routes in that State?—A. No. I bought him out before that.

Q. He had no interest?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why, then, did you say that he had an interest?—A. Because the routes stood in his name. I could not explain a long business transaction in a letter of introduction very well.

Q. What was the occasion for putting Colonel Peck's name in there?

In answer to that he rather thought that Colonel Peck was in some way or other a friend of Routt's. There a passage occurred, gentlemen, which may have impressed itself upon your mind. That is the point where Mr. Ingersoll said :

I don't think I am half as smart as the witness.

And the court said :

I don't think you are either.

Mr. WILSON. That is a pretty strong circumstance against a defendant.

Mr. BLISS. I ought to call your attention in passing to another fact indicating Mr. Dorsey's action and the authority which he took in signing Mr. Peck's name. One draft, which was issued by the Post-Office Department, and which was given to Mr. Dorsey on the 16th or 17th of August unindorsed and drawn to the order of John M. Peck, was, as early as the 18th of August, deposited by Stephen W. Dorsey to his private account with Donnell, Lawson & Co., of New York, indorsed with the name of John M. Peck.

The COURT. You have given the month, but not the year.

Mr. BLISS. It was in the year 1880. I am speaking merely of the authority which Mr. Dorsey exercised in signing Peck's name whenever he chose. He signed Peck's name to that draft which came into his possession on the 15th or 16th of August, and it was sent as early as the 18th of August for deposit in that bank. I think there is no evidence as to whether Mr. Dorsey sent it or not, but it was sent, Mr. Peck being in New Mexico all the time.

Mr. MERRICK. He signed Peck's name, but not for him.

Mr. BLISS. He signed the name of John M. Peck.

The missing contract that I called your attention to at one time I have here. It is a subcontract that Stephen W. Dorsey made on the 1st of April, 1879, and it is at the rate of $548. The route was expedited and the pay increased in the following June. It cannot be claimed that that contract was antedated, as was claimed with regard to various other contracts which were troublesome in their dates, because if that had been so they would have inserted the rate of pay which then existed.

Gentlemen, I now pass from the time when Stephen W. Dorsey was obliged by his position in the Senate to conceal his interest in these contracts. Immediately after the 4th of March he avowedly became interested in them, and the whole transaction made such an impression upon Miner that he assumed that the moment Dorsey was free from the prohibition of the statute he would avowedly appear as interested. Bear in mind all these things which Mr. Dorsey did while he was still in the Senate. He did everything that a man could do who was actually interested in mail contracts, save formally going upon the records of the Post-Office Department as being so interested. I ask you now to hear me for a few moments with reference to the affidavits to which I shall call your attention on the subject of the action of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey after March, 1879, when he went out of the Senate, in connection with this business, as showing the nature of his relations and transactions. 6 E, gentlemen, is the oath of John W. Dorsey made here on the 26th day of April upon the route from Trinidad to Madison, in which he describes himself as subcontractor when he was not subcontractor. It is one of the oaths which he says was made at the instigation of Rerdell, who was on that day in Denver, Colorado. It is an oath declaring that the number of men and animals necessary on route 38140 on the present schedule and three trips a week—

Is one men and four animals.

Apart from the obvious insertion of these numbers subsequent to the making of the rest of the affidavit, I call your attention to this—

Is one men—

showing that the word men was written there first with the idea that the number would be more than one.

The number necessary on a schedule of twelve hours, three times a week, is three men and eleven animals.

That oath, Mr. Rerdell says, was sent with others by him in blank to John W. Dorsey in Vermont before he left here on the 15th or 17th of April, and it came back sworn to in blank and he found it here when he returned about the 4th or 5th of May, and then it was used. He says that the filling in of the numbers there is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey; that Stephen W. Dorsey filled the affidavit in after it came back here from Vermont.

Mr. CRANE (the foreman). There is something we cannot understand about these affidavits. There is another one that was sent there and that he swore to before a magistrate in Vermont.

Mr. BLISS. Not on that route, I think. On the Pueblo and Rosita route there are two. I think there are not two on that route. I am glad to have you ask me about it, but my recollection is this: There are on route 38134, from Pueblo to Rosita, two oaths sworn to on the same day by John W. Dorsey in Vermont. There is on this route only one sworn to by John W. Dorsey, and that was sworn to here.

Mr. CRANE. What we cannot understand is why, if these affidavits were filled out here, there was any necessity for sending so many of them up there.

Mr. BLISS. The point is this: They had to have the signature of John W. Dorsey. He was to sign for the routes upon which he was the contractor, beyond all question. The regulations said that the affidavit must be signed by the contractor. Mr. Rerdell said that they sent a lot of affidavits in blank. The blank affidavits which were intended to be used on John Dorsey's routes were sent to Vermont to Dorsey, or given to Dorsey.

Mr. CRANE. But if they were filled out here what was the necessity of sending two up there?

Mr. BLISS. They sent a lot up there to have them executed. They were to be filled in here afterwards as they wanted them. You see, gentlemen, that the route is not specified. The number of the route is inserted afterwards. They were all sent up in blank. They were about in this form:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route ——— on the present schedule, and ——— trips a week, is ——— men and ——— animals. The number necessary to carry the mail on a schedule of ——— hours ——— times a week is ——— men and ——— animals.

They were sent up there entirely in blank to have the signature of the contractor put to them.

Mr. CRANE. Mr. John Dorsey swears that in the morning he received an affidavit and made oath to it and sent it away, and in the afternoon he received another one over the same route. What we cannot understand is, if they were filled up after they got back here, what the necessity was for sending another affidavit.

Mr. BLISS. What I say is simply that that story of Mr. John W. Dorsey's is a lie from beginning to end. He says he got one letter in the morning from Rerdell from Washington asking him to swear to the affidavit that was inclosed, and he got by the later mail another letter from Rerdell from Washington asking him to swear to the affidavit that was then inclosed. In point of fact Rerdell was not in Washington, and had not been in Washington for several days previously, and therefore the story of John W. Dorsey cannot be true. He did not get the oaths in that way at all. He got them as Rerdell says, a package at a time in blank, and he signed them and swore to them in blank, and they were sent back here in blank, and when they wanted to use the oaths they then took them up and filled in the number of the route and the number of men and animals, and then filed the oath. Now, Mr. Rerdell says that he sent those affidavits there in blank. As to one of them, it is in Rerdell's handwriting. As to the other, it is in Kellogg's handwriting—all but the filling up.

Mr. MERRICK. They were both getting them up.

Mr. BLISS. Kellogg was doing the writing for the concern here, also. He wrote some of these blank affidavits, and they sent a package of them to John W. Dorsey in Vermont to be sworn to. Some of them were in Kellogg's handwriting and some of them were in Rerdell's. Back they came signed and sworn to in blank. They had them in stock, and if they wanted an affidavit upon a given route they took it out of stock and used it. If they wanted an affidavit of John Dorsey's they took it and used it. If they wanted an affidavit of Peck's they took it and used it. When they used it they filled it up, inserting the route and inserting the number of men and horses. As confirming that story I call your attention to the fact that, beyond all dispute, in the affidavits the body of which was written by Kellogg the blanks are filled in in an entirely different handwriting, and that handwriting is sworn to by Boone and by Rerdell in the particular oath you have there as being the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

The COURT. The filling up.

Mr. BLISS. The filling up. That is what I am speaking of. As to that particular affidavit Mr. Dorsey I think has something to say. Mr. Boone having sworn that the filling up was in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey and Mr. Rerdell having sworn that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey filled it up as a fact, Mr. Dorsey is asked upon the stand (page 3944) if he can say that he did not fill it up and he answered :

I say I don't think I did. I don't remember it.

His attention was directed to it. No man familiar with the handwriting of Mr. Stephen Dorsey, no Hill, no Kellogg, comes on the stand to deny the statement of Boone and Rerdell that that is the handwriting of Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey does not deny that it is his. He did not remember filling it up, but he does not think he did. The whole world of Mr. Dorsey's acquaintances, everybody who was acquainted with his handwriting, it was open to them to have put on the stand and to ask them, "Is that the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey?" Forewarned by the experience that Judge Henkle had with Mr. Waugh, they did not put anybody on the stand.

Mr. CRANE. The filling up seems to be in two different handwritings and two different inks.

Mr. BLISS. I was going to say something as to that particular affidavit. Mr. Rerdell says that he wrote that in, and Mr. Boone swears that it is Rerdell's handwriting. I refer to the word twelve. You will see that that word twelve is the only one in that paper that is written over an erasure.

Mr. CRANE. The word "trips" appears to be written over an erasure.

Mr. BLISS. I would not contradict you, Mr. Foreman, but I think you are in error about that. However, that is a matter of observation.

So much for that. Now, I pass along to 22 F, which is the oath upon the Ojo Caliente route. That oath I pass to you, gentlemen, and you will see in the same way that the number of the route, the number of trips, the number of men and animals, the number of hours, and the number of times per week are all inserted after the oath was written, and in a different ink. That affidavit is an affidavit, I think, sworn to here by John Dorsey on the 26th of April, and sworn to, as he says, at the instigation of Rerdell, who unquestionably was then in Denver, Colorado. Now, as to that oath Mr. Rerdell tells you that the filling up was done by Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Boone tells you that that filling up is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey was examined and asked on page 3771, if he did not fill it up, and he said:

I have no recollection; I have no idea that I ever did it. I have no recollection at all.

If that was not his handwriting why did they not put somebody on the stand to swear that it was not his handwriting? Boone is the man by whom that was sworn to, the man whom none of them have dared to say has told an untruth deliberately upon the stand. All they have said of him was that he was mistaken. That is the farthest they have gone. It was open to them, and there was a chance where, if false testimony was being given, they could have contradicted it. This is not only the testimony of Boone, that in his opinion it is the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey, but Rerdell swears that it is Dorsey's handwriting and I think he saw it filled up. There was an opportunity to contradict Mr. Rerdell in the most conclusive manner; and yet no man familiar with Stephen Dorsey's handwriting came on the stand to say that it was not his handwriting. All that Mr. Dorsey said about it was that he had no recollection of it. Why did they not produce Hill or Kellogg or Bosler, the intimate associate and friend? Why did they not bring some one of those men here, some one of the hundred men who are familiar with his handwriting, to tell you, "Gentlemen, Mr. Rerdell lied; that is not Stephen W. Dorsey's handwriting?" Going on a little further, I hand you 25 S, being the affidavit on the White River, route sworn to by John Dorsey before Kellogg, in the city of Washington, on the 26th of April. This is another one of those affidavits which Mr. Dorsey says he made at the instigation of a man who was out in Colorado. In the same way, you see, the number of the route, the number of trips, the number of men and animals, and the number of hours have been filled in. It is very easy to see that they were inserted at another time than the time when the body of the affidavit was written. Mr.

Boone tells you in like manner that that filling up is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Rerdell tells you in like manner that not only is that the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey, but no friend, no acquaintance of Dorsey's dare take the stand and deny that that is the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. When Stephen W. Dorsey himself was on the stand as a witness his own counsel did not dare to call his attention to that affidavit. They did not dare to seek to get from him even the qualified denial that was made as to the others, that he had no recollection about them. That affidavit was left with the evidence of Boone and Rerdell. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey comes on the stand and is examined and is allowed by his counsel to pass off the stand without any attempt to answer or to dodge that testimony. It stands before you, gentlemen, as undisputed, unequivocal testimony, which, I think, the court will tell you you are bound under your oaths to consider as true.

The COURT. What is the date of that affidavit?

Mr. BLISS. It is dated the 26th of April, 1879. I will not undertake to say that that affidavit presents evidence of it, but there are some affidavits in this case that present evidence that they were in the habit of copying them and keeping press-copies in a letter-book.

The COURT. Let me inquire of you whether you claim as to these affidavits, bearing date the 26th of April, that the date was added after the oath was made.

Mr. BLISS. I know nothing about that, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. It would appear from the looks of the affidavit that it was not, if your honor will examine it. The ink in which Mr. Kellogg's name is written is the same in which the date of the jurat is written.

Mr. BLISS. Of course, your honor, the affidavits being made in this way in blank the date of the jurat was not inserted, the idea being that the officer who took the jurat would correctly insert the date.

The COURT. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BLISS. In this case, the jurat bearing the signature of Mr. Kellogg, the date, I think, bears evidence of having been written at the same time and with the same ink. What I mean to say is that it indicates that they were not ordinarily going into complicity, when they prepared these blanks, with the officers before whom the oaths were taken. They did not expect to swear to them and have the date left blank. Their arrangements were made with the expectation that the date would be correctly stated.

The COURT. What about the appearance of the date in the jurat?

Mr. BLISS. When you look at the words "twenty-one" or "twenty-six" and "April" they appear to be in a different handwriting from the rest. In all the affidavits the jurat is beyond all question in a different handwriting and different ink. I have no question in my own mind that the date of the affidavit inserted by Wainwright in Vermont is the correct date when Mr. Dorsey appeared before him. We make no question about that, and have no reason to do so. We have no reason to doubt Kellogg's statement, except for his association with these gentlemen. But the question of the date in the jurats is not particularly important. There is, however, something to confirm the truth of Mr. Kellogg's dates upon one or two of these affidavits. 22 F, for instance, was sworn to on the 26th of April, 1879, and filed in the department on that day.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Did he see Dorsey sign them?

Mr. BLISS.. I do not know as to that.

Mr. CRANE. I do not want to be too inquisitive about this.

Mr. BLISS. I am glad you have asked the question. As to that affidavit on 38145, with reference to which you asked me about Rerdell having seen Mr. Dorsey sign it, Mr. Rerdell does not say as to that that he saw the signing of it; as to some of the others I think he says that he saw the signing. But as to the one on 38145 he says, at page 2234, he does not think he ever saw it until the last trial, and does not say that he saw the signing of it.

19 F is a letter transmitting the affidavit (22 F) apparently. Boone and Rerdell swear that so far as the signature is concerned—and I think more than that, but I wish to refer for the moment to the record, for I desire to be accurate in these things—they swear to it as being the handwriting of Dorsey, so far as the signature is concerned, certainly; that was naturally placed there at that time because of the day when it was transmitted, the other letters of transmittal being signed mostly by Rerdell. At the time that that letter was transmitted Mr. Rerdell was not here. As to this 19 F, this is all in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, including the signature, John W. Dorsey, as testified to by Rerdell, judging entirely from the handwriting. [Page 2337.] Mr. Boone, at page 2692, says of 19 F:

This is a letter transmitting a sworn statement of the number of men and animals on the route, 38145, and resembles the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. Is it your best judgment that it is his handwriting?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not the way to ask it.

Q. In whose handwriting is it?—A. It is a handwriting entirely different from Stephen W. Dorsey's.

The COURT. That is not an answer to the question. Who wrote that letter, if you know, judging from the handwriting?

The WITNESS. It resembles the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey; it is a disguised handwriting. It is different from the ordinary way he writes.

Q. It is a disguised hand which you say resembles that of Stephen W. Dorsey?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Whom does it purport to be signed by?—A. John W. Dorsey.

Q. Is it the handwriting of John W. Dorsey?—A. No, sir; it is not.

That is as far as Mr. Boone goes. Mr. Boone thinks the handwriting resembles Mr. Dorsey's, and says positively that it is not John W. Dorsey's. Mr. John W. Dorsey does not seem to have been asked as to the letter, but Mr. Boone says it is not Mr. John W. Dorsey's handwriting. Rerdell says it is in the handwriting of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, and you will bear in mind as to that that it is natural it should not be in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell, because, according to the date of it on the back, it was written at a time when Mr. Rerdell was admittedly out West. Mr. S. W. Dorsey does not seem to have been asked anything more than in regard to the oath which I have already shown you. He does not seem to have been asked upon that subject by anybody. So we must stand on the evidence of Rerdell declaring that it was Stephen W. Dorsey's handwriting, and of Boone making the qualified statement that it resembled his handwriting. When Stephen W. Dorsey came upon the stand he was not asked anything about it.

Now, I am going to show you the oath 81, which is a little dilapidated [handing it to the jury]. That is an oath upon the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, one of the routes which passed to Stephen W. Dorsey. It is signed by John M. Peck, and there is the same evidence of insertions. You will see that the "four," "nine," "fifty," and "ten" are all over erasures, as also these words "ten," "thirty," "fifty," "nine," "four," and apparently the route (44140), though I speak with less certainty as to that, are all obviously inserted in blanks, and are written, in a measure, I think, with different ink, and the most of them over erasures.

As to those affidavits, I desire simply to sum up by saying that as to those which I have shown you, other than the one now before you, Boone swears the filling in to be in S. W. Dorsey's handwriting; Rerdell swears it to be in S. W. Dorsey's handwriting; and I am under the impression—though Mr. Merrick thinks I am wrong—that as to one of them Mr. Rerdell stated that he saw it filled in. As to the others, I see by my memorandum here that Mr. Rerdell does not say that he did see them signed. He simply testifies to the handwriting and nothing else.

Now, as to 9 O, which is a petition that Mr. Rerdell states that he saw Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey write. He so states on page 2345:

Q. I hand you a petition on this route, marked 9 O, and ask you if you know in whose handwriting the body of that petition is?—A. The handwriting of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. In saying it is in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, do you speak from your knowledge of the handwriting solely, or from any other knowledge; and, if so, what?—

A. I saw S. W. Dorsey write this petition.

Q. When?—A. It was in April, 1879.

And of course it is in a disguised hand, and I hand it to you for your inspection in connection with the letter to which I called your attention, and which is partly in a similar disguised hand. As to this 9 O, at page 2699, Mr. Boone says:

I should say that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that—wrote the heading.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; I mean the heading.

I have one or two more papers here that I want to call to your attention in the same connection, and one of them is 5 E, which is the letter transmitting one of the oaths on the Trinidad and Madison route, and is dated on the 28th of April, 1879. On page 2691 Boone testifies:

It has the appearance of being in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Q. Is that your best judgment?—A. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Let me see it. I would know it myself now.

On page 2336 Mr. Rerdell says:

All of this, including the signature of John W. Dorsey, was written by S. W. Dorsey.

Q. When you say it was written by S. W. Dorsey, do you speak from your knowledge of his handwriting, or from your knowledge of the fact?—A. It is from my particular knowledge of his handwriting and the circumstances connected with it.

As to this paper, 5 E, Mr. S. W. Dorsey makes no denial of it being in his handwriting. I think he was not questioned about it.

30 S is a letter transmitting oath on the route from Rawlins to White River. That is stated to be in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey, and so far as I have been able to find Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was not questioned about it on the stand in any manner.

The COURT. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was not able to see, of course.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; not able to read the papers. But as to the others he was questioned as to whether he did certain things, and he had no recollection of it. As to this and one or two other papers I have just referred to no question whatever was put to him.

There is another series of papers similar to these in their general character, but which were undoubtedly filled up by Mr. Rerdell, and Mr. Rerdell states that the filling was done by direction of S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Dorsey in some cases, if not in all, I think he said, gave the figures which were to be inserted. Upon those papers, of course, there is no opportunity for a test by handwriting. The only opportunity there was for a test was by denial, and that we were not favored with, I think.

One of the papers that I now refer to, for instance, is 20 F, which is another oath upon the Ojo Caliente route. There is an erasure there, but it is apparently the erasure of the name of the route. There is an erasure under the "5" in the number of the route, 38145, and "Ojo Caliente" is over an erasure, and "Parrott City" is over an erasure. The "three" before "times," "three" before "men," and "seven" before "animals" are obviously inserted in blank. The "eighty" is the same way, I think; the "9" and "27," I think you will see, were obviously inserted in figures at different times. At page 2337 the evidence as to 20 F is this:

The body of this is written by myself—

Says Mr. Rerdell—

all except the signature of John W. Dorsey and "State of Vermont, Addison County; Rufus Wainwright, clerk of Addison County Court, 11th;" all of the remainder was written by myself.

Q. By whom was the signature of John W. Dorsey written?—A. Written by John W. Dorsey.

Q. Were the words designating the numbers in there before the signature of John W. Dorsey was affixed, or not?—A. No, sir; they were written afterwards.

Q. In other words, the affidavit was taken in blank, was it?—A. The affidavit was taken in blank, and the figures 38145 and the words Ojo Caliente, Parrott City, 3, 7, 30, 8, 27 were filled in by me after—

Q. [Interposing.] After the oath was taken?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In other words, the words designating the route, the place from which and to which, the number of men and animals, and the time were all written in afterwards?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How came you to do that?—A. I did that under the direction of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. Stephen Dorsey does not seem to have been questioned about 20 F, although he was questioned about 19 F, 21 F, and 22 F. I have it on my memorandum—and I may just as well state it now, and give Mr. Dorsey the benefit of it—that he somewhere denies that he ever gave any directions to have any affidavits filled up. In another place he says that he did, on one occasion, by telegraph—where there were two routes upon which some affidavit was wanted—give some directions, but he claims that he did not consider that those were such directions as would authorize the filling up of an affidavit after it had been sworn to. And in two other places, at least, where he is questioned, Mr. Dorsey says that he does not recollect whether he did or did not give directions to have a particular affidavit filled up. He does say in answer to his own counsel (I think it is his own counsel) that he never gave any such directions, and subsequently he says that he does not recollect it. It does not exactly appear what that transaction was with reference to which he telegraphed in connection with some oaths, to which I have just alluded.

24 S is the affidavit which is sworn to by Perkins, the subcontractor out in Rawlins, and that was admittedly sworn to in blank; the evidence of Smith, the notary, of Perkins, and Rerdell, and I think of somebody else, being that those figures, 1, 3, 84, 8, and 24 were not in there, though the route number was in. As to those, Mr. Rerdell's testimony is that the filling up was done by him.

And let me say as to all those cases in which Mr. Rerdell says that the handwriting is his, that Mr. Boone's testimony entirely agrees with his; and in all those cases in which Mr. Rerdell states that it is the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Boone either says the same thing, or, as in the case I referred to, there was the qualified statement that it looked very much like S. W. Dorsey's handwriting, and was disguised.

On page 2231 we have the testimony as to 24 S, which is that Mr. Rerdell says that he himself filled it in here. At page 2350 he says:

Q. I hand you an oath marked 24 S, purporting to be taken by Charles F. Perkins. I am not sure but you were examined about that?—A. I was.

Q. What have you to say about it? Give it briefly, and we will get it in the record in this connection.—A. The body of this is written by myself; it was sent in blank to Charles F. Perkins, and came back in the manner in which it was sent, and I filled in the blanks that were left; put in the words "one," "three," "six," "eight," and "twenty-four."

Q. How came you to do that?—A. I put them in under the direction of Stephen W. Dorsey.

6 D is an oath on the Toquerville and Adairville route. That, however, is an oath of John M. Peck. [Oath handed to jury.] The changes are not so obvious there. It is not so obvious about the word "three." The "thirty-three," "seven," "five," and "thirty-five" are over erasures, and the "eight" was obviously inserted at some time in a blank. As to that paper there is considerable testimony in the case. It was taken up in the examination of affidavits apparently with a little more care than was given to the most of them. At page 2241 Mr. Rerdell says:

All of that is in the handwriting of John R. Miner.

Q. Do you know Miner's handwriting?—A. I do.

Q. Have you seen him write?—A. Often. The figures "41119" and "seven times a week," "three" (3), and "six (6), thirty-three, seven, five (5), eighteen (18)," are all in my handwriting.

Q. How came you to fill in with those words and figures the blank affidavit which appears according to your statement to have been in Miner's writing?—A. This was one of the blanks that was turned over at the time of the separation of the interests and when the petition had arrived for an increase of service on route 41119, from Toquerville to Adairville.

Which, you will remember, passed to S. W. Dorsey.

Mr. S. W. Dorsey instructed me to make up one of the affidavits, and I made the calculation myself and filled this in.

Q. What specific instructions did he give to you with reference to the calculation you were to make?—A. Well, he gave me the per cent. of the increased pay.

Q. How much per cent. of increase was there to be?

And then counsel have something to say.

The WITNESS. I can only give the conversation in substance.

Q. Give it in substance; and where you cannot recollect the language, give it in language that conveys the exact substance as near as you can remember it. And whenever I ask you for a conversation hereafter, give the whole of it.—A. He said to fill out one of Peck's affidavits for daily service or seven times a week, on the Toquerville and Adairville route, and to preserve the proportion of from 150 to 200 per cent. increase.

He afterwards makes a correction about that, and brings the percentage, I think up, to 250.

I asked him to make the calculation. "Oh," he says, "you can make it. That is all you want to do—preserve the proportion."

Q. Can you explain to the jury what you mean by preserving the proportion, and what you mean by 150 to 200 per cent.?—A. Yes, sir.

Then the question is waived, apparently, and afterwards there is this answer:

A. I took the number of men and animals on the then schedule and added them together as one part. I then took the number of men and animals on the proposed schedule and added them together. Then I said, as the first is to the second so is one hundred to the answer, getting as near to the proportion as I could. It is very rarely that you can get it exactly.

Q. Did you at that time have any information in regard to the number of men and animals used on the existing schedule?—A. I did not, sir.

Q. Did you have any information of the number of men and animals that were necessary on the proposed schedule?—A. I did not. I only carried out the idea of the percentage of increase without any regard to the other. I did not know.

Q. You say that Mr. Dorsey told you to take one of Peck's blank affidavits. How many of these blanks did you have?—A. I had quite a number of them. I do not recollect the number.

Q. For what purpose were they kept?—A. For that purpose, to be used whenever expedition was anticipated or to be allowed, for filing in the department.

Then, further on, at page 2278, the matter is recurred to, and the correction is made from 150 to 250 per cent. instead of 200 per cent. The affidavit comes up again on pages 2334 and 2335, where it is testified over again in the same way. Then on page 2361 this occurs :

Question. You have spoken of having inserted certain numbers or figures in some of these affidavits made for expedition by the direction of Mr. S. W. Dorsey ; were those directions general or specific as to each case?—Answer. They were specific, except in one case.

Q. What case was that?—A. On the route from Toquerville to Adairville, No. 41119, the instructions were general there, simply to make it up covering a certain percentage of increase.

Q. On the others, when you say the directions were specific, what do you mean? What were the directions?—A. In every case he furnished me with the numbers to put in.

Mr. Stephen Dorsey was examined with reference to that, and I desire that the jury should understand precisely what he said and precisely what the facts are alleged on the one side or the other in this case, and not only here, but everywhere else. At page 3945 this appears :

Q. Did you give Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West, in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

Q. Did you not direct him to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent.?—A. Oh, I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit?—A. My recollection is that I did not, but I don't know ; it is possible that I might have done it.

That being in Mr. Miner's handwriting, Miner says, at page 4245, substantially that he does not remember anything about it; that he wrote it; that when he wrote it it was clearly intended for Peck, because it reads "Territory of New Mexico, county of Colfax," but that he does not remember that piece of paper, and—

A. If it did not happen to appear in my handwriting I should not know that I had ever seen it before. I have no recollection in regard to it.

Q. Was it a blank when you sent it to Peck?—A. I don't know.

Q. If Rerdell filled it up afterwards it must have been a blank, must it not?—A. I don't know anything about it, whether he filled it up afterward or before, or at any time.

Q. Did you send it to him, after you wrote it, to put in the number of men and horses, and to send it back?—A. I don't think I ever gave it to him afterward or before ; I don't remember anything about it.

Q. That is your memory about it?—A. I said I don't remember anything about it.

Q. Nothing at all about it?—A. I do not.

Q. Is that John M. Peck's signature?—A. I think it is. It is not my handwriting, that is certain.

6 Q is an oath upon the Silverton route, another of the Dorsey affidavits, made in Vermont on the 21st of April. In the same way you will see that the number of the route is filled in the blank, and that the "3," "10," "15," "7," "6," and "30" were obviously filled in blanks ; and not only that, but that all except the number of route (38156), was obviously written over erasures. [Oath handed to jury.] Now, as to that Mr. Rerdell testifies, at page 2347 :

A. The body of this is in my handwriting. The signature is that of John W. Dorsey.

Q. Were the numbers in there before Mr. Dorsey's signature was affixed?—A. No, sir ; I put those in after it was sworn to.

Q. After the jurat was there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know when you put them there?—A. Either on the 5th or 6th of May.

By Mr. INGERSOLL :

Q. What year?—A. 1879.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. When you put in those numbers there, how came you to select the particular numbers?

The WITNESS. On this?

Mr. BLISS. On any one of them; take that, for instance.

A. On all that I have had presented to me so far, that I entered, except on the route from Toquerville to Adairville, 41119, the figures were made up by S. W. Dorsey.

Q. By whose direction did you put them in, if by anybody's?—I put them in by the direction of S. W. Dorsey.

Q. Where did he tell you to put them?—A. To put them in the blanks that were left in the affidavits that were sworn to in blank.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). I do not want to trouble you too much——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] No trouble.

Mr. CRANE. If the affidavit was filled up and sworn to, how came those erasures there?

Mr. BLISS. I cannot tell you. I notice that we failed to ask the witness on the stand how the erasures came to be there. It would look as if they had filled it up with some number, and then for some reason had changed them, I know not why. The only thing I can suggest consistently with the testimony—for I have no right to go outside of the testimony—is this, and it is borne out by the evidence in the Pueblo and Rosita route, where there are two affidavits sworn to on the same day. One of these appears to have been filed in the department on the 6th of May, and the other one appears to have been filed in the department on the 8th of May. In the mean time there is a letter signed with John Dorsey's name requesting that the first affidavit may be withdrawn to enable him to correct errors. The next day the second affidavit was placed on file, and in that the numbers of men and horses are stated considerably less than in the first. The number in the affidavit originally filed on the 6th of May was stated so absurdly large for that route—I think the number of horses stated as necessary upon that little route was thirty-eight—that it is very obvious to me that the fact was that somebody said: "Here, that is absurd; these numbers are too large for anybody to believe, or for anybody to act upon; you have got to make a change in respect to that." And there came a change on the next day. The one filed on the 6th of May states the number of animals necessary on the proposed schedule as thirty-eight, the length of the route being forty-nine miles nominally, but really only thirty-five. The other affidavit, filed on the 8th of May, puts the number of animals down to eighteen. The number then necessary on the existing schedule was, in the original affidavit which was withdrawn, stated as three men and twelve animals. In the new one they put in, it was two men and six animals. While in the old one it was seven men and thirty-eight animals necessary on the proposed schedule, in the new one they put it at six men and eighteen animals. My idea is that somebody suggested that the idea of having seven men and thirty-eight animals upon that route was an absurdity, and said that the affidavit must be withdrawn, and it was withdrawn. Then another blank was taken and these smaller numbers inserted. And whoever was engaged in that business, gentlemen, did not mean to be the loser by the transaction, because he kept the proportions in each affidavit between the figures on the proposed schedule and those on the present schedule, so that the amount that would be allowed to the contractor would be the same whether he took the one affidavit or the other. But it was too absurd a thing to leave on the records of the Post-Office Department the idea that thirty-eight animals were necessary to carry on that route, which was only thirty-five miles long, with a schedule of ten hours. The inference I draw from that is borne out by still another fact in the case, a fact which is sworn to by Mr. Rerdell, and they had the opportunity to contradict him if there had been any possibility of doing so, because he stated that it was done at the instigation of Mr. Turner, and yet Mr. Turner did not contradict him. With reference to the Trinidad and Madison route, both Rerdell and Boone stated that the word "twelve," which was written over, was in Rerdell's handwriting (in 6 E), while the balance was in the handwriting of others, the filling up being in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. At page 2336 Mr. Rerdell is asked:

Q. I hand you 6 E, and ask you in whose handwriting that is. That is an oath?—A. Yes, sir. The body of this was written by W. F. Kellogg. The signature of it is that of John W. Dorsey. The figures 38140, the word "three," the words "one," "four," "three," "three," "eleven," and the word "subcontractor," were written by S. W. Dorsey. The word "twelve" was written by myself.

Q. Were those things written in by Dorsey written before or after the signature of John W. Dorsey, do you know?—A. No, sir; I can't testify to that.

Showing that Mr. Rerdell was not present at the insertion of these things by Mr. S. W. Dorsey. And here I may say that when that question was up before there was a difference of opinion between myself and Mr. Merrick, and Mr. Merrick was right and I was wrong, for Mr. Rerdell did not state that he saw Stephen W. Dorsey fill them up; he stated that as to the petition 9 O, but not as to the others. He confined himself to his opinion entirely as to the question of handwriting, in which Mr. Boone agreed with him in every case, and in which nobody contradicted him. Therefore he says in answer to this question:

Q. Were those things, written in by Dorsey written before or after the signature of John W. Dorsey? Do you know?—A. No, sir; I can't testify to that. The word "twelve" that I wrote in was written afterwards and after it was filed in the Post-Office Department.

Q. After it was filed in the Post-Office Department—how came that?—A. The schedule that was contemplated was a longer schedule than twelve hours, and they were told that they had to bring it down to twelve hours.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that.

Q. Who told you that?—A. Mr. Turner.

Q. You were told that at the Post-Office Department; what then was done?—A. He handed me this and I erased, I think, the word "fifteen" and put in "twelve."

Q. Where was that done?—A. That was done in room 22, Post-Office Department.

Q. Is there more than one room 22 in the Post-Office Department?—A. I forget what floor it is on, but it is on the same floor where the contract offices are generally located; it is the second story above the street, I believe.

So you have the evidence that on the Pueblo and Rosita route two affidavits were filed; the one containing the large numbers was withdrawn, and the next day the small one filed, but the proportions were kept up.

In the Trinidad and Madison case you have the evidence that the affidavit was altered at the suggestion of Mr. Turner, in a room at the Post-Office Department.

In answer to the question which the foreman put me as to why these figures were written over erasures, I suppose that an affidavit, having been made up at one rate and with one set of figures, was taken and altered and another set of figures inserted, either because it was done handily there in the Post-Office Department, or because at the office there might not, for the moment, have been any further supply of blank affidavits signed by the contractors. But when the witness was on the stand we neglected to call his attention to the fact that these figures were over an erasure, and therefore we have no authority to do anything upon that subject except to draw an inference from similar transactions in the other cases to which I have referred.

These are matters of detail, gentlemen, and I am aware that it is tedious, and yet, at the same time, the jury have manifested so much desire to learn everything there is about it that I have taken much more time than I anticipated.

Mr. MERRICK. Do not hurry yourself; it is very important.

Mr. BLISS. I find also on page 3936 that there is a statement to which I wish to call your attention, in the testimony of Mr. Dorsey:

Q. At the time of this distribution of these routes, in view of this law of Congress which I have just read and the affidavit that was required by the Post-Office Department as the basis of the pro rata calculation, did you not also divide up among you a lot of blank affidavits?—A. I do not remember about that.

Q. Do you know whether you did or not?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you not know that it was understood between the parties that affidavits should be furnished, if necessary, respectively, by one side to the other?—A. Oh, there may have been some conversation of that sort.

Q. Was it not a fact that you did have for your routes a quantity of blank affidavits?—A. I do not remember whether it was or not.

This is Stephen W. Dorsey's testimony.

Q. You cannot say whether you had them or not?—A. No, sir. All those things were turned over to Rerdell; all the papers, everything in relation to the case, he had charge of, and I did not have anything to do with.

Q. You turned them over to Rerdell as your agent?—A. As my employé.

Q. And you say you did everything that you could do to obtain expedition and increase?—A. Everything that was lawful and proper where I thought a route ought to be increased.

Q. Did you not direct Rerdell to get all the increase and expedition that he could?—A. Probably.

Q. Do you not recollect that you did?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember what instructions you gave to this agent of yours to whose custody you committed this property?—A. I do not remember all the instructions; I suppose I gave such instructions as I thought necessary at that time.

Q. Can you not recall what instructions you gave him?—A. Oh, no, sir; I cannot recall.

Q. Did you leave him in control, management, and manipulation of the business free and undisturbed by any intervention on your part?—A. Left it absolutely to him. After I left here the 27th of June, 1879, up to July, 1882, the expiration of the term of these contracts, I do not believe I had any more to do with them, Mr. Merrick, than you had, or any one, and I did not care three straws about them.

Now, gentlemen, there is the evidence upon that subject. The affidavits have taken up so much of my time, and I have been so much interested in them, that I shall ask the court to allow me to withdraw my suggestion of an extended session to-day, and I will endeavor to be very brief on Monday morning. But before the adjournment to-day is probably as good a time as any to consider the testimony in regard to these affidavits. I ask you to bear in mind, gentlemen, that, constantly, these affidavits do not conform to the regulation. They are not affidavits which, in accordance with the regulation, state the number of men and horses which will be required on the contract schedule, but some of them state the number that will be required on the time then running, but with more trips than are then named in the schedule; some on the time that will be required on the then slow time, but running the full number of trips that they seek to get; and some not so many. They are inconsistent with the regulation right along. I have referred to that regulation before, and I refer to it again now, and ask you to bear it in mind. Mr. Chandler was correct in regard to it. Mr. Chandler, I may say, is almost always correct. Mr. Chandler always seeks to be correct, always seeks to conduct himself properly and fairly before a jury, as a lawyer ought. Mr. Chandler told you—and I am happy to adopt that statement—that the regulation had the binding effect of law upon the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and upon all these parties dealing with him. And yet one of the affidavits presented to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General did not conform to that lawful regulation. The other the Second Assistant Postmaster-General accepted, and based his action upon an affidavit which did not conform to that lawful regulation. I ask you, therefore, in considering these affidavits, to bear that fact in mind, that they were illegal in their very form, and entirely without regard to the question of any additions or insertions.

Mr. CRANE (the foreman of the jury). Cannot the court sit to-morrow, your honor? I would like to say, on the subject, that we have now been engaged on this case five months, during which time my business has been drifting along like a ship at sea without a rudder. I was taken by surprise when I was called upon to act as a juror in this case, but I procured somebody to take my place in my business, and now I feel very anxious to get through. Furthermore, I have a premonition that if this trial is spun out much longer it may come to a conclusion in consequence of the sickness or death of some one of the jury.

The COURT. I think the jurors have rather improved on it. We are not so far now from the end of the case as you probably apprehend.

Mr. CRANE. In a few days I shall have business that will call me out of town, and I should very much like to attend to it.

The COURT. I should be glad to sit continuously, but it has not been the habit of the court, and if the court had adopted that method, probably the trial would have been broken up before this, if we had sat every secular day including Saturdays.

Mr. EVANS (a juror). I would like to keep Colonel Bliss talking until 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I think that is the highest compliment that has been bestowed upon any counsel in this case.

The COURT. I have observed indications that seem to point in the direction that some of the jury have a different opinion about sitting on Saturday.

Mr. WILSON. [To Mr. Bliss.] Can we not now settle that little matter about Turner?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson wants me to call attention to the fact that he thinks Mr. Turner by some general language did deny Mr. Rerdell's statement of the alteration of that affidavit in his presence.

Mr. MERRICK. That is a matter for argument.

Mr. BLISS. That is a matter for argument, and I propose to read the testimony on that subject on Monday morning.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to him doing anything of the kind.

Mr. WILSON. Colonel Bliss has done justice to my colleague, Mr. Chandler, and now I would like him to do the same for me.

Mr. BLISS. You gentlemen will have an opportunity to follow me, and you can then sum it up, if you can make a consistent theory upon which to sum it up. You cannot compel me to state your matters for you. I will read, the first thing on Monday morning, the passage Mr. Wilson refers to.

Mr. MERRICK. I shall object to it.

Mr. BLISS. This is the first disagreement on our side.

The COURT. The court will allow it.

Mr. MERRICK. They do not say that Colonel Bliss has misstated it.

Mr. WILSON. I have not said a word.

The COURT. I think, gentlemen of the jury, it is too late in the trial to change our habit. We shall adjourn over until Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until Monday morning, May 7, 1883, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, MAY 7, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] In looking over the printed record, gentlemen, of what I have said to you heretofore, I discover that I have made one omission that seems to me to be with regard to a matter of sufficient importance——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Colonel Bliss, before you go on——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] I will fulfill my promise.

I refer to the endeavor, as was alleged, to suppress evidence adverse to them on the files of the department, where it might meet the eyes of unfriendly investigators. The attempt to bribe the man Abbott was mentioned. I desire to call your attention in passing, and without enlarging upon it, to a similar transaction in connection with Mr. Nephi Johnson on the Toquerville and Adairville route. The condition of things was this: That on the 12th of April, 1879, these defendants wrote there to have petitions gotten up, and that on the 10th of July they announced that the service had been increased to seven trips a week and the time reduced to thirty-three hours, although the petitions asked for forty-eight hours. Finally, on the 3d of April, 1880, we find the following letter, which is on page 982:

DEAR SIR: We have concluded to increase your pay $1,556 per annum, in order to meet the objections you have made in regard to route 41120. This action is voluntary on our part, and is intended to cover all losses on account of failure of trips or loss of time, and in future you must be expected to bear all fines and deductions. We make this allowance in order to have the service remain as it now exists, as I find that you have been writing letters to your Delegate asking to have the schedule time changed to what it was originally. If the schedule time on this route were changed back to where it formerly was, at your pay, we would lose considerably. As it is we have, of course, a small profit.

If the schedule time were changed, we certainly would endeavor to have it put back to once a week.

Hoping that you will perform the service in the future so as to avoid all fines and deductions, and further, that you will write to your Delegate asking him to withdraw all objections as to the present schedule——

You will see that they voluntarily added to his pay $1,556, that being the fractional amount necessary to carry his pay up to $10,000, and you see that they say:

As it is we have, of course, a small profit.

They were then paying Mr. Johnson $10,000, and they were receiving $20,894.22. That was the small profit. They had been paying him $8,444, and apparently they feared that he would throw up the service, and so they voluntarily added $1,556, making his total pay $10,000. They say, you see:

If the schedule time on this route were changed back to where it formerly was, at your pay, we would lose considerably.

In point of fact, if it had been changed back to where it was, instead of losing considerably, they would have been receiving $5,200 and paying out only $3,381. Not satisfied with that, or the petitions not disappearing from the files as they desired, on the 9th of May we find this paragraph in a letter:

I would like you to write at once to Mr. Cannon, asking him to withdraw his objection to the present schedule as proposed in your letter.

And any papers that may have been on file containing objections to that schedule promptly disappeared.

Now, gentlemen, at the close of my argument on Friday last Mr. Wilson called my attention to the fact that I had made a statement, as I did, that Mr. Rerdell stated that he altered an affidavit by putting in the word "twelve" in the presence of Mr. Turner, and I stated, as I believed correctly, that that was not denied by Mr. Turner. Mr. Wilson thinks that it was denied, and I therefore give him the benefit of the statement that Mr. Turner does make a general statement that he had no knowledge of the alteration of any affidavit whatever, which of course implies that he did not see it. Having made that statement, I have also to correct the other statement, and say that while Mr. Rerdell states that he made the alteration at the suggestion of Mr. Turner that they desired less time and to reduce the schedule to twelve hours, and that he says he made it in one of the rooms of the contract office, it is possible it may have been made without Mr. Turner's having seen it.

I referred on Friday to the affidavits sworn to by John W. Dorsey in Vermont on April 21 and in Washington on April 26.

Mr. WILSON. If you will allow me, I would like also to call your attention to your remarks, on page 4824, in relation to what you said about Fitzalon, Raton, and Pagosa, so that before you conclude, if you desire to do so, you can correct your statements.

Mr. BLISS. What is there that is not correct?

Mr. WILSON. The incorrectness is that you say he made retroactive orders in those cases when the record is right the other way. That is all. I simply desire to call your attention to that fact.

Mr. BLISS. If you will take the pains between this and recess to look at the record and see where I have been incorrect I will be glad to correct my remarks. My recollection still is as I stated it. Of course if you gentlemen have gotten out of the idea of summing this case up on the same principles that you kept books, grave-yard principles, and suppressing everything, it will be unnecessary to interrupt me; but if you do not propose to do it I will give you the benefit of correcting any misstatement that I may make.

Mr. WILSON. I beg your pardon. You will see I am not trying to suppress anything. I am trying to disclose something.

Mr. BLISS. I am aware of that.

I had referred to the affidavits made by John W. Dorsey on the 21st and 26th of April, as he stated, at the instigation of Rerdell, as showing to you that Mr. Dorsey was not telling the truth. It is impossible that they could have been made at the instigation of Rerdell, because Rerdell was thousands of miles away. I referred in the same connection to the fact that Mr. Rerdell swore that he sent affidavits in blank to Mr. Dorsey as well as to Mr. Peck just before he went West in April, 1879. I refer to it now merely as bearing upon a matter to which I am about to pass and to treat of with a little more accuracy than I have hitherto done. With reference to Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey I desire to call your attention briefly to this: That the oath on the Trinidad and Madison route, being 6 E, was sworn to before Kellogg by John W. Dorsey on the 26th of April, that the body was written by Kellogg, and that the word "twelve" was written by Rerdell, being the word which he states he interlined in Turner's room after the conversation with Turner, and which word appears as written over an erasure. That affidavit was filed on the 30th of April. The order was made upon it on the 9th of May. Mr. Rerdell states that as he left here to go West before it was filed, and did not return until the 5th of May, he cannot say whether the words other than the "twelve" were inserted before or after it was sworn to; but he does say that they are in the handwriting of Mr. S. W. Dorsey, and that he found the affidavit on file when he returned here on the 5th of May, and that then, at the suggestion of Turner that the department desired shortened schedule, he inserted the word "twelve" over an erasure. Mr. Boone also swears that that affidavit was filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey says he does not think it was, but he has no recollection of it whatever. That affidavit was transmitted in letter 5 E, dated the 29th of April, which is sworn to as being in Stephen W. Dorsey's handwriting, somewhat disguised, and that fact is not denied by Mr. Dorsey in any manner. You will see, gentlemen, that that affidavit having been filed while Mr. Rerdell was away would have to be altered and transmitted by somebody else; I say altered because it was filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey. The evidence is that it was transmitted by him also, and he does not deny it on the stand.

The affidavit, 22 F, on the Ojo Caliente route, was sworn to before Kellogg by John W. Dorsey on the 26th of April. The body was written by Kellogg. Boone says the filling up is in the handwriting of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, as he thinks. He does not think the signature of John W. Dorsey is genuine. Mr. John W. Dorsey also says it is not his signature, if I remember right. Mr. Rerdell says that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote the filling-up, and that he states it not from having seen it, because he did not see it. He says he states it from a knowledge of his handwriting. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey says that he has no recollection about it. He does not think he did. Gentlemen, that affidavit was transmitted in letter 19 F, which was filed on the 24th of April. The letter transmitting it is dated the 23d of April, and was filed in the department the 24th of April. Yet the affidavit itself bears date the 26th of April. Mr. Boone says that the letter of transmittal of that affidavit resembles Stephen W. Dorsey's disguised hand. Mr. Rerdell identifies it as Dorsey's disguised hand. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey says, "I don't think I did write it. I have no recollection of doing so." He fails to answer the distinct question put to him whether he will deny that he wrote the letter transmitting it. The reason for that, like the reason for the other, is that Mr. Rerdell was absent. In that case there was something peculiar. The oath, 20 F, had been prepared for a reduction to eighty hours. 22 F, which was the one acted upon, and which Stephen Dorsey filled up, was for a reduction to fifty hours. The oath, 20 F, having been prepared for eighty hours, had been sworn to by John W. Dorsey in Vermont on the 11th of March, and was all, including the filling up, in the handwriting of Rerdell, though he says the filling up of the figures was done by direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. It was transmitted to the department in the letter, 21 F, on the 16th of April, the day before Rerdell went West, and was filed the same day. The letter, 21 F, is all admittedly in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell. The condition of things, therefore, was this: That Mr. John W. Dorsey having sworn in Vermont to an affidavit looking to a reduction of eighty hours, and Mr. Rerdell having transmitted that affidavit to the department on the 16th of April and then gone West, in some way or other it was arranged between Brady and Dorsey that instead of a reduction to eighty hours there should be a reduction to fifty hours. The reduction to fifty hours required a new affidavit, and that affidavit was filed, and is 22 F. The filling up of that affidavit was stated to be in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey, and was transmitted in the letter which it is not denied that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote. The order in that case, gentlemen, was made on the 29th of April, before Mr. Rerdell returned.

They were determined to get that expedition through on the Ojo Caliente route at once. Mr. Rerdell having left on the 17th of April, and having returned here on the 5th of May, the fine work that was to be done in that case was done by Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. We find him coming to the front on that occasion. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that this was just after the admitted division of the routes. Mr. Dorsey states, and I shall have occasion to call your attention to it again, that the division was as of the 1st of April, and that it had so far gone into effect that Mr. Rerdell had been employed by him before he went West, and went West in consequence of that division. Therefore Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey had come into the sole ownership of this route at that time by his own statement, and Mr. Rerdell, the factotum, having gone West, Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey came forward and made these alterations and transmitted these papers.

25 S, the oath on the White River route, was sworn to before Kellogg on the 26th of April, 1879. The body of that affidavit was written by Kellogg, and the filling up is sworn to be by Stephen W. Dorsey. Rerdell says he does not know whether the filling up was before or after he went West. It was filed on the 26th of April, after he had gone West, and it was transmitted also in a letter written by Stephen W. Dorsey, and not denied by Stephen W. Dorsey on the stand. The filling up of this oath was not denied by Stephen W. Dorsey on the stand. The order in that case was made on the 1st of May, 1879, before Mr. Rerdell had returned, so that Mr. Rerdell could have had nothing to do with that whatever.

As to the oaths filled by Mr. Rerdell, as he alleges by direction of Dorsey, the oath on the Eugene City route, 8 I, sworn to before Taylor, in New Mexico, on the 22d of January, was filed here the 24th of May, the order being made upon the 26th of June, 1879. The body of that oath was written by Miner. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that when that oath was sworn to on the 22d of January, 1879, Rerdell, as they say, had nothing to do with this route out there. It was one of the Miner and Vaile routes. Mr. Miner tells you that Rerdell was never in their employ but seven days. Yet the body of this oath was written by Miner, and sworn to by Peck, in New Mexico, on the 22d of January, 1879, while the filling up of the oath is beyond all question Rerdell's. It was not filed until the 24th of May, 1879, after Stephen W. Dorsey had come into the sole possession of this route, and after Rerdell had become his factotum, as he states, in charge of everything, and then, as we say, or at some time after the 1st of April, that filling up was done by Mr. Rerdell. Mr. Rerdell says so, and all the facts go to show it. It was transmitted to the department in a letter dated the 24th of May, and filed on that day, which was written by Rerdell. 24 S, which is the Perkins oath on the White River route, was sworn to on the 26th of March, and was filed here on the 16th of April, before Rerdell went West. The order was made upon that, and upon the other affidavit to which I called your attention, 25 S, which Stephen W. Dorsey does not deny that he filled, and which he filed on the 26th of April.

You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that while the jacket recites that the order on the White River route was made on the oath of Perkins as subcontractor, and while Brady in his statement to Congress so said, yet the calculation turned out to be based not upon Perkins's oath, but on the oath of John W. Dorsey made subsequently. It was made upon the oath which Stephen W. Dorsey filed and filled up, and not upon the oath of Perkins which Mr. Rerdell filed before he went West. You see why, gentlemen. The oath of Perkins looked to a less period of reduction than was asked for afterwards. The oath of Perkins looked to a reduction, I think, to seventy-two hours, if that was what the petition asked for; but after Rerdell went West it was agreed between Dorsey and Brady that the reduction should be to forty-five hours, and Mr. Turner tells you on the stand he was ordered to cut the figures down, and he erased those upon the order and substituted forty-five. Then it was necessary to have another affidavit, and that was the affidavit which was filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey, and which was filed, being transmitted in a paper, the handwriting of which he does not deny, nor does he deny the filling up.

6 D was sworn to in New Mexico by Peck on the 22d of January, 1879, and was filed on the 25th of June. The order was made on the 12th of July. It was filled up by Rerdell. They say Rerdell had nothing to do with that route at that time, or with the concern at all. In some way or other before it was filed the filling up came to be in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell. Now, gentlemen, how was he at that time to do any filling up on those affidavits with regard to routes with which he had nothing to do? That was away back in January. Mr. Miner utterly failed to explain it. Mr. Rerdell stated that he filed it in June. He says he filled it up, and that it was one of the blanks that was turned over to Mr. Dorsey at the time of the separation early in April. He says that he filled it up with the percentages given him by Stephen W. Dorsey. On the other routes Stephen W. Dorsey gave him the precise figures, but in this case he gave him the percentage as from 100 to 250 per cent., I think. Mr. Dorsey says he does not think he did it; it is possible he might have done it. Then a little later on he says he is quite sure he did not do it, because Rerdell had general power to do everything. Miner says that the filling up looks like Rerdell's writing; that the body is his own, and he does not know when it was filled up. It was transmitted by Rerdell in 3 D on the 23d of June, and filed on the 25th of June, and yet the affidavit purports to have been made away back in the preceding January.

The oath on the Silverton route is a Dorsey oath, sworn to in blank on the 21st of April, and filed here the 6th of May, the day after Rerdell got back. The order was made on the 12th of June. The body of the oath is all in Rerdell's handwriting. He says he filled it up by Stephen W. Dorsey's direction after he came back from the West. It was transmitted on the 5th of May in a letter written by Rerdell. As to this oath, Mr. Dorsey on the stand makes no denial whatever.

The oath, 4 O, on the Tres Alamos route, is another of Dorsey's oaths, sworn to like the last by Dorsey in Vermont on the 21st of April, and filed on the 8th of May. The order was made on it on the 3d of June. Rerdell says that it was filled up by him by Stephen Dorsey's direction after he returned here on the 5th of May. It was transmitted to the department, on the 7th of May, in a letter admittedly written by Rerdell. As to these blank affidavits, Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey says, on page 3936, that when they made the division early in April he does not know whether they divided the blank affidavits or not. Mr. John W. Dorsey says he would not say he did not swear in blank. Rerdell testifies that he did receive blank affidavits, and that he did get instructions from Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Miner swears that they passed over to him for his routes, before the division, two affidavits which, I think, I shall be able to show you were filled up after the division. All these affidavits that I have called your attention to are upon routes which Stephen W. Dorsey admittedly took at the division in April, 1879. All the orders were made after the division, and were all, therefore, for Dorsey's admitted benefit. While Rerdell was here, prior to the 17th of April, the filling up of all the affidavits—for instance, the affidavit on the Eugene City route, and the Perkins affidavit on the White River route, and after he got back, on the 5th of May, the filling up of the affidavits on the Toquer-ville route, the Silverton route, and Tres Alamos route are all in his handwriting, because he was here and could do the business. Between the time Rerdell left here, and the time Rerdell got back here, all the affidavits transmitted upon these routes were filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey, and the letters transmitting them were written by Stephen W. Dorsey.

As to Mr. Dorsey's presence, I think Mr. Dorsey himself swears that he was in Washington from December, 1878, until early in March, 1879, and until after the interview with Vaile, when Vaile came on here, and was so determined to see him and refused to go on with him. I shall show you that Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, after they had had some negotiations, was summoned West by the sickness of Mr. Peck, and went to New Mexico. He says he returned here early in April. Mr. Dorsey is located by a letter written from Kansas City on the 9th of April. Mr. Rerdell seems to be of the opinion that that letter was written when Mr. Dorsey was on his way out there. I think all the circumstances show that that is an error, and that Mr. Dorsey is right when he says it was written while he was on his way back, and he arrived here on the 12th of April. Having arrived here on the 12th of April, he left on the 18th or 19th of May and returned on the 21st of June. He left on the 27th or 28th of June, and returned on the 6th or 7th of July, staid here a few days, then went away and returned here for a day or two in the fall, probably in October. Then he says he was not here again until August, 1880, which was the time of the interview at Chamberlin's with Brady and Bosler. That is Mr. Dorsey's statement, and I do not find anything in the evidence seriously contradicting that statement, except Mr. Rerdell's statement as to when the Kansas City letter was written. Mr. Dorsey tells you that his interest in the routes commenced on the 1st of April, and that he employed Rerdell in April to take charge of the business and turned it all over to him, and that it was in consequence of that that Mr. Rerdell went West on the 17th of April, 1879. Prior to that time, however, Vaile, Miner & Co. had the routes, and Mr. Dorsey had nothing to do with them.

Now, calling your attention to the dates, it seems to me pertinent and proper to call your attention to some other facts. The division, as I have said, took place as of the 1st of April, 1879. There were then set off to Mr. Dorsey twelve routes of those included in this indictment, Vaile, Miner & Co. took either four or five, one having been previously transferred to Mr. Sanderson. Dorsey having taken these routes in April, about the middle of April, during Rerdell's absence, increase of trips and expedition were ordered on two of the routes which passed to Mr. Dorsey, the route from Trinidad to Madison and the route from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, the aggregate increase being $4,526.92.

In May, 1879, increase or expedition, or both, were ordered upon two of Mr. Dorsey's routes, to wit, the White River and the Trinidad, and the amount there added in those two routes was $14,764.25.

In June, 1879, Dorsey still being here, expedition and increase of trips took place upon four of the routes, to wit, the Greenhorn, Silverton, Tres Alamos, and the Eugene City, and the aggregate amount upon those routes was $49,556.13.

Then in July, increase and expedition were ordered upon three other of Mr. Dorsey's routes, to wit, the Toquerville, Mineral Park, and Rosita, and the aggregate upon those three was $54,883.54.

So that in the brief period, gentlemen, of three months after Mr. S. W. Dorsey came into possession of the twelve routes—one of them being the Ouray route, upon which there was never any pretense of an increase—there were orders for expedition or increase of trips, or both, upon ten of the twelve. I said Mr. Dorsey took twelve routes on the division; Vaile and Miner took six, which makes eighteen; the Saguache route had previously been transferred to Sanderson, which makes nineteen. The Ouray route passed to Mr. Dorsey. It never was the subject of any order, so far as this evidence shows, except that away down in the fall of 1880, I think it was, Mr. Brady finally regarded the remonstrance of the postmaster, made to him a year or more previous, showing that there was a duplicate service over the same route; then he changed it. The claim on the other side is—though I do not think it is borne out—that the Ouray route had passed to Sanderson, and therefore that practically Mr. Dorsey did not have that. If he did not have that, then there were orders for increase or expedition, within that brief period of three months, upon ten of his eleven routes.

When the service commenced, gentlemen, on the 1st of July, 1878, the pay on those twelve routes was $14,287.34. On five of those routes there had been, before Mr. Dorsey became the sole owner, either increase of trips or expedition, or some post-office added, which had made a considerable addition. But the total pay of $14,287.34 had been carried up to $30,362.98, and more than four-fifths of that increase had been upon the Mineral Park route in the preceding December. In three months the pay on those routes ran up to $154,094.82.

And you will observe, gentlemen, that every one of these orders was made during a period when Mr. Dorsey was here, or going and returning. Nearly all of them were made during the period that Mr. Dorsey was here. Two of them, I think, were made when Mr. Rerdell was absent; and they were made at a time, gentlemen, when, you will bear in mind, Mr. Dorsey was not in the Senate. He was here, with no apparent business except to attend to this mail business; and I think you will all agree with me that he was in a pretty profitable business when in three months the pay ran up, on routes which had been let at $14,000, to that amount.

Then, if you take his own story, all that he had paid was $20,000—$10,000 to Peck and $10,000 to John W. Dorsey, and he had secured a bad debt besides. He had only paid $20,000, and in addition had secured a bad debt, and yet these routes ran up to $154,094.82. And bear in mind, gentlemen, that that $154,094.82 is just that amount for a year, and if the contracts had been continued at that rate under the administration which succeeded Brady, the result would have been that Dorsey would have received from those routes during the contract term nearly half a million dollars on his alleged little investment of $10,000 to Peck and $10,000 to John W. Dorsey.

But, gentlemen, Mr. Dorsey left here, he says, in July, 1879, and did not return, except for a single day, until August, 1880, and the result, during that entire period of Mr. Dorsey's absence, is that there is no expedition upon any of his routes. He was here in August, 1880, and then went away, and returned in February and March. In August, 1880, there was an addition of $17,964 upon the Redding and Alturas route, which was another of the routes which he took in the division. But that addition was only a restoration of the same amount which had been cut off in April, 1880, upon the Congressional investigation, and during Mr. Dorsey's absence, and when he came back, in August, it was promptly restored.

Mr. Dorsey was here, as I say, in August, 1880, and then we find this transaction: This interview took place with Brady at Chamberlin's on the 16th of August, 1880, and if I remember correctly, Mr. Rerdell testified that Dorsey indicated to him that the subject of remissions was then up. We find that on the 16th of August there was an application made for remission of fines and reductions on the Silverton route. There is also an application made for remission of fines and deductions on the Ojo Caliente route on the same day. A week afterwards Powers is written to to get up affidavits for remissions on the Eugene City route. These are all Dorsey's routes, and that letter is in the record; and, as I have said, coincident with these things is this restoration of the $17,964 upon the Redding and Alturas route.

Dorsey goes away in August, 1880, and says he does not come here again until about the time of the inauguration of General Garfield, March 4, 1881. We find his arrival promptly emphasized by the fact that in February and March, 1881, increases and expeditions were granted on four of his routes to the amount of $58,224.34, those routes being the Tres Alamos, White River, Ojo Caliente, and the Redding route.

Now, therefore, gentlemen, before this bubble burst, after Mr. Dorsey, on the 1st of April, 1879, took possession of twelve routes, which when they were originally let were let for the sum of $20,275.34, and which, when he took them were being run at a cost to the Government of $39,354.98, before the 10th of March, 1881, in less than two years, Mr. Dorsey had run them up by some sixteen orders, all made coincident or nearly coincident with his presence here, to $230,283.06. Where they would have gone to no one knows, except for the honesty of the administration which came into power, except for the honesty of the two men, MacVeagh and James, against whom Mr. Dorsey patched up Mr. Rerdell's affidavit, by his own confession, in order to make the pretense of removing those gentlemen from the Cabinet—a gentleman under accusation of crime of defrauding the Government in this way admittedly patched up the affidavit of Mr. Rerdell, addressed it to the President, admittedly went to the President with it, and then had the impudence to come here and malign the character of General Garfield by saying that upon that affidavit of an accused man, instead of seeking a trial, he would have removed two members of his Cabinet. Why, gentlemen, it is part of the impudence which characterized these gentlemen through a considerable portion of the preliminary stages of this investigation; a part of the impudence which led Mr. Dorsey upon the stand here to compare himself with the man whom he had educated, the man whom he had used, the man who had served him faithfully, had done all sorts of dirty things at his instigation to put money into his pocket, and say that he, Dorsey, was the elephant and Rerdell the pismire. Just think of the impudence, gentlemen, of this man going to Garfield, after this investigation had been stirred up, after newspaper attention had been attracted to it, after it was alleged and after it was proved that the Government had been by some means and by somebody defrauded of a large amount of money, and so misunderstanding his character as to say that he believes that he could have induced Garfield to remove two members of his Cabinet because he presented to him the affidavit of a man who, according to his own statement, he, Dorsey, had brought up, had led to infamy, and who, according to his own statement, had stated that MacVeagh had told a lie, and he believed, or pretends to believe, that upon that Mr. Garfield would have removed Mr. MacVeagh.

Now, gentlemen, that was the condition of things. Mr. Dorsey took those routes. Promptly after he took them they commenced mounting up, until, before he was detected, he had got them up, as I have said, to the sum of over $230,000 a year, which would have taken from the Treasury for the remainder of the time the contracts were to run, if I remember correctly, about $580,000. That is the connection of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey with this case, so far as the pecuniary, the pocket argument is concerned.

We have heard, gentlemen, in this case, a good deal about books. A good deal of time has been devoted to books. I refer to the books which Mr. Rerdell says he kept. I am not now referring to those books, but to the letters, to the check books, to all those books which are admittedly in their possession and which they have not dared to produce here.

They come here, gentlemen, and say to you that they have produced all the checks, and yet, in point of fact, there are two checks unaccounted for in one series, and then there is a break from somewhere in 200 down to No. 500. And yet they undertake to tell you that they have produced all their checks. They were allowed by the court to introduce all that they put in, on the agreement that they would show where the missing ones were, but they have never pretended to carry out that agreement, and those missing ones stand to-day unaccounted for.

And not only that, but they undertook to say that there could not have been any check to J. B. B., because they said they had not produced any checks to J. B. B. They did not dare to produce the check-book and let us see whether there was any entry there of a check to J. B. B. They said boldly that there was not any; that they never drew any check to J. B. B. I do not know whether it got into the record, but Mr. Dorsey sat by his counsel and undertook to say that there was no check to J. B. B., and at another time Mr. Dorsey offered to give $1,000 for the production of any such check, well knowing, of course, that if he had drawn any such check, it could not be in anybody's possession but his own. He said he had never drawn such a check to J. B. B., and yet there came on the stand here a judge from Colorado, whose character nobody dares to impugn, and he said distinctly that there was drawn and delivered to him by Stephen W. Dorsey a check to J. B. B. Rerdell swore that the check was for $2,000. This judge says that he will not undertake to say precisely the amount of the check, but it was about $2,000; and they could not in any way get him to vary from that statement, either as to the date of the transaction of drawing the check (which, I think, was in June, 1879), or as to the amount; and they did not contradict him.

Mr. WILSON. Had it anything to do with mail?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson asks me if it had anything to do with mail. I say I do not know. Mr. Dorsey told Rerdell that it had, and told him to charge it up to mail account. If you had produced the stubs, we should have seen whether Rerdell was right in saying that it was charged to mail on the stub. If Mr. S. W. Dorsey charged the Colorado debt to mail account, and thereby cheated his partner; if Mr. Bosler was at that time his partner, it simply does not concern us or this case. But the essential point is this: Was there a check for $2,000 drawn to the order of J. B. B.? Rerdell says there was, because he says he saw the stub, and I think he says, also, that he saw the check, and they do not dare to produce the stubs of the check-book. If they had done that, and it was found to not contain what he said it did, it would have overwhelmed Rerdell in disgrace, showing that he had lied upon the stand. I submit that you cannot, gentlemen, as honest men, familiar with the world, knowing how people act and how they argue, by any possibility help inferring that the book of stubs, if produced, would have confirmed Mr. Rerdell's statement and shown that it appeared there that the check to J. B. B. was charged to mail account.

I said that a good deal has been said about these books that Rerdell kept. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that the pertinency of those books only comes into importance in this connection: Mr. Rerdell states that Mr. Dorsey gave him a certain memorandum from which to make certain entries, and he produced what he said was that memorandum. He said that he opened a set of books in the middle of May, 1879, just after he had returned from the West and just after Mr. Dorsey had become the sole owner of these ten routes, and not only sole owner of them, but owning a portion of the other one hundred and ten routes. He says he opened certain books, making certain entries from that memorandum, and he appeals to those books as showing that that was a transaction made at that time. Therefore that is the pertinency of those books. Now, let us see briefly the evidence as to that.

If Mr. Rerdell's statement^s is correct, the memorandum in connection with a conversation which he says he had with Dorsey subsequently of course brings home the direct admission by Dorsey of the payment of money to Brady. That is the statement. Now, gentlemen, after the evidence you have had in this case is not that fact probable? When you reflect upon what Brady did; when you reflect how Brady did it; when you reflect on the principles or want of principles which he says guided him in his action; when you remember all those things done for the benefit of Stephen W. Dorsey; when you remember this two hundred and fifty thousand odd dollars of increases in the brief period of three months, is it not probable that Mr. Dorsey's statement to Rerdell that he was paying Brady (who, you will remember, told Walsh he was not making expedition for fun) was a correct statement? In connection with that statement you will bear in mind that we find Mr. Rerdell's letter in the spring of 1880 to Mr. Bosler. He refers also to a tabular statement and to some other facts, and the books and the statement of what is in the books become pertinent in connection with those things.

Now, as to this memorandum. When evidence was first given in this case by Rerdell's statements as to the existence of those books, there was for a considerable time apparently on the other side no disposition to deny the existence of the books, but simply to put themselves back on their reserved rights and to urge that they would not produce them. We went on for several days, the counsel on the other side stating that they would not produce them, with no intimation that the books were not in their possession, until, by and by, when we disclosed the fact that Mr. Donnelly (the chosen friend of Mr. Dorsey, the man who had done his writing for him, and who was doing his writing for him down to a time after this transaction commenced; who was on such terms with him that he borrowed money of him) had seen such a set of books as Mr. Rerdell said he kept, when we disclosed that Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs had seen such a set of books as Rerdell said he kept, then it became necessary apparently to change front, and they undertook to say that they never heard of any such books. But it was not, gentlemen, as I recollect, until that was the condition of the evidence that we heard anything from them, except that they were not going to produce the books; that they were not going to help us, and things of that sort.

There was another reason, perhaps, why it would not do to deny the existence of the books. Because this memorandum starts out in its very first entry—I think it is the very first one—by showing payments of $10,000 to Peck and $10,000 to John W. Dorsey by Stephen W. Dorsey, payments which he admits he made. And yet, gentlemen, if Rerdell was not keeping books for Stephen W. Dorsey, why was he in possession of a memorandum admittedly the first part of which was in his handwriting, and which stated those payments to Peck and to John W. Dorsey? Those are facts which Mr. Rerdell had no possible means of knowing except from Mr. Dorsey. It seems not to be denied now that everything in that memorandum down to the words “profit and loss” was written by Mr. Dorsey. The claim is that what there is below it was written by somebody else. They want to intimate that it was written by Mr. Rerdell, and yet I think no one on the stand goes far enough to say that squarely. Mr. Rerdell says squarely that it was written by Mr. Dorsey.

Mr. Hill, the witness that Mr. Dorsey produced here, says that all down to “profit and loss” was written by Stephen W. Dorsey, and if it was not for other circumstances known to him he should think all the rest was. Then he is asked as to the initials “M. C. R.,” and says he cannot say, but he don’t think Dorsey wrote “M. C. R.” This is the witness, Hill, who was produced to testify as to the memorandum. What was his experience? On being cross-examined he identifies squarely as Kellogg’s handwriting a letter which, beyond all dispute, was written by Rerdell. I showed him the letter, and on page 3683 he says:

Q. In whose handwriting is the body of the letter?—A. I think, without any doubt, it is Mr. Kellogg’s handwriting.

Then he paddles back:

I don’t know positively whose handwriting it is.

Q. You think that is Mr. Kellogg’s?—A. I can’t say positively.

There had been, in the mean time, a little by-play, not in evidence—some suggestion passing between counsel that that letter was Rerdell’s. Then he paddles back:

Q. In point of fact, is not that Mr. Rerdell’s handwriting?—A. I don’t know whether it is or not.

Q. You know Mr. Rerdell’s handwriting?—A. I do tolerably well.

* * * * *

Q. Did you not say when you saw the letters “M. C. R.” in the memorandum that you thought they were Rerdell’s?—A. I did not.

Q. What did you say?—A. I said that he could have written them.

Q. And you do not know whether they are Mr. Rerdell’s or not?—A. I did not say that I knew.

Q. I am asking that very question now.—A. I don’t know whether they are his or not.

He says his doubt is because the “M. C. R.” is in imitation of Mr. Dorsey’s hand. A man not sufficiently familiar with Rerdell’s handwriting to distinguish it from Kellogg’s says that the “M. C. R.” looks like Dorsey’s handwriting. In other words, it is an imitation. He is asked, at page 3685:

Q. Having sworn that without any doubt it is Kellogg’s handwriting, do you now swear that it is Mr. Rerdell’s?—A. Well, Mr. Bliss, when I say anything is in any one’s handwriting I would say so without putting in the words “without any doubt.”

He had said before:

Q. In whose handwriting is the body of the letter?—A. I think, without any doubt, it is Mr. Kellogg’s handwriting.

But when he is going to say that the paper is in the handwriting of any one he is not going to use the words "without any doubt." He says it is in Kellogg's handwriting, but if he has any doubt on the subject he puts in the words "without any doubt!" So much for Hill upon that paper.

I then went on and showed him the Haycock letter, which Mr. Dorsey on the stand admitted was his, and Mr. Hill promptly said it was not Mr. Dorsey's. I showed him the Clendenning letter, and he did not think that was Mr. Dorsey's. Mr. Dorsey, of course, admitted it on the stand. I showed him a letter written to Nephi Johnson, which was also subsequently admitted to be Mr. Dorsey's handwriting, and he said squarely that that was not in Mr. Dorsey's handwriting. I showed him a letter written May 5, about getting a new subcontract, which letter Dorsey admitted he had written to Brady (10 F), and he said he was very doubtful about that. By the time he got down to that point he thought it was better to be doubtful. But when I showed him 40 F and 41 F, which were the pencil forms of petitions sent by Mr. Dorsey to Mr. Joseph out in New Mexico—remember that the memorandum was in pencil also—those forms being indisputably in the handwriting of Mr. Dorsey, he said squarely that Mr. Dorsey did not write those. Those were pencilings, just as the memorandum was upon which he had undertaken to express an opinion as to the handwriting, and there is where he landed. He says also that the memorandum pinned to the form of bonds sent to Clendenning, and which Mr. Dorsey admitted was his, was not Mr. Dorsey's. He says that he doubts whether the letter to Paddock was Dorsey's, though Dorsey admits it was his; he subsequently says he thinks Dorsey wrote it. Hill says as to the guarantee to the Steineger contract on the Silverton and Parrott City route that that is not Mr. Dorsey's, though Mr. Dorsey says it is.

Gentlemen, Mr. Hill was involved in a great many further contradictions, but all that it is necessary now to do is to give you those, to show how reliable he was as a witness to prove that Mr. Dorsey did not write this memorandum, or that he wrote the first part of it and did not write the last of it? The plain truth, gentlemen, is that they had to admit that the first part of that memorandum was in Mr. Dorsey's handwriting, because, in the first place, it was so unmistakably his, and in the second place, it contained statements which could have proceeded from nobody except Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey being protected by the unfortunate condition of his eyes—which I notice within a few days has entirely disappeared, and he is here without any glasses, and able to see; I congratulate him upon it—Mr. Dorsey being protected by the unfortunate condition of his eyes from looking at the papers himself, puts on the stand his chosen assistants and workmen, Mr. Hill and Mr. Kellogg. I have shown you to what condition Mr. Hill arrived, and I do not wonder that during the course of his cross-examination his honor burst out with the statement that it was clear he did not know the handwriting.

Mr. MERRICK. That was Kellogg.

Mr. BLISS. One or the other of them.

Now, Mr. Kellogg, I think, carried the writing of Dorsey one line further down than Hill, if I remember aright. I think Hill and Kellogg varied it a line as to the part of the memorandum written by Dorsey; that is my impression. At any rate, Mr. Kellogg is very sure that he did not write the words "profit and loss;" that he wrote the word "cash," and all the words down to "profit and loss," but did not write the words "profit and loss," and did not write below that. He says he cannot say as to the initials "M. C. R.;" he did not know about that. He is shown the letter to Paddock. He refers incidentally somewhere to some matter of the misspelling of Rerdell's name, and says that influences him a good deal, because he thinks Dorsey would know how to spell Rerdell's name. Then I showed him a letter to Paddock, in which Rerdell was written in just the same way as the other, and then he said he was not positive about it; he could not say. Hill had been on the stand, and the school of positive philosophers was reduced in numbers. I showed him the Routt letter; he could not say about that. Mind you, the letters were admittedly written by Dorsey, and in both of them Rerdell was spelled in the way which he thought Dorsey never would have spelled it. As to the instructions annexed to the bonds sent to Clendenning, he did not know, he said. As to the Haycock letter he said he could not say as to the signature; the body, he says, looked like Dorsey's, and he gets himself considerably in doubt as to the whole lot of them before he gets through. His condition is this: After one after the other had been shown him, and he had got wise from the turn of the "y's," and he had got the quirk of the "q," and talked about the "e's"—he was talking about "e's," but he was very uneasy—his summing up of these three papers, 18 X, 33 X, and 37 X was something like this: As to 37 X he is not sure that it has got any more quirl; he does not know how many quirls are necessary to make a "y."

Q. To make a "y" you do not know how many quirls are necessary?—A. It don't look very much like "y," anyway.

Q. Did he write his "y's" so that they did not look like "y"?—A. They look more like "q" than "y."

Q. According to the quirl I suppose you mean a queue at the back of the head. Look at that third one, and tell me the difference between that and the other two?—A. There is a very great difference.

Q. Now, take all three of them, 18 X, 33 X, and 37 X, and tell me your opinion about them. First, what is your opinion as to whether Mr. Dorsey wrote those papers or not?—A. In this one, the "y" in this name is more like his writing.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the "y" on 33 X.

The WITNESS. The rest of the name on these two looks more like his writing than that does there.

Mr. MERRICK. That is 37 X and 18 X.

Q. How about the general appearance of the bodies of the letters?—A. Well, sir, that letter would strike me as being more like his writing.

Mr. MERRICK. That is 18 X.

Q. How about 37 X?—A. That looks very much like that one, as if it might be written by the same person.

Q. How about 33 X?—A. I should question that somewhat as to its being his writing.

That is what he said as to three papers before him at the same time, and all of them subsequently admitted by Mr. Dorsey as being in his handwriting. That is the expert; that is the man familiar with the handwriting of Mr. Dorsey whom they put upon the stand to give evidence as to this memorandum. They could not have the benefit of Mr. Dorsey's own eyes, so they got the benefit of Mr. Hill and Mr. Kellogg, and there they stopped. I do not know why it was, but my friend Henkle would not even lend them Mr. Waugh to do a little swearing as to handwriting. And there it was—with this whole broad land available to them, with all the information available to them as to Mr. Dorsey's handwriting, the people who were familiar with it, Mr. Torrey, Mr. Donnelly, and others, they put no witness on the stand except Mr. Hill and Mr. Kellogg to say that that was not the handwriting of Mr. Dorsey in that whole memorandum.

But let us go a little further, gentlemen. This memorandum (31 X) reads as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, ———, 187—.

Accounts.	Cash loaned.	Dors.	Peck.
S. W. D., Cr.....	$10,500	$10,000	$10,000
Expense.....
Cash.....
Profit and loss.....
J. H. Mitchell.....

And J. H. Mitchell's name is in that part of the memorandum which they say that Mr. Dorsey did not write. Why did they not produce Mr. J. H. Mitchell here, an ex-Senator, whose name appears all over the Eugene City and Bridge Creek petitions, and appears all over The Dalles and Baker City petitions, I think it is, who goes, as appears by the records, personally to the department to ask an increase upon these routes? Why did they not produce Mr. Mitchell to show that he never had any dealings with Stephen W. Dorsey; that he had nothing to do with the mail service; that there was no reason why his name, the name of a Senator of the United States, you remember, a fellow-Senator of Mr. Dorsey's, should appear upon the books containing the mail accounts of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey? Mr. Mitchell was here in court several times; Mr. Mitchell was here in obedience to the subpoena of the court. He was not put upon the stand. Why did they not produce him if he had been able to say, "I never had any money from Mr. Dorsey. There was no propriety, no sense in putting my name in books which related to Mr. Dorsey's mail service." Would not that memorandum in that case have received a good deal worse black eye than anything that Mr. Hill or Mr. Kellogg could have given it? It would be absurd to suppose that Mr. Dorsey was at that time going through the idle form of giving a memorandum to Rerdell to open an account with a man with whom he had never had any financial dealings. Mr. Mitchell was not produced. If Mr. Dorsey wrote the first part of this memorandum, how came it into the possession of Mr. Rerdell. If Mr. Rerdell was keeping no books for him, what was Mr. Rerdell doing with a memorandum which is obviously intended to be an abstract of a statement of accounts. If it is true, as Mr. Dorsey tells you, that Mr. Rerdell was keeping no books for him, why would he not produce them? Bear in mind, gentlemen, that as to that Mr. Dorsey withholds the check-book, withholds the letter-books, withholds the stubs, and then asks you to say that this memorandum is not genuine. Half of it is substantially admitted to be in his handwriting.

But, gentlemen, there is conclusive evidence—and here is where the books come in—that that memorandum is of no recent creation, to say the least. The books which Rerdell kept were made from it, and contained the entries in this case, beyond all question. On the evidence here there cannot be any dispute that there was in existence a set of books as long ago as the spring of 1880, which contained entries made from that memorandum, and those books were in the handwriting and keeping of M. C. Rerdell, whom Mr. Dorsey tells you, from the middle of April, 1879, he left in entire charge of his mail business, such entire charge that he turned papers over to him, and he cannot say whether among those papers were blank affidavits or not.

Now, as to these books, as I said when they were first referred to, there was no intimation that the other side had not possession of them, and they never dared, though we challenged them, and called their attention to the fact that the rule of law required that if they wanted to discharge themselves from liability, the rule required them to tell, under oath, that they had not any such books, and then they would be free from any presumption of that kind. They never dared to state under oath that they had not those books. They have not, up to this moment, dared to state under oath, I think, that those books are not in their possession, certainly not in the form that the rule requires. I say, "I think," because it is just possible that Mr. Dorsey may have upon the stand said something upon that subject which I do not now recall. However that may be, after we disclosed the existence of these witnesses who would establish the existence of the books beyond all question, then the position changes; then the position was not that they had the books and would not give them to us, but that they had never heard of them; that they were perfectly astonished; that that was the first time they had ever heard of any such books. As I recollect it, there was an adjournment over Sunday, and perhaps an interval of four or five days, and then they say, "We never heard of any such books; it is perfectly astonishing that anybody should suppose that any such books ever existed." Rerdell swears that he kept such books, and opened them in May, 1879. He swears distinctly that he got them at a certain place, of a certain well-known stationer in this city, Mr. Ballantyne. Why did they not put Mr. Ballantyne on the stand, if it was not true, and prove that Mr. Rerdell lied about that? If Mr. Rerdell was not keeping books for Mr. Dorsey at that time, which was the time that he commenced service for Mr. Dorsey upon this mail business (after the 5th of May, 1879, when he returned from the West), why was Mr. Rerdell buying books? Why did not Mr. Dorsey produce the account of Mr. Rerdell, showing that Mr. Rerdell did not at that time charge to him (Dorsey), as I am confident that he said on the stand he did, the purchase-money of those books?

Those accounts we gave them notice to produce. They did not produce them. Mr. Rerdell says that he kept those books. Mr. Donnelly was recalled and was examined, at page 4389. There had been a question as to whether a certain charge should be $25 or 25 cents, arising out of a matter of interest. Then came his answer saying that it should have been charged as $25 and not as 25 cents, because it was a matter of interest on a note at Lewis Johnson & Co.'s, as you will see from this memorandum (94 X):

		Crdt. bills payable.	Chge. S. W. D.
Note due 28th Oct.....	3000.....	P. O. D.....	$37107.....327. 50
Charges	25.....	do.....	$38151.....378. 12
	3025.....	do.....	44140.....1500

44140 was the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, which Mr. Dorsey took.

Dep. by Rerdell, 46255—

Referring to the route—

422—

Rerdell was then in the position that he was depositing Mr. Dorsey's money for him. Then again:

Balance, 869.01, P. O. D., 44140—

Bridge Creek again—

1,266.39.

The footing is $3,894.01 on both sides, and then comes this memorandum:

You will find this entered on page 52 of the journal, except interest & note.

Away back at that time Torrey was having trouble with the books, books which Mr. Torrey wants you to believe he never saw. At that time Mr. Donnelly, who had written a copy of the book that was in Mr. Torrey's possession, is called upon to reconcile it. Mr. Torrey says that he did write to Mr. Rerdell asking him for an explanation about it. Mr. Rerdell went to Mr. Donnelly and Mr. Donnelly said, "Why, this is the explanation, and you will find it on page 52 of the journal." And yet they want you to believe that no such journal existed; that no such books existed.

With reference to these books Rerdell says he bought them and began them in May, 1879. That, of course, was just after he took full charge of the service. He says, at page 2252, that Mr. Dorsey gave him this memorandum and told him to make up an entry.

Q. Now, after receiving this paper and opening an account on those books—transcribing this paper to those books—did you have any conversation with S. W. Dorsey about William Smith?

Being one of the names on the memorandum—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state that conversation.—A. The conversation, as near as I can remember it, was this: He asked me if I had charged Brady with a certain amount, naming it. I want to explain why I cannot remember which amount it was. It was one of three amounts, because there were three of them. It was either $5,000, $6,500, or $7,000. My impression is, though I will not be positive about it at all, that it was $7,000. I replied, "No; there is no account against Brady." He said, "Well, damn it, William Smith; I thought you knew who William Smith stood for."

That is Rerdell's statement, that Dorsey gave him that shortly after the opening of the books, about the middle of May. Mr. Dorsey remained here off and on until July, 1879, and then says he left and did not return till August, 1880, save for a single day or two in October or November in the fall. The Congressional investigation was in the spring of 1880. At that time Mr. Rerdell states that he had a conversation with Mr. Brady. I read from page 2268:

A. I had just been subpoenaed to appear before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, which was then making an investigation into the star-route matters. That was a subpoena duces tecum. I went down to the Post-Office Department—

Remember, gentlemen, in the spring of 1880 Dorsey was West and the business had then been transferred in a great measure, so far as its active management was concerned, to Bosler, and Bosler was at Carlisle, Pennsylvania—and told General Brady that I had been subpoenaed to bring all books and papers. He asked me what was the nature of the books that I had. I told him that I had some account-books. He remarked that Dorsey was a damned fool for keeping books—

More grave-yard principles. Mr. Brady thought business should be conducted upon grave-yard principles—and says, "What size are they? How much is in a book?" I said, "They are not very voluminous." (This is the purport—I am giving the general substance of the conversation, and the words, so far as I can remember.) "Well," he says, "can they be copied, or are they too long to be copied—too much to be copied?" I said, "No," I thought not. He said, "How long would it take?" I remarked, "Probably a day or two; may be longer."

Q. What else did he say then?—A. "Well," he says, "I think that will be a good idea." That ended our interview.

Q. Did you tell him what was in the books, or what was the general character of what was in the books?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to that. What was the conversation?

The COURT. He inquired what was the character of the books, and now he is asking what he said to General Brady in answer.

Mr. MERRICK. [To the witness.] Go on.

The WITNESS. He did ask me as to the nature of the books, and my answer was guarded. I remember very well, because I did not want—I will not give my reason. I said yes, there were some charges that would require explanation—entries.

Q. Was that all?—A. That was all that I can recall now.

Q. What did you do in pursuance of the direction or advice thus given to you by General Brady as to copying the books?

Before I read you what he did in pursuance of that direction, let me recur again to a letter to which I have already called your attention in another connection. It is a letter to Bosler, dated the 22d of May, 1880, and it is on page 2622:

DEAR SIR: Yours of yesterday to hand, with inclosure for $500 of Steele to start West, and he will go to-night.

I have already called your attention to the fact that it would have been easy for Mr. Dorsey to have put Mr. Bosler on the stand and to have brought here the account with which he settled with Bosler, and shown whether it was true that Mr. Bosler sent that $500. As far as Steele is concerned Mr. Dorsey stated that he employed him as a traveling agent. He could have put him on the stand and asked him if he received that $500.

On last night I was subpoenaed to go before the Appropriation Committee to-day at 10.30 a. m., and "to bring all books and papers relating to star mail-route contracts belonging to S. W. Dorsey." I immediately telegraphed you to that effect, asking "what I should do." I am now just in receipt of your reply, saying no harm could come of the books being made public.

Obviously Bosler had not been permitted to see the books at that time.

In this we all here think very different, and for the following reasons:

Who was meant by "all here?" Dorsey was not here. Rerdell was here and Brady was here. Who is meant by "all here?"

First. The books would show very large profits—

Is not that true, gentlemen? Have I not shown you that the books would show large profits and that at that time Dorsey's routes alone had been run up to two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars? I have shown you that the amounts they paid the subcontractors left them very large profits.

and would be used by the committee as an additional argument that all expedited routes should be readvertised and relet.

2d. There are several entries giving D. credit for large cash payments made to John Smith and Saml. Jones.

Smith and Jones, the men named in this memorandum, and Smith being the person whom Mr. Dorsey with an oath interpreted as being Mr. Brady.

3d. I understand the committee will try to show that he had an interest in mail routes before last April.

Perhaps if they had pursued that investigation a little further than they did a good portion of this trial might have been saved.

I appeared before the committee this morning and got excused until Monday morning; but before doing so I drew up an answer, after getting advice of counsel, that I could not produce the books and papers asked for until I had consulted with Mr.

Dorsey. This answer I shall hand to the committee on Monday, and endeavor by every means to delay any examination until I hear from Dorsey.

Gentlemen, Mr. Dorsey would not let us see these books that he admittedly settled with Bosler by, in order to ascertain whether there was not an item for counsel fees there.

There is much more in this than you think, and I would like to hear from you about it. Genl. B. is very much alarmed, and he and I had a long conversation to-day, during which he made several valuable suggestions, which I shall follow.

I will not produce the books until advised by you or Dorsey to do so, as I shall claim that I am his attorney, and as such am not required to divulge confidential matters.

Now, that letter, gentlemen, was torn from Dorsey's letter-book, pages 358, 359, and 360. Admittedly those pages are gone from that letter-book. They will not produce the letter-book. They will not even let us look at the index under the letter B to see whether the letter that was on those pages was not a letter to James W. Bosler. Is it not perfectly clear that Mr. Rerdell did at that time write such a letter to Mr. Bosler? Is it not perfectly clear, gentlemen, that he had the conversation which he testifies on the stand here he did have with General Brady? He states in that letter a conversation with General B. He states here on the stand the conversation. Now, are you going to believe that away back in the spring of 1880, Mr. Rerdell, who was the chosen friend, the "upright man," as Mr. Dorsey certified him to be, and whom Dorsey says he left in charge of all his business, and whom he tells you he continued to employ down to the close of the contract term, which was in August, 1882—that this man was at that time engaged in getting up a bogus conversation with Mr. Brady, and that he was engaged in getting up a bogus set of books to be produced at some future time for the purpose of bringing consternation upon Mr. Dorsey and of covering him with disgrace. If Mr. Rerdell had been engaged in that business was there ever so good a time as to have produced those books before that committee? He had the copies made, and he had the genuine books, as he says. We shall show you that he had, and that he got the bogus copies made at that time. Why could he not have produced the genuine books before the committee at that time if he was then conceiving in his breast the idea of making up such a story for the purpose, in some way at some future time, no man knew how nor when, of using it against Mr. Dorsey? Bear in mind, gentlemen, that here was an investigation going actively on. There never was so good a time as then to do a thing of that kind if anybody wanted to betray Mr. Dorsey. And yet all this was done and kept back through one long trial, and produced upon this trial; kept back all that time, Mr. Dorsey still retaining Mr. Rerdell in his employ. They want you to believe that Mr. Rerdell then conceived that scheme; that he then invented a fictitious interview with Mr. Brady, and that he then put that fictitious interview into Dorsey's letter-book, where it was available to him to see whenever he came here, and which letter-book Mr. Dorsey did not dare to produce, although he has had one of the three in court at this trial, as the evidence shows, and as he himself stated on the stand, that he had had the whole pile here in court. He did not give us access to them. He did not dare to produce the letter-book, or even let us see the index. They want you to believe that at that time Rerdell invented a fictitious interview, wrote it in the letter in Mr. Dorsey's letter-book, and left it there certainly for a considerable time, and that then, having done that in pursuance of his process of fathering this job upon Mr. Brady and Mr. Dorsey, he went on and got up the fictitious set of books. Now, let us see. He says Mr. Brady asked him how large the books were, and how long it would take to copy them, and everything of that sort. Then the testimony goes on:

Q. What did General Brady say to you in reference to copying the books?—A. General Brady did not direct me; I acted upon his suggestion.

Q. Very well; what did you then do, acting upon the suggestion of General Brady, in reference to having the books copied?—A. I then put a man at work upon them; gave him the books, designating such entries as should be left out by drawing a pencil through them in that way (making a X mark), and told him to make up a new set of books, leaving out those entries, but to leave the books so that they would balance, taking the entries that were stricken out, also the same amount that had been carried to profit and loss. There is where Mr. MacVeagh's evidence was mixed. The items that had heretofore been charged to William Smith had, in the mean time, when the books were balanced, been carried to profit and loss.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to the contents of the books in that way, without the production of the books.

The COURT. He has testified what instructions were given to the party who copied them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well, then I object to telling what was in the books.

Q. State what instructions you gave.—A. I told him I wanted him to make up a new set of books, and after leaving out those items, to leave the books so that they would balance, and to be as expeditious as possible—getting a new set of books as near like these as I could find them.

Q. Is that all of those instructions?—A. Those were all the instructions that I gave.

He then says he appeared before the committee twelve or fifteen days afterwards and was not asked for the books, though he had the bogus set of books completed at that time. On page 2363 he also testified as to that:

Q. I omitted to ask you to describe with particularity the difference between the bogus set of books which you state you made up to exhibit to the committee and the original set of books, because at the time the question was asked the notice had not matured.

That was a notice to them to produce.

What did you do with the original set in reference to marking or otherwise when you handed them over to be copied?—A. I took the journal and went carefully through it, drawing a heavy cross-mark with a pencil——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] That is a mere repetition of the testimony, your honor.

* * * * *

The COURT. Go on.

Q. You drew the cross marks against what?—A. Against all the charges made against William Smith, and the credits of course to Stephen W. Dorsey, which would be the same thing, and also indicated the same amounts where they had been carried prior to that time to profit and loss, so that the new books would balance.

Q. And in that particular differ from the old ones?—A. Yes, sir.

By the COURT:

Q. Let me ask a question. I do not know whether it is altogether proper to do so, but I have a curiosity to know, and it is in the line now.

That was about whether there was another Smith than William Smith in the books, and he said no. He says that he directed that work to be done in the way here described. Who did it? We come to the testimony of Mr. Donnelly, Mr. Dorsey's trusted friend, who is at the head of a division in the Land Office in this city, and whose personal relations with Mr. Dorsey he says, on page 2636, have been friendly:

Q. Will you state whether or not, in the summer of 1879, you had anything to do with copying a book of accounts for Rerdell?—A. I did not copy any book in 1879.

Q. Did you copy any in 1880?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time in 1880?—A. Late in the spring, I think. I am not quite certain about it.

Q. When you received the book to copy did you recognize it as any book you had ever seen before?

It was not a new book brought to him then. It was a book that Mr. Donnelly, who had been doing writing for Mr. Dorsey, had seen before.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When had you first seen that book?—A. I think it was some time in the summer of 1879.

Rerdell fixes it as in May, 1879.

Q. Under what circumstances did you see it in the summer of 1879?—A. Mr. Rerdell called me in to examine a set of books for him and straighten them out.

Q. What did you do in consequence of that call from him?—A. I straightened them out—balanced them.

Q. What kind of books were they in appearance?

The WITNESS. Do you mean in size?

Mr. MERRICK. In size and color.

A. They were a small set of books; I should judge about that long [indicating], and about an inch thick, and covered with red morocco leather.

Q. How many were there?—A. Two.

Q. What were they?—A. Journal and ledger.

Q. Did they bear any inscription on the outside?—A. Nothing but journal and ledger.

Q. Did they bear that inscription?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were those books about?—A. They related to mail business.

Q. Whose mail business?—A. Well, it seemed to be a firm.

Q. Whose firm?—A. There were a number of names in there.

Q. Whose name?—A. Mr. Dorsey's—

Q. [Interposing.] What Dorsey?—A. S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Rerdell, an account called mail account, an account called expense account, several accounts of the kind.

The memorandum mentioned an account for expenses, an account with Dorsey, and also an account with M. C. R.:

Q. Name over some more accounts.—A. There was a profit and loss account.

Q. Name over some more.—A. There was a William Smith account.

As to which Dorsey said, "Why, damn it, Brady."

Q. Name another one.—A. J. W. Dorsey; there was an account of my own.

Q. Any Joneses in there?—A. I can't remember; I don't remember any Jones.

Q. Did you ever keep those books?—A. I did.

Q. From what time to what time?—A. From early in the fall of 1879 until the spring of 1880, when I made that copy.

Now, gentlemen, stop right here. After that evidence can there be any question that Mr. Rerdell had in his possession in the summer of 1879, and Mr. Donnelly saw and used and made entries in in the summer of 1879 and down to 1880, a red morocco book, journal and ledger, containing these charges that are stated, which agree entirely with the statement in the memorandum? Can there be any question about that? Nobody impugns Mr. Donnelly's straightforwardness and truth. Nobody impugns his inclination to aid Mr. Dorsey all he can. Can there be any question about that? And if that is so, gentlemen, what then do we find? Mr. Dorsey having left Mr. Rerdell here in the summer of 1879, and until August of 1880, in charge of all his mail business, turning everything over to him as he says, Mr. Rerdell goes on and opens just such a set of books as he described on the stand, and which they tried to make out to you never existed. Now, going on further with Donnelly's testimony:

Q. Was it an exact copy of the book?—A. It was not.

Q. In what did it differ from the book you were keeping?—A. There were some items left out.

Q. How did you come to leave out those items?—A. I left them out by direction of Rerdell.

Q. Were there any marks to indicate what was to be left out?—A. There was a pencil-mark drawn through.

Q. What accounts did you leave out?—A. That I don't remember.

Q. Can you name any one?—A. Yes, sir; I left the William Smith account out.

Q. What was the amount of the account?—A. I don't remember the exact amount.

Q. Come as near as you can.—A. Well, I should judge it was something about $30,000.

Thirty thousand dollars appeared in the books charged to William Smith. Suppose that book had gone to the Congressional committee. The fact that the item was so large would have caused the question at once to arise, who is William Smith? What has he been doing for this firm? What mail business has he been engaged in? Who is he? What is he? Where is he? Let us have him here and find out. The fact that the name was a dummy put there to conceal the name of Mr. Brady would almost necessarily have come out if they had put Mr. Rerdell on the stand and he had told them all about Mr. Brady's action and who William Smith was. The theory that I am stating involves the idea that this man whom they now wish you to believe was getting up this scheme would away back there keep his mouth shut. If he had been getting up any such scheme he certainly would have gone on the stand and said, "Here is a set of books of Mr. Dorsey's. I have been keeping them for months. Here is an entry of $30,000 to William Smith." "Who is William Smith?" "Thomas J. Brady." But instead of that, acting upon Mr. Brady's suggestion, he went and employed Mr. Donnelly, who was familiar with the book, to make a duplicate copy, omitting those items.

Q. What did you do with that amount in order to balance the books?—A. My recollection is that I carried it to profit and loss.

Q. On the books or on the balance-sheet?—A. On both.

Q. Were there any other accounts transferred in the same way?—A. I rather think there were, but I am not certain. I can't tell what accounts there were. I don't know.

Q. How many were there so transferred?—A. There might have been two or three amounts, and might have been only two; I am not certain.

Q. Two or three accounts?—A. Two or three accounts or amounts; I am not certain.

Q. Did you make the books balance on your copy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long were you working on that copy?—A. I was working on it two evenings and all of one night.

Q. From sundown to sunrise?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why did you work so hard?—A. Mr. Rerdell said he wanted them at a certain time.

Q. For what purpose?—A. I don't know; he did not tell me.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We object to that, your honor.

Mr. MERRICK. He says he does not know.

Q. Can you fix the date of that transaction?—A. I cannot.

Q. Can you fix the month?—A. No, sir; I can't fix the month; it was late in the spring, some time; it might have been the latter part of April, or it might have been the forepart of May. I am not certain.

Mr. Rerdell's letter to Bosler is in May.

Q. What did you do with the books when you finished them?—A. Turned them over to Mr. Rerdell.

Q. Both sets?—A. Both sets.

Q. Where did you get the new books into which you transferred the copy?—I bought them at Brad. Adams's book-store.

Q. How did they compare in looks and size with the others?—A. They were not exactly alike, but there was a very close resemblance in size and color.

Q. How came there to be a close resemblance in size and color?—A. Mr. Rerdell told me he wanted them as near alike as possible.

Precisely what Rerdell swore to on the stand.

Q. And you tried to get them as near alike as possible?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you make out any balance-sheets at any time during the period you were book-keeping?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you make out your first balance-sheet?—A. The first balance-sheet I made before I was employed by Mr. Rerdell; it was at the time he got his books into bad condition, some way; I balanced them and made a balance-sheet for him.

He testified that it was in 1879.

Q. Do you recollect by how much these books failed to balance at the time you tried to straighten them?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. You do not remember anything about 35 cents being called $35?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you make out your second balance-sheet?—A. I think it was about the 30th of September, or probably it was some time in the quarter ending 30th of September.

Q. What year?—A. 1879.

Q. In what month did you make out the other balance-sheet?—A. I think I made another balance-sheet for the quarter ending 31st of December.

Q. Prior to that time?

The WITNESS. You mean the first balance-sheet?

Mr. MERRICK. The first one.

A. That was in August, on work that had been done by Mr. Rerdell on the books.

Q. Did you make any balance-sheet of those books after you had made this so-called copy?—A. I made a balance-sheet for each and turned it over to him with the books.

Q. You made a balance-sheet for each?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you paid for keeping those books?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much?—A. Twenty-five dollars a month.

Now, your honor, it is after 1, and I am through with Mr. Donnelly, I believe.

The COURT. We will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] With reference to Mr. Donnelly, I only desire to call your attention to the fact that it appears affirmatively that he has done writing for Mr. Dorsey since the prosecution commenced, and as late as last summer Mr. Dorsey paid him a considerable sum of money. Therefore there cannot be any question that the set of books which Rerdell swore that he opened in May, 1879, were known to Mr. Donnelly; that Mr. Donnelly kept them; that Mr. Donnelly made at least three balance-sheets from them, and that Mr. Donnelly, in May, 1880, when the Congressional investigation was pending, made a copy, leaving out the items which were supposed to be such as would not bear investigation, and that that was done in accordance with what Mr. Rerdell states was the advice of Mr. Brady, and in accordance with what Mr. Rerdell states was the arrangement that he made. So that if the evidence stopped there, there would be no question whatever of the existence of the books. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that that is the great question—the existence of the books. Did there exist a set of books in which there was charged this $30,000 as paid to William Smith, and in which there were these other items shown by the memorandum? Did there exist such a set of books in the summer of 1879? That there existed such a set of books I do not think any member of this jury can have any particle of question, on the evidence to which I have already called their attention. If there did exist such a set of books, then their existence is only consistent with one of two theories—either that they correctly stated transactions which had been had and related to entries under Rerdell's knowledge, or which he was directed by Dorsey to make, or Mr. Rerdell as long ago as December, 1879, was for some purpose or other getting up a bogus set of books, a set of books which charged Brady with corruption which did not exist, and a set of books which charged Dorsey with corrupting Brady when he had not done it. There is no other theory possible than those two.

One or the other of those theories, gentlemen, you must adopt. Either the books did exist in 1879 and correctly stated the transactions, or Mr. Rerdell, way back there, was getting up such a system as that, and was manufacturing such a fraud as that, and then was writing a letter to Bosler in which he was setting out a large portion of that fraud and was spreading it upon Stephen W. Dorsey's own letter-book, and so getting up a fraud intended at some future time to be sprung for the purpose of covering Brady and Dorsey with disgrace and confusion and landing them in the penitentiary. He was spreading upon Mr. Dorsey's letter book the evidence that he was engaged in this. Either that is so, or the transaction was a genuine one, the transaction was just what Mr. Rerdell tells you it was, the entry by him in books of charges against Brady under Mr. Dorsey's direction, and the endeavor subsequently, when the Congressional investigation was unexpectedly sprung upon the parties in the spring of 1880, to conceal it by getting up a bogus set of books. But, gentlemen, the evidence as to whether those books existed does not rest there. You had before you Mr. Gibbs, the book-keeper at the Ebbitt House. You heard him testify. You saw by his own statement that he was unwilling to be brought into this case. We gave them the means of contradicting Mr. Gibbs, if there had been any question about it, because we showed that Mrs. Gibbs knew all about this matter, and we explained to you why in view of her recent affliction we did not put her on the stand. It was open to them, if Mr. Gibbs had not told you a truthful story to have called Mrs. Gibbs here and to have questioned her. What does Mr. Gibbs say? Mr. Gibbs says that he has known Rerdell since the fall of 1879.

I read from page 2643 :

Q. Did M. C. Rerdell, at any time, ask you and Mrs. Gibbs to do any work on any books for him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When?—A. Between Christmas, 1879, and the 1st of March, 1880.

Q. What did he ask you to do?—A. A variety of writing; sent out a lot of letters and wrote a lot of letters for him, indexed three letter-books—

He indexed the letter-books which they did not dare to produce. He indexed the letter-books which they at first suggested were not indexed. He indexed the letter-books which they did not dare to show you. He indexed the letter-books as to which they would not even produce the index under the letter B—and Mrs. Gibbs copied a journal.

Q. What sort of a looking book was that which Mrs. Gibbs copied?—A. Probably about that long, and about that thick [indicating].

Q. How many inches long?—A. About ten inches long.

Q. About how thick?—A. Between three-quarters of an inch and an inch thick, and about six inches wide.

Q. What color was the book?—A. Dark, as well as I can remember now; brown, I think; either brown or black.

Q. What was the mark on the back of it, if any?—A. I don't remember seeing any.

Q. What was the character of the accounts in the book?

The WITNESS. Which book?

Mr. MERRICK. In the journal.

A. It was an account of expenditures and receipts.

Q. On what business?—A. On the star-route business.

Q. Did you or Mrs. Gibbs make a copy?—A. Mrs. Gibbs made a copy and I verified it.

Q. Is Mrs. Gibbs in the city?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what condition is she?—A. She is in very poor health; she just lost a child about three weeks ago, and her health generally is broken, and she is in very great grief.

Q. Can she conveniently come into court?—A. I would not like to have her come into court in her condition.

Q. You verified the copy she made?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell me any accounts that were in that book?—A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Can you give me the names of any individuals who had accounts in that book?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Give me one, two, three, or four, or as many as you can recollect.—A. M. C. Rerdell, S. W. Dorsey, John Dorsey, Mrs. Steele, Colonel Steele—

Whom Dorsey swore was his traveling agent—

Mr. Smith—

Q. [Interposing.] Mr. who?—A. Smith.

Q. What Smith?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Who else?—A. Jones.

Q. Who else?—A. Mr. Jenkins.

Q. Jenkins?—A. Jennings.

Jennings, it appears by a subcontract, was subcontractor on the Mineral Park and Pioche route.

Q. Do you recollect about what was the size of Mr. Smith's account?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it large or small?—A. I couldn't tell you.

Q. You do not recollect anything about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was the occasion for her making a copy of that book, or do you know?—A. Mr. Rerdell brought the work there and said he wanted to get a copy made to send to S. W. Dorsey, in New York.

Q. What did you do with it when it was done?—A. Returned it to him.

Q. Copy and original?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was the copy a precise and accurate copy of the book?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you copy only the journal?—A. One copy of the journal and index to letter-books.

Then, on cross-examination he was asked:

Q. How long did it take Mrs. Gibbs to copy it?—A. We were at it some four or five days.

Q. About how near full was the journal?—A. It was about two-thirds full, as near as I can remember now.

Q. Let me get the date when that was brought there.—Some time between Christmas, 1879, and the 1st of March, 1880; I couldn't say just exactly.

Q. It took four or five days to copy it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect any item in the book?

The WITNESS. The amount, you mean?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Any item.

The WITNESS. I remember the names.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By "item" I mean an item of account.—A. No, sir.

Q. You do not recollect J. W. Steele—A. [Interposing.] Yes, sir.

Q. J. W. Steele, $126?—A. No, sir; I don't recollect $126.

Q. That is what I mean. You do not recollect any item?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see Stephen W. Dorsey at that time?

The WITNESS. Did I see him?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

The WITNESS. Personally?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No; at the time the book was brought.

The WITNESS. Did I see him, or see his name?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Him; in person?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he ever ask you to copy any books?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he ever pay you for copying any books?—A. No, sir.

Q. So far as you know, did he know that you ever had any book?—A. No; not that I know of.

Q. Do you recollect Samuel Jones in that book?

Samuel Jones was one of the names upon the memorandum.

A. I don't remember the name of Samuel; I remember the name Jones.

Q. Are you sure there was a Jones in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. No doubt on that subject?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you have no doubt on the subject of S. W. Dorsey's name being there?—A. No doubt of that.

Q. Do you recollect the given name of anybody else?—A. M. C. Rerdell. That is all I can think of now.

He was questioned whether Mr. Rerdell came to him at any time during the trial or before, and asked him if he recollected the name of William Smith, and he said no.

Q. During the trial?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he ask you if you recollected the name of William Smith?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you anything about Samuel Jones or Jones?—A. He asked me if I remembered the name of Jones.

Q. At the time he came to you did you tell him first that you recollected those names, or did he first tell you the names and then ask you if you did not recollect?—

A. He asked me the names, and asked me if I did not recollect them, and I told him I did not.

Q. When he first came to you he asked you if you remembered the names and you said you did not?—A. Yes; and I have always told him so.

Q. Then he told you the names that he remembered, did he?—A. No, sir.

Q. How did he call your attention to Smith and Jones?—A. He came up and asked me if I could remember any names in the book, and I told him I could remember one or two, or a few of them, and I went over them to him; then he asked me if I remembered the name of Smith, and I said, "No, sir;" then he asked me if I remembered the name of Jones, and I said, "No, sir;" neither did I at that time.

Then on redirect examination:

Q. Your memory being now refreshed, have you any doubt about your recollection of the name of Smith?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. Or Jones?—A. No, sir.

By the COURT:

Q. How do these things come into your mind so recently?—A. Your honor, I tried not to remember anything of this; I didn't want to be called into court if I could possibly help it, and for quite a long time did not mention the fact that I knew anything of the books. But when I was called into court, I thought of all the circumstances connected with the time that I copied the books; and a few days ago, or a week or so ago, in going home one night, and thinking this thing over in my mind, and thinking of everything I could think of, my mind reverted to a conversation I had had at the time, laughing and looking over the books, and I wrote a great many letters, and read a great many names, and was laughing about the peculiarity of the names, and even made the remark "There is even Smith and Jones in it." That is about the only thing.

Q. You made that remark when—at the time the books were copied?—A. After they were finished; before they were turned over to Rerdell.

By the COURT:

Q. These are the circumstances that brought it to your mind—

A. [Interposing.] The fact.

Q. The names of Jones and Smith?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you were astonished that Brown and Robinson were not in?—A. I was not astonished. Simply looking over the books and speaking about them, and making remarks in regard to them, and the great number of peculiar names, I said, "Why, there is even Smith and Jones in it."

That is the whole statement of Mr. Gibbs so far as it is pertinent. I have read it upon both sides. You will yourselves remember the honesty of the witness in the way he stated the whole matter, and I think there is no doubt left upon your minds that the man told a truthful story. He made a complete copy of the books, including the accounts of William Smith and Samuel Jones, upon sheets of paper, or rather Mrs. Gibbs copied them and he compared them, just as he was told by Rerdell, to send to Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Rerdell says he did send them to Stephen W. Dorsey; but no matter what may have become of them, the fact is that there was a set of books which Rerdell had in December, 1879; the same set of books by the description that Mr. Donnelly had kept and made balance-sheets from; the same set of books that contained entries to Jones and Smith. This is established beyond all question by the evidence of Gibbs, and it is practically established by the silence of Mrs. Gibbs. We disclosed to the other side the fact that she was familiar with the whole business, and if there had been any question that she would have testified in the same way she certainly would have been brought here as a witness. But, gentlemen, it is not only true that there was such a set of books, but that there was such a set of books known to Stephen W. Dorsey incidentally crops out, I think, in Mr. Dorsey's own remarks on the stand. Mr. Dorsey was asked upon the stand to give his statement or his version of the telegram which Mr. Rerdell admittedly sent him from Jersey City, in June, 1881, after they had had that interview at the Albemarle Hotel in New York. Mr. Dorsey tells you that was a peaceful, calm, and quiet transaction when Mr. Rerdell, having gone there without any apparent business, according to Mr. Dorsey's view, found Mr. Dorsey in bed and said, "Good morning," and told him everything was serene, and came away. Mr. Rerdell gives an entirely different version of that interview, and says that it was a stormy interview, resulting upon the disclosure of the fact that he had gone over there to tell him what he had done with MacVeagh and James. At any rate he sent a dispatch. Mr. Rerdell read the dispatch from a copy which he kept. Mr. Dorsey on the stand testified, in reply to his own counsel—I read from page 3789:

Q. Do you remember what the telegram contained—have you any memory of it?—

A. I can remember the substance of it, I think.

Q. Well?—A. I think he says: The affidavit story is a lie. Confidence is lost between us. I have been faithful to every trust, but I now resign my place.

Substantially a correct statement of the telegram. Then he added:

Send somebody to take charge of the book.

If Mr. Rerdell was not keeping books for Mr. Dorsey, if Mr. Dorsey did not know that Mr. Rerdell was keeping books for him, why, when he came to give his description of the dispatch Mr. Rerdell sent him from Jersey City, in June, 1881, did he say that Mr. Rerdell sent word to him to send somebody to take charge of the books? What books? Mr. Dorsey was unwilling to admit that Rerdell had any books but the route book.

Send somebody to take charge of the books.

That testimony was called out by his own counsel. On cross-examination it was referred to, page 3977, and he said "something to that effect," and his counsel seeing the bearing of the testimony, and seeing what was involved in that admission, undertook to make out that it was something as to the business, not as to the books; but the record shows he said something as to the books, and it was then stated that it was a matter that excited the attention of counsel at the time it was uttered, and a memorandum made by them:

Send somebody to take charge of the books.

But there is another piece of unconscious testimony by Dorsey which is worth calling to your attention. Mr. Rerdell testified that Mr. Dorsey left here in May or June, 1879, after having written to Mr. Bosler a letter, to which I shall directly call your attention, and told him, Rerdell, if Mr. Bosler came here to give him certain information. When Dorsey was asked about Mr. Bosler we find this condition of things, on page 3949:

Q. Did he take an interest in May, 1879?—A. I don't think he did until some time afterwards.

Q. How long afterwards?—A. I could not fix that date. After I left here in June

I had no intention of coming back here at all; I became engaged in other business matters.

Q. Did you settle an account with Bosler last fall which showed the dates when he became interested.

The WITNESS. Last fall?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

A. We settled last fall, but I don't know that that would show the dates.

Q. Cannot you fix the dates now from your recollection as to when Bosler got an interest?—A. I talked with Bosler the other day about it, and neither of us could agree upon the date; that is, we did not know.

Q. He came in simply to advance money?—A. Yes.

Q. When was that?—A. I said in May. I think it was in May.

Q. Did he get any security for his advances?—A. I think he got drafts.

Q. You gave him drafts?—A. I believe that I did.

Q. Did you inform Bosler of the character of the property and its yield?—A. I suppose I did in talking with him about it at the time.

Q. Explained the routes to him?—A. I presume I did.

Q. How much each one yielded?—A. I presume so.

Q. Did you not direct a statement to be made out showing the character of these routes for the purpose of that transaction?—A. I have no recollection of that.

Q. Did you direct Rerdell to show Bosler the books?—A. I don't remember that.

Q. Could you have informed Bosler of the amount that was coming and due on these respective routes without looking at the books?

The WITNESS. What books?

Mr. MERRICK. Any books that had relation to them.

A. I may have seen Bosler here or in New York and told him about it; I do not know it.

Q. Did you recollect in detail sufficiently to tell Bosler about it?—A. Oh, I don't know about that.

Q. Do you not know that you did not?

Then he goes on and says Rerdell had a statement about the routes pasted on the door of his desk, and he says that he entered into an agreement with Bosler.

Q. Do you not know that you referred him to Rerdell?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Would it not have been a very natural thing for you to do?—A. Possibly; yes.

Q. What is your best recollection on that?—A. My best recollection is that I would not have sent a man like Bosler to Rerdell for information when I had a business transaction with him.

Q. Why not?—A. Because he looks into things very thoroughly.

Q. Who does?—A. Bosler does before he puts money in.

Gentlemen, there is the condition of things. Mr. Bosler went so far that Mr. Dorsey wrote a letter with reference to the subject to Mr. Bosler. He would not, in the first place, say whether he referred Bosler to Rerdell to see the books, and did not remember anything about it, but he thinks he would not have done it. Mr. Rerdell, on the other hand, says that in point of fact Mr. Bosler came here soon after the letter was written; that Mr. Dorsey was gone, and we assume that Mr. Bosler did make inquiries of him based upon the information contained in the books; and when we called attention to the fact that Mr. Bosler could testify upon that subject, Mr. Bosler, the friend and partner, the associate, whom they had here in this court-room and about these halls for ten days or a fortnight, they did not dare to produce him to contradict in any way or to sustain in any manner that question in connection with the books and the information that Mr. Rerdell then gave to him, although the court, in an argument on the question of the admission of testimony, stated that Mr. Rerdell's testimony in consequence of that letter that Dorsey wrote to Bosler—Rerdell's testimony that Bosler came here and talked with him—was certainly very significant evidence, and entitled to very serious consideration. With all that notice from the facts and from the court they did not dare to produce James W. Bosler here to testify whether it was true or false. Don't you believe, gentlemen, under those circumstances that Mr. Rerdell told the truth; that he had a set of books known to Mr. Dorsey, and that Mr. Dorsey, having written this letter to Mr. Bosler and then having gone West before Mr. Bosler got here, gave those directions to Rerdell to show Mr. Bosler the books, and that in fact Mr. Bosler came here and got the information, and got it from those books.

Now, I say, gentlemen, beyond all question those books existed. Mr. Donnelly swears to it, Mr. Gibbs swears to it, and Mr. Rerdell swears to it. Beyond all question they existed. They existed for some purpose. They contained the accounts of the mail routes which Mr. Dorsey owned beyond all question; and Mr. Dorsey states, and repeats here, that he turned over everything to Mr. Rerdell and left here leaving him in charge; that he remained here during May, June, and July, while he was getting the expeditions which carried the service up to two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars upon the ten routes in this indictment which he had, to say nothing of his interest in the other one hundred and thirty routes; he remained here during that time, and then turned over to Rerdell all of the business, and Mr. Rerdell went on continuing the business. He wrote to Mr. Bosler making arrangements with Bosler to come on here, and Bosler came here and made the examination, and did go into the business, and from that time on Dorsey tells you Mr. Rerdell sent his accounts to Mr. Bosler, and settled with Mr. Bosler, and received money from Mr. Bosler. Yet, when we asked them to produce those balance-sheets, to produce those accounts of Rerdell, to produce the accounts with which Stephen W. Dorsey in November last settled with Mr. Bosler, they were as mum as grave-yards. Grave-yard principles follow there. Grave-yard principles follow them all through. They will disclose nothing whatever that they can avoid disclosing. Those books existed, gentlemen, in the early summer of 1879. They existed down into 1880. That fact, gentlemen, involves: That prior to the summer of 1879 that memorandum which was produced here, half of it in Mr. Dorsey's handwriting was admittedly in the possession of Mr. Rerdell, for those books were made from it. That memorandum was substantially, at that time, in its present condition, because the books were made from it and contained the entries which are in part of the memorandum. Part of the memorandum Kellogg and Hill undertook, in their absurd way, to throw a doubt upon as to its having been written by Stephen W. Dorsey. The memorandum existed before the books were made from it, beyond all question. Why and how did Mr. Rerdell come into possession of it if he was not employed by Dorsey to open books for him relating to the mail service? Did not that come within the general employment which Mr. Dorsey said existed? But, gentlemen, Mr. Rerdell tells you that some of these entries in the books he verified, made them up substantially, as I recollect, from the stubs in the check-books. Why have they not produced those stubs to you? It comes up, gentlemen, at every moment. Like Banquo's ghost—

It will not down.

Those stubs of check-books are in their possession. They could answer half a hundred questions. To answer any one of them adversely to the evidence that we have given would be a most important point in their behalf in this case. They will not produce them. They leave these stubs of check-books unproduced. They pretended to produce all the checks, and yet they failed to do that. They did not give you any information. They got up to a certain point and there they stopped. There was some pretense of an intimation that although Mr. Rerdell might have kept books, Mr. Dorsey did not know anything about them.

In the first place, is not that an absurdity? Is it not an absurdity to suppose that Dorsey would leave Rerdell in charge of his business from July, 1879, to August, 1880, and then on from that time until the close of the contract term in August, 1882; leave all the business in that way, and then through Bosler settle the accounts with Mr. Rerdell and have no knowledge in any way, not only of the entries contained in the books which Rerdell kept, but have no knowledge that he kept any books whatever? Is it not absurd to suppose any such thing? These ten routes represented an income of two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars a year, or a total business, including income and outgo, of $500,000 a year, for three years, going no further than that. These ten routes alone represented transactions amounting to half a million dollars a year. There were one hundred and thirty routes and Mr. Dorsey took one-third in value if not in number. If the value was the same, Mr. Dorsey took not less than forty routes. As ten routes involved a business of $1,500,000 in that period, the forty routes involved in that proportion transactions amounting to $6,000,000. And yet Mr. Dorsey wants you to believe that doing business to an extent of $6,000,000, a business greater than many merchants certainly in any city do, a business of that enormous amount, that it was done without any books! He admittedly kept no books. He wants you to believe that nobody kept any books in his behalf except the fraction of books which Mr. Torrey kept over in New York, and which Mr. Torrey seemed to be in doubt about as to whether they contained anything about the mail accounts! At any rate they could have contained very little about the mail. He was not in any position to know much as to the mail business, and when he did want to know something about the mail business in seeking to balance certain accounts what did he do but write to Mr. Rerdell? He wrote to Mr. Rerdell to find out something about that little item of 25 cents or $25, and Mr. Rerdell went to Mr. Donnelly and got the statement from him, and by that the error was corrected. The statement was produced here. They want you to believe that there were no books. If Mr. Dorsey did not keep any books, that confirms Mr. Rerdell's statement that he kept books and that these were the books which were used, these were the books which were settled by, and these were the books by which all their business was carried on.

But, gentlemen, Mr. Dorsey is in the same boat apparently so far as books are concerned with that eminently truthful man, that eminently confiding man, Vaile. Vaile hadn't any books. Vaile was in the grave-yard business too. They were all setting up as undertakers and sextons, gentlemen. They did not have any books. Now, take their theory that they did not have any books. When persons are carrying on business to this extent and they do not keep books, why do they not keep books? Certainly because they are in the position that Brady said Dorsey would be in if he kept books, and that Dorsey was a damned fool to keep books. Does not the mere fact of their statement that they kept no books show that they were engaged in a business which in the very nature of the case and the probabilities of the case that they did not dare to put on the books, because if kept the books must balance and must account for all the money received and from whom, and for all the money paid and to whom the money went. They say they did not keep any books. However that may be, gentlemen, just how far the grave-yard business was carried out, I submit to you that the evidence is conclusive that Rerdell kept books, and that Rerdell kept books by the hands of Donnelly. Donnelly was paid $100 for writing in books, and the claim is that that was paid by Rerdell and that Dorsey did not know anything about it. Mr.

Dorsey had Donnelly's notes for borrowed money for $100, dated away back to some period prior to 1878. In 1879 Mr. Donnelly did work for Mr. Rerdell and Mr. Rerdell assumed to pay him for it, claiming that he had the right, apparently, by crediting it upon those notes, and told him that he would arrange to give him the notes. The thing went on and the notes were not given up. Nobody ever asked Mr. Donnelly to pay that money again. Nobody said anything to him about it. Mr. Donnelly continued to work for Mr. Dorsey down into last fall some time, and then there was apparently another payment to Mr. Donnelly by Mr. Dorsey direct. All this time, gentlemen, nothing was said about the hundred-dollar notes. Is it not perfectly clear that it was a recognized fact that Mr. Donnelly had done this work and had worked out that debt, and is it not beyond all question that that had been done by work upon these books? When subsequently Mr. Donnelly did additional work there was a further payment to him.

Now, gentlemen, all this question has occupied considerable of your time. The further history of these books is not important save in the sense that it is directed to show that the books went into Mr. Dorsey's hands and that therefore he is presumptively bound to produce them. If he does not produce them he is liable to the presumptions that are to be drawn from withholding them. But the question whether he is liable to any such presumption does not affect in any way the testimony already given affirmatively as to the contents of those books; even if Mr. Dorsey has not got them, if they have been destroyed or lost, the evidence is full and complete that they contained these entries made on the basis of that memorandum in Stephen W. Dorsey's handwriting. That is a tangible and important fact in this case. The only question, the only necessity, the only thing involved in all the testimony in tracing the books from that time on is simply to raise the presumption against Mr. Dorsey from his failure to produce them. We all know that he did not produce them. Bear in mind that the books existed. Bear in mind they existed as late as the spring of 1880 beyond all question. Mr. Rerdell says that after that time they were given to Mr. Dorsey. Bear in mind that when Rerdell went to James and MacVeagh in June, 1881, he told them about the existence of those books. He said that they were in New York, and he said he would go there and get them. He went to New York, and he claims that he did get one or more of those books in New York.

The COURT. One of them.

Mr. BLISS. One of them. When Mr. Rerdell told James and MacVeagh that those books existed there, what necessity was there, if he was telling a lie, and those books were not in Stephen W. Dorsey's possession, or in his office, for his saying that they were there? He could have said the books were here where he could get them. He could have possibly got them at the same depository from which it appears he got the letter-book he took to the house of Mr. MacVeagh, to wit, the house of Mr. Ingersoll. If he were making up a story he could have located them anywhere in Washington. What necessity was there for him to open the door to being caught in a lie, if he was making a story up, and saying the books were in New York and he would go over there after them? Was there any necessity for that? Is any man shrewd enough to get up so extraordinary a story, and a story that hangs together so well with all the facts in the case as this story of Mr. Rerdell's, going to give himself away, as the saying is, by pretending that the books were in New York in the possession of Mr. Dorsey or in Mr. Dorsey's office? Would he not have said, "The books are here and I can get them," and would he not have run off and got them? Or if he had said that the books were in New York and he was engaged in imposing upon James and MacVeagh, as they want you to believe, would he not have said, on coming back after a few days, "Gentlemen, I have been to New York and I have got the book, and here it is," although he might never have been out of Washington? In point of fact he told James and MacVeagh the books existed. He told them that they were in New York. He told them that he would go and get them. He went to New York beyond all question. It is said that he did not go to that office and did not get that book. In the first place Mr. James said that on the train coming back Mr. Rerdell pointed out to him a bundle he had in his hand, done up, I think, in a newspaper. It looked like a book, and he patted it and said that it was the book. He told Mr. James that he could not go into any further detail there, because there was somebody who acted more or less with Mr. Brady and the star-route people, and he did not want to give himself away. It appeared on the stand that the man who was sitting next to Mr. Rerdell was Chase Andrews, the man whom Walsh tells you was engaged in raising a bribery and corruption fund to get the expedition appropriation through Congress in the spring of 1880. Mr. Rerdell told Mr. James that there was somebody there whom he did not name, but who was connected with these gentlemen. They obligingly put Mr. Chase Andrews on the stand to say that he was the man who was there. He says he did not see the book, but he says he did not see everything that Rerdell had. He saw that he had a bag, but he did not see any book. Mr. Rerdell says that he could not get the book into the bag without wrenching it out of shape, and the book was upon a chair in the drawing-room car. Mr. Rerdell says that he went to that office and got that book. He defines the place and all about it. Mr. Torrey tells you that he was there all that day and that Rerdell did not get anything of the kind. There, gentlemen, is a question of dispute between the parties. All I have to say upon that subject is this: In the first place, if Mr. Rerdell had been lying it would have been the height of fatuity for him to go on the stand and say, "I went to that office and I saw Mr. Torrey there and I got this book." If that had not been the transaction which took place there he would have said, "I went to that office and Mr. Torrey was not there, and I went in and helped myself to the book and brought it away." Mr. Torrey undertakes to say he was there all that day, and that Mr. Rerdell was not there. Mr. Rerdell said that he was there. You will bear in mind, gentlemen, that, saving to themselves, of course, their legal rights, when we sought to prove by a post-office inspector that he saw Mr. Rerdell go into that office on that day, these gentlemen all objected in chorus, and the court ruled that we were too late in making that offer; that we should have supported Rerdell when he was first on the stand, and that we were too late after Mr. Torrey had contradicted Mr. Rerdell to offer the evidence proposed. It was one of those cases which come to all counsel during a long trial. We took a different view of the law from that entertained by the court. We went through the case up to that point with no idea that there was going to be any dispute that Mr. Rerdell was there on that day. We desired, as we have in everything, except in my speech, to save your time, and did not pile up cumulative evidence. We afterwards sought to prove by the chief post-office inspector of the city of New York, in charge of the whole of that region, that he saw Mr. Rerdell go in that office on that day. We were excluded from doing it. They had the right to exclude us and I make no complaint about it; but having done that, what do we find? Mr.

James says Rerdell had something like a book. Rerdell says he had it, and that he brought it to his house here. Having left there in the afternoon, Mr. Dorsey, by his own admission, got a dispatch from Rerdell, in which Rerdell told him he resigned his place, and that all confidence between them was gone. Mr. Dorsey took so much interest in the result of that peaceful interview which occurred at the Albemarle Hotel that he sent Mr. Rerdell two dispatches before he got a hundred miles away from New York to be delivered to him on the train. Those dispatches we made every effort in the world to produce. There certainly was no default on our part. But we met with the trouble that we could not prove the writing of them by Dorsey. We could not prove that by Mr. Dorsey until he went upon the stand, and after he had gone upon the stand the court ruled that it was too late for us to produce them. Therefore we could not show what was in those dispatches. Mr. Rerdell having come back from New York on that day with this book, which he told James was the book, he took it to his house. After writing a letter the same night of that interview Mr. Dorsey appeared here within a few days, and Mr. Rerdell was appealed to to save Mr. Dorsey and his family, under circumstances which he detailed on the stand and of which I shall have occasion to say something directly. He then passed back again into full communion with these gentlemen whom he had been serving and whose corrupt work he had done for a petty salary of $3,000 a year, while on the ten routes Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey was getting these tremendous profits. The routes first gave him profits annually of, I think, about $97,000, and they ran up when the routes were increased and expedited to their fullest extent to, I think, $128,000 a year. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey getting all that profit and Mr. Rerdell getting the beggarly sum of $3,000 a year, Rerdell passed back under the influence of Dorsey and Bosler, whom I say again they dare not produce. He passed back again under the influence of Dorsey and Bosler, and under the control of the same men who had debauched him previously. That book, however, before it passed into the control of Mr. Dorsey fortunately left one mark behind it by which we can show its existence. Mrs. Cushman was placed on the stand, and Mrs. Cushman swore that Mr. Rerdell, having gone West in the performance of some business for Mr. Dorsey (this man who wants you to believe that he did not trust Rerdell at all), got anxious about this book, which he had left somewhat exposed in his house, and telegraphed to Mrs. Cushman, who was living in his house—he had taken his wife with him West—to look up the book and see that it was carefully preserved. Mrs. Cushman told you on the stand she did look up that book and did find it, and that she examined it sufficiently to see that it related to the mail business, and that she retained it until Mr. Rerdell returned and gave it over to him. He states that he gave it back to Mr. Dorsey. That is the alleged history of that book. I do not need to go into the alleged history of the Gibbs copy of the book, nor the alleged history of the copy of the book which was made by Donnelly, because the subsequent history of those copies is really of comparatively little importance. I simply say to you that if Rerdell is to be believed all those copies passed into the hands of Mr. Dorsey. If you believe that they are traced into the hands of Mr. Dorsey, then you must draw from the fact that he refuses to produce them, as I submit that the court will tell you, the inference adverse to him in connection with them. If, however, you think those books are not traced into Mr. Dorsey's hands, a thing which I can hardly believe you will think, then, of course, you will not draw from the testimony, in considering this case in the jury-room, any inference adverse to Mr. Dorsey. But at the same time you will bear in mind that, no matter what has become of the books, or where they have gone, or whether they were in Mr. Dorsey's possession last or not, beyond all question the books existed, and beyond all question they contained the entries which I have spoken of, and beyond all question they contained entries of $30,000 paid to William Smith, which beyond all question, as I say, stood for Mr. Brady. All those facts, it seems to me, are tangible, and show that this testimony about the books brings out the fact that Mr. Dorsey did pay Mr. Brady that $30,000 for practically corrupt purposes. Mr. Rerdell says he did. The books say he did, and the books existed beyond all question. The books have disappeared. Whether they have disappeared through Mr. Dorsey's manipulation, or whether through accident, is a matter of comparatively little importance. The one fact of the evidence of the payment of money by Dorsey to Brady remains the same, whether the books were put out of the way by Dorsey or by Rerdell. That is the great central point so far as the books are concerned, and as to that the testimony is absolutely uncontradicted.

Now, gentlemen, passing from the books, let us see a little as to what more of Mr. Rerdell's story upon this subject there is to which I ought to call your attention. You will remember the statement of the letter of Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Rerdell says, on page 2271, that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote a letter to J. W. Bosler on or about the 13th of May, 1879, in relation to this star service now under investigation; that he took a press copy of that letter in a certain letter-book, being the letter-book of Mr. Dorsey containing his own correspondence while he was in the Senate, and which he finished up after he went out of the Senate, about December 15, 1879:

Q. Where is the original letter; do you know?—A. I do not know; I mailed it.

Q. To whom?—A. I mailed it to J. W. Bosler.

Q. Did S. W. Dorsey, at or about the time of writing that letter, have any conversation with you in which he stated the amount of profits on those contracts?

Mr. WILSON. Now, if your honor please, that is very leading.

The COURT. Well, in regard to the amount of profits; modify it.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know what his answer is going to be, any more than the man in the moon.

A. No, sir; we did not have a conversation in regard to the amount of profits; but he told me to make up a statement showing what the profits were.

Q. Did you make up such a statement?—A. I did.

Q. Where is that statement?—A. That statement was sent [correcting himself in regard to a previous answer]—no, sir; I do not remember whether that statement was mailed or whether I just kept it in the office there. I think, now, that I did keep it in the office for the purpose of showing it to Mr. Bosler when he called on me for that purpose. That is my recollection now.

Q. Kept it in which office?—A. In the office that I was then occupying in the house Mr. Dorsey occupied—the front room, basement.

Q. Do you know what has become of that statement?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Do you know whether you ever handed it or gave it to any one, or whether it still remained in your office until last July?—A. I think I showed it to Mr. Bosler or gave it to him; I don't remember which.

Mr. Bosler could have been produced, gentlemen. The possibility of contradicting Rerdell crops up at every turn, and Mr. Bosler could have been produced to settle that question as to whether Bosler gave it to him or not.

Q. Did Mr. Dorsey give you any specific instructions as to the making up of that statement—as to the gross, the net profits, and the deductions and charges against the proceeds?—A. Mr. Dorsey told me to make up a statement of his entire mail service, showing the pay on each route—the amount that was being paid to subcontractors—with a column for profit and a column for loss. I made that statement, and, as I said, my impression is that I kept it to show to Mr. Bosler, Mr. Dorsey telling me that Mr. Bosler would call upon me for that purpose.

Q. Did Dorsey tell you of any deductions to be made from the proceeds on account of anybody?

That is all on that subject at that place. We will pass now to page 2618. After we had given them notice so that we were entitled to go into the question of what was in the papers, we find this, referring to the letter which I have already spoken of:

Q. State, as nearly as you can, the contents of that letter?

That was the letter that Dorsey wrote Bosler in connection with that tabular statement.

A. First, it was proposing to Mr. Bosler to take an interest—

Q. [Interposing.] Take an interest in what?—A. In the mail business. Then that was followed by a statement as to how much he had already paid out.

By Mr. MERRICK:

¶ Q. Who?—A. S. W. Dorsey, the writer of the letter. Then, that was followed by another statement showing what the profits were, and what would yet have to be paid out to make the profits up to a certain amount.

The WITNESS. He wrote that if Bosler could not arrive here before he (Dorsey) left the city, which he expected to do in a few days, for Bosler to call upon me, and that I would exhibit the books and a statement as to how the mail service stood.

Q. Anything else that you remember?—A. I cannot remember anything else.

Q. As to the amounts paid out, what did it state; do you remember any more in detail?—A. Yes, sir; it gave the amount paid to T. J. B., I think, $20,000 in round numbers.

Mind you, that was in the spring of 1879, just when Mr. Dorsey had commenced in this business.

The COURT. You read $20,000.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; that is the way it is here.

Also, gave an additional amount that was credited to him, S. W. D., and, I think, that was $10,000. Then, in the next statement it showed what the profits were at that time in round numbers—$54,000—and that there would be an additional amount, but I am at a loss to remember what that amount was, whether it was $10,000 or $20,000, yet to be paid to T. J. B. There was another amount to be paid to somebody else; I think it was some borrowed money; I can't tell that.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Borrowed money?—A. I think so.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. State it all.—A. That amount, if I remember right, was $10,000.

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. I understood you to say that he stated what the profits would be?—A. Well, before the second statement as to the amounts that would yet have to be paid, it stated there that he hoped to get it up within a short time to $100,000 profits; and then to reach that amount was his second statement.

Q. Anything else that you remember in the letter?—A. No, sir; I cannot remember the substance farther than that.

Q. How long after that letter was written was it until Mr. Dorsey left the city? You say that he referred to the fact of his going away?—A. He left in about a week; he left on either the 19th, 20th, or 21st of that month, if I remember.

Q. How long after that time did you see Mr. Bosler?—A. Mr. Bosler came down a few days after Dorsey left.

Q. At that time was anything said about this letter?

Then there was an objection by Mr. Ingersoll, and on page 2620 the court says:

Certainly; if he swears that a certain letter was written asking Bosler to come down to see him, and there is a failure to prove the receipt of the letter by Bosler, then the appearance of Bosler in pursuance of the instructions in that letter would go strongly to show the receipt of the letter by Bosler.

If Mr. Bosler did not come there in pursuance of that letter why did they not put him on the stand again and ask him whether he was here, and whether he ever saw that statement or anything of that kind? The difficulty these gentlemen are in, from their endeavor to suppress testimony, their endeavor to suppress books, and endeavor to exclude witnesses, crops out at every turn. The plain truth, gentlemen, is that the grave-yard business will not answer in the court-room, however it may answer in the Senate Chamber, in the Post-Office Department, or in the mail business.

Let me say, gentlemen, as to this letter, that we locate it at a particular point in the letter-book, just at the close. Rerdell says the letter-book closed on the 15th of May. The sheets were there. We called upon them for the press copy of this letter of Dorsey's to Bosler, and they did not produce it. Why not? Why would they not have produced the letter, or if that letter had been torn out, why did they not come in here and show the index to it in order to show that the letter that was at those pages indicated in Rerdell's testimony was not a letter of Dorsey's to Bosler, but was some other kind of a letter? Is not the conclusion irresistible, either that that copy is still in that letter-book, or that, if it was missing, the index of that letter-book, made by Gibbs, would, under the letter B, have shown that upon that page just at the close of the book there was a letter from Dorsey to James W. Bosler? Is there any escape from that irresistible inference?

Now, gentlemen, passing over this business, I want to refer just for a few moments, and at no great length, to a little subsequent history of this matter. I turn first to the interview at the Albemarle Hotel, in June, 1881. Rerdell says, at page 2281, that he went over there about those books:

I went over there to get the original books that I had kept—I and the party who assisted me afterwards in keeping the books.

He saw Mr. James on the train.

A. After getting my breakfast I went to the room of Stephen W. Dorsey, in the Albemarle Hotel.

Q. Did you meet Mr. Dorsey on that occasion?—A. I did.

Q. State what passed between you and Mr. Dorsey on that occasion.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor understands me as objecting to this and saving an exception so far as my client is concerned.

The COURT. Yes.

A. On going up to his room I found Dorsey in bed. As soon as I got in he got up. I saw that he was very much excited as soon as he saw me. He immediately commenced saying that I had turned traitor to him, and that I had been holding interviews with the Postmaster-General and with the Attorney-General. I cannot give all he said, because I became very much excited as well as he. He was furious. I left the room. As I was going out of the room he said to me, "I wish you would come back here as soon as I get dressed, in a little while." Without replying I left and did not return to his room any more.

At page 2287 he goes a little more into detail:

He—

Dorsey—

told me that he was perfectly informed of every step that was being taken in Washington, and that he knew I had been holding interviews with Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh.

He is cautioned to give the whole conversation, and he says:

After speaking to him, and taking a seat in the front room—there were two rooms—he was in bed, and he got up and came out in his night-clothes. As soon as he got out he charged me with holding interviews with Mr. James, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, saying at the same time that he was well posted as to everything that was going on in Washington; that he knew the very day and time that I had the interviews, and asked me what I meant by it. I told him my action was in his behalf; that I had been keeping up with the newspapers, and, knowing the facts in regard to this mail business, what I had done was done in his behalf; that is, for the purpose of saving him, if possible. He cursed me then, and said damn me, he didn't want to be saved by me; that he had nothing to be saved from. That was the principal part of the conversation that I can remember.

Dorsey said he did not want to be saved by Rerdell, but he changed his opinion pretty soon, and sent him two telegrams before he got to Philadelphia, wrote him a letter the same night, and came here immediately himself and set to work with Rerdell to get up an affidavit, which I shall show you, by his own admission, was a lie:

We both got very much excited, and we quarreled awhile until I went to the door to leave, and then he said, "I want you to come back; I want to see you again."

Further on:

I told him that I had been assured by Mr. MacVeagh that if he would come over and make a full and open statement of all his connection with these post-office matters, Mr. MacVeagh would not even use him as a Government witness in the prosecution of anybody else.

That is his statement of the interview. Dorsey's statement of the interview is a little different. I find I have no direct reference to Dorsey's testimony on that point, and therefore I shall have to trust to my memory in stating it. In general terms, I think I may say, without any question, that Mr. Dorsey testifies that the interview between him and Rerdell at that time was by no means a stormy one; that he was somewhat indignant about Mr. Rerdell coming over there and neglecting his business in Washington, but generally that there was nothing such as Mr. Rerdell testified to.

And right here, gentlemen, that suggests to me the query how it should be possible for Mr. Rerdell to undertake to tell Mr. Dorsey that he had deserted his post and gone over there simply for the purpose of having a sort of pleasant good-morning kind of conversation. There seems to be no adequate reason that he could have given him for going over there at that time, unless something had occurred in accordance with what Rerdell states, and unless his motive for seeking an interview with Mr. Dorsey was substantially as he states it. I am very sorry I cannot refer, at the moment, to Mr. Dorsey's testimony in regard to that interview, but I think I have not misstated it.

That interview having occurred, Rerdell saying that they parted in anger, Dorsey saying expressly that they did not part in anger, but parted pleasantly, and Rerdell, not going back, the next thing that occurs is the dispatch from Rerdell written from Jersey City to Mr. Dorsey, and which Mr. Dorsey admits that he received, but which Mr. Dorsey, being full of the books, when he undertook orally to state it on examination by his counsel, did not get quite correct, but added at the end of it:

Send somebody to take the books.

What the dispatch was, beyond all question, was this:

The affidavit story is a lie, but confidence is gone between us. I resign my position, and will turn everything over to any one you designate.

The "affidavit story" refers to the story that Mr. Rerdell had already made an affidavit and given it to the Government. That is on page 2284. Does that look, gentlemen, as if at that interview between Dorsey and Rerdell at the Albemarle everything was peaceful? Does it not indicate that there was something that was wrong—something that had excited Mr. Dorsey? Here was Mr. Rerdell severing his connection from the man to whom he had been a faithful servant for years, cutting himself off from the only means of living he had in the world, in consequence of that interview which had broken the confidence between them. Does not that show, gentlemen, the confidence which had previously existed? Does it not show that Mr. Rerdell had said substantially, "You have hitherto trusted me; you have known everything that I did; we have acted together—I for a salary, you for the profit; but you have charged me with making an affidavit; you do not believe in the course I am pursuing; confidence is gone, and therefore I resign; I will turn over everything to anybody you send." Yet Mr. Dorsey, when he undertook to repeat that telegram, having in his mind "I will turn everything over to any one you designate," and also having the books in his mind, puts it in this way:

I will turn over the books to anybody you send.

The most tell-tale thing that he could have said as to the existence of the books and of Dorsey's knowledge that Mr. Rerdell had told the truth.

There is another passage about that telegram, at page 2440, but I do not think it substantially changes it; it was simply upon the cross-examination of Mr. Ingersoll, and I do not think makes any difference.

There is the interview, as to which their statements differ; the dispatch from Rerdell to Dorsey, as to the contents of which there is substantially no dispute, and that dispatch consistent only with the general tenor of Mr. Rerdell's statement of the interview. Before Mr. Rerdell could reach Philadelphia by that fast train which gets to Philadelphia in two hours or two and a half, Mr. Dorsey, by his own admission, had sent him two dispatches. He says upon the stand that he got that telegram from Jersey City and he sent Rerdell two dispatches.

What was in those dispatches, gentlemen? We could not show you under the rules of law. Mr. Dorsey interposed under the rules of law to prevent us showing you what was in those dispatches, and Mr. Dorsey did not undertake to tell.

The next thing is that that night Mr. Dorsey writes a letter to Mr. Rerdell. That letter is shown to have been destroyed, and Mr. Dorsey admits, I think, writing the letter. I say "I think," for I have no memorandum of where it can be found, and yet I think it is so. As to that letter Mr. Rerdell says, at page 2285:

A. I received a letter the next morning by mail.

Q. Where is that letter?—A. Stephen W. Dorsey tore it up afterwards.

Q. In whose handwriting was it?—A. In the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Q. By whom was it signed?—A. It was signed S. W. Dorsey.

Q. What were its contents?

Mr. INGERSOLL. We object.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose that is not to go as evidence against General Brady.

The COURT. No. It is evidence against nobody but Dorsey.

Of course it was not at that time. After the court ruled subsequently that we had established the conspiracy sufficiently to make the acts of one evidence against the others, of course all this evidence came in as bearing against all the defendants.

The COURT. No; that was not the point of the court in regard to that.

Mr. BLISS. No, I see; it was subsequent to the conspiracy. Therefore, so far as Mr. Brady was concerned, it being a declaration of a conspirator and in the nature of a narration, that is not evidence against anybody except against Dorsey. It did not occur to me that it was a case of narration.

The COURT. Before you pass from that point I want to ask a question. After Dorsey admitted on cross-examination that he sent two dispatches to Rerdell on the train, I do not remember whether you renewed the offer to prove those dispatches by Rerdell.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; that whole evidence was gone into. Our position was this: We did not ask Mr. Dorsey upon the stand as to the contents of those dispatches, because at that time you were—you will excuse the expression—a little strong on the collateral, and we were afraid that you would hold that that was collateral matter and we would be bound by his statement, and therefore we did not question him. After he went off the stand then we sought to prove the contents of the dispatches, after putting all those other witnesses on the stand to prove their loss, but your honor ruled that it was too late.

The COURT. It was in rebuttal. I remember very well canvassing that point in my mind a good deal.

Mr. MERRICK. It lay over and was argued a second time.

The COURT. I considered the point a good deal, whether, after Dorsey had acknowledged that he had sent two dispatches, you might not have proved the contents of those dispatches, but I did not remember that I had ruled upon that point on its merits.

Mr. MERRICK. We offered to prove it by both Rerdell and James.

Mr. BLISS. We put all those telegraph people on the stand to prove the loss of the dispatches.

The COURT. That was in rebuttal.

Mr. BLISS. The point was this: We could not prove the contents of the dispatch until we proved its loss, and we could not prove its loss until we proved that the dispatch was signed by Stephen W. Dorsey. There were no means of proving that it was signed by Stephen W. Dorsey except by his own evidence. When he came on the stand we did not dare to question him as to the contents of the dispatch, because then it might have been said we were bound by his testimony, as collateral matter. We took the alternative of not questioning him about that, thinking we might be allowed to give it in rebuttal, but your honor then ruled that we were too late.

The COURT. It all recurs to me now.

Mr. BLISS. We were in the condition, sir, of the Michigan Congressman whose classics were a little rusty, and who said he was between Silly and Carrybogus. Rerdell said this letter was destroyed——

The COURT. [Interposing.] What I meant was this: I did not want to be understood as ruling as a point of law that you might not have been able to prove the contents of the dispatch after proving that it was sent and was received by the party to whom it was proved to have been sent. But in this case it so happened that you could not prove that the dispatch was sent until on the cross-examination of the party who was the alleged sender.

Mr. BLISS. We could not prove that the dispatches that Rerdell received and showed to Mr. James, purporting to be signed by Mr. Dorsey, were in fact sent by him until Mr. Dorsey came on the stand.

The COURT. If you had been able to prove in your case that a dispatch was sent at a certain time, and that the party to whom the dispatch was sent had received it upon the train, I did not intend to be understood as ruling that you could not give evidence of the contents of that dispatch.

Mr. MERRICK. You said that in your opinion.

Mr. BLISS. Unfortunately that was not our position.

The COURT. The misfortune of your offer was that it was not in its proper place.

Mr. BLISS. And it was not in its proper place because we were afraid of the rock of collateral, and we went on the rock of rebuttal.

Mr. MERRICK. I think your honor is now on the stool of repentance.

The COURT. No; I have had no reason to change my views at all.

Mr. BLISS. We accept the situation. It is a little piece of testimony that we have not got—as to which they exercised their legal rights of preventing us from getting. It is a little piece of testimony we can well dispense with in view of the abundance that we have.

The contents of that letter that Mr. Dorsey wrote to Mr. Rerdell on the very day that he sent these two dispatches, after that Abemarle interview, as stated by Mr. Rerdell, at page 2551, are these:

A. It was dated on the 11th or 12th of June, if my memory is right; at any rate it was dated the night or the day that I left New York, because I got it the next morning. He referred in the letter to what I had stated the day before, and to the fact that I might not get back there, I think, to the hotel; wanted to know if I intended to ruin him and his wife and children; and begged me to take no further steps until he could see me; and he refused to accept my resignation. Now, I never read the letter but once, and laid it on my desk, and that is as near as I can give the substance.

Q. You read it but once?—A. I don't think I read it but once. I read it to my brother or showed it to him; I don't know whether I showed it to him or gave it to him to read—who was here at that time.

And we subsequently, at the wrong time—we made some blunders, gentlemen—offered to examine his brother as to that letter which he said his brother saw, but that offer was, in consonance with the legal rights of the defendants, excluded.

The next thing that occurred in process of time was that Mr. Dorsey two or three days afterwards came over here, and he had here an interview with Mr. Rerdell, who says, at page 2288, that on the Sunday morning following he saw Mr. Dorsey, and I think Mr. Dorsey fixes it on the same day:

Q. Where did you see him?—A. I saw him at his house, 1121 I street, in this city.

Q. How did it happen that you saw him?—A. He telegraphed me to meet him there that morning.

Q. Where— A. [Interposing.] From New York.

I think that was struck out.

Q. Will you state in substance, as nearly as you can recollect, what passed between you and him?—A. I went to his house between 11 and 12 o'clock on Sunday morning—I had forgotten my key and left it at home—and I rang the door-bell.

Q. What key do you mean?—A. The key to the office; to go down in the office. I rang the door-bell; Mr. Dorsey came to the door; he shook me by the hand and says, "Come down-stairs." We walked down in the office together, when he immediately brought up the conversation that we had had over in New York, and what I had done by going to Mr. MacVeagh, and asked me if I intended to ruin him. I said no, I did not; it was not my intention to ruin him; it was my intention to help him out of what I thought to be a bad difficulty.

Q. What did he say?—A. He then asked me if I had done anything further since I had left him; I said no, I had not; I had not been near Mr. MacVeagh. He then says, "Well, how shall we get out of this?" I says, "Mr. Dorsey, I will do anything that I can except to commit perjury." He says, "Damn it, what does that amount to when a friend's fate is at stake?" He says, "I wouldn't hesitate a moment; I have been your friend for long years; I have stood by you here; I took you from the District government when I knew that you would lose your place after I was out of the Senate, and I will be a friend to you from now on." Tears were in his eyes. He took me by both hands and said, "Rerdell, for God's sake, don't ruin me and my children, and particularly at this time; to be torn down from the height I now occupy," he said, "would be death to my wife." I allowed myself to be completely overcome, and committed an act, God knows, that no act of mine will ever cover up.

Q. What act do you refer to?—A. I promised there, and did do it—I made an affidavit retracting all that I had said to Mr. MacVeagh and Mr. James—denying all that I had said.

That testimony was given by Mr. Rerdell on the stand in such a manner and under such circumstances that you must be satisfied that he was either telling the truth or that he was a most finished actor.

On page 2494, on cross-examination, after referring to the fact that Dorsey had stated to him that the Government had no evidence except what Rerdell had furnished, we find this :

Q. What did he say after he said that they had no evidence except what you had furnished?—A. He said “The only way to get out of this is to make a retraction.”

Q. Did you offer to make the retraction, or did he suggest it?—A. He suggested it; I did not offer to make it.

Q. Then what did you say?—A. Then, I think, was the time I said that I would do anything in the world for him I could except commit perjury.

Q. Did you mean by that false swearing?—A. Except false swearing; I did not know what it was then.

If it had been Miner, gentlemen, he would have told you that it was not perjury, as it was not in the eye of the law, and it did not make any difference in the eye of the law as long as it was not perjury. That was Miner’s position on that question.

Q. Then he gave you his view on that crime?—A. He did.

Q. What was that?—A. He says, “Damn it, what does that amount to when a friend’s fate is at stake,” or words to that effect. He said he wouldn’t hesitate a moment in a case of that kind.

Q. What did you say then?—A. He caught me by both hands—

Q. [Interposing.] But what did you say?—A. I don’t remember that I said anything; I probably was thinking over what he had said to me.

Q. Then he caught you by both hands—about the same as MacVeagh did?—A. I did not say that MacVeagh caught me by both hands.

Q. You did not; I forgot that. Go on, then—go on.

The witness then said there was an attempt to put words in his mouth, and afterwards continued :

A. Taking hold of both my hands, he said, “Rerdell, for God’s sake, would you ruin me and ruin my family?” and he referred to the position that he occupied politically at that time; that he had been feeling himself standing very high politically—

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey did stand high politically down to shortly after the administration of General Garfield came into power, when this interview took place—and to be hurled down from that it would be the death of his wife. He spoke of his children, the disgrace it would be to them, and said that the retraction of this thing would be the end of it—the retraction of my statement to MacVeagh would be the end of the whole thing.

Q. Did he say anything to you about how it would affect your family?—A. He did not. I don’t suppose he ever let my wife and children cross his mind at any time.

Q. Go on.—A. I promised him then that I would make a retraction.

Q. Then did you write it out?—A. Then the next day I wrote out, at his request—that evening we talked a little as to what would be the course to pursue. He says, “The first thing you do is to sit down and write out a full statement of what you have done and said, and what MacVeagh and James and all of them have done and said.” The next day I did that.

Then, on page 2288, after referring to that same conversation, he says :

Q. Did any one come in before you left there that day?—A. Yes, sir; I think about 2 o’clock that day Mr. Bosler came in.

Mr. Bosler, gentlemen, comes in everywhere, except at the point where, in a critical moment, if the story of Rerdell were not true, he could do some good to the defendants. But he comes into this court-room, and he walks out of this court-room. These gentlemen do not invite him to go upon that stand and give his testimony, which he could give if Mr. Rerdell were not telling the truth.

At some stage here—I have not a reference to it, but my recollection is that Mr. Rerdell again refers to Mr. Bosler in this connection, and tells something about Mr. Bosler having indicated to him in some kind of a way that he had been instrumental in having somebody get out of a statement that he had made. He says that Mr. Bosler said that when somebody had once made a statement that he wished to get rid of, the arrangement was made that he should say that he was acting as a detective in his original statement, and was trying to draw out the others, and that the statement that he made while acting as detective was false; and that that was adopted as the theory on which this affidavit that Mr. Dorsey got him to make was gotten up. That is his statement as to Mr. Bosler. If that was not true, gentlemen, why was not James W. Bosler brought here and asked to answer? Bear in mind Bosler is one of these confederates, though I do not say a criminal confederate. I use the word "confederate" and not "conspirator."

Bosler shared in these profits. Bosler, from the spring of 1879, was in charge of this business. Bosler is the man who, representing Dorsey and the defendants, received the money that was necessary, carried the business on as Dorsey's representative, and finally, in November last, Bosler is the man who settled with Dorsey down to that time, got his money out from the business, and closed the matter up. And if there were any fragments of it left—the business having ended by the ending of the service on the 1st of July, 1882, and the settling up naturally not being completed until a few weeks afterward—he turned over everything that was left of it to Stephen W. Dorsey. Rerdell says that Bosler, Dorsey's associate, engaged in this business, suggested the theory of playing detective and getting up the affidavit upon that theory. He says that that was his idea. And Mr. Bosler they did not examine. You cannot expect us, gentlemen, to examine Mr. Bosler. You cannot expect us to put Mr. Bosler upon the stand and ask him about this. From the experience we have had of these defendants on the stand there was certainly danger that he might undertake to deny the whole thing. At any rate, we were not called upon to expose ourselves to any such danger, to expose ourselves to having it said, "Why, your own witness told you that that was not so." The burden was upon them, beyond all question, to call Mr. Bosler, if he could contradict Mr. Rerdell; but they did not call him.

As to those affidavits, gentlemen, I have said that I did not propose to go into a detailed examination of them. In the affidavit of June, 1881, Mr. Rerdell starts off by saying, in his direct examination, that yielding to the appeal of S. W. Dorsey he did what he shall ever regret—he did make an affidavit which was false. He says that is so. They want you to believe that that affidavit was true, so Mr. Bosler could have confirmed it at nearly every point; could have confirmed the history of its inception, its manufacture, its issue. They want you to believe it, though the central point around which the affidavit revolves is proved to you beyond all question, so far as the statement of the affidavit is concerned, to be false. The affidavit says no such books ever existed. Yet Donnelly and Gibbs, both of them, swear to you that they did exist. That is the central point around which that affidavit is made to revolve—that no such books existed. Have you any question now, can any of you have any question, that those books did exist? I leave out of question entirely the other point, as to whether Dorsey knew of their existence. Can you have any doubt after the evidence of Donnelly and Gibbs; after the disclosure of the fact that Mrs. Gibbs could have been brought here to contradict it? Was there any question after Mr. Dorsey referred to that telegram, saying that Mr. Rerdell proposed to turn the books over to somebody he should send? As to that affidavit which they want you to believe was true, but which Mr.

Rerdell says was false, and which Mr. Rerdell says was gotten up in the way he details (he having first written out a statement of the true occurrences, and then the contents having been changed and manufactured by Dorsey), take out of that affidavit everything that relates to the existence of the books, and practically the affidavit would cease to be the thing important. And yet when you admit that the books existed, that affidavit, in its real purport, is utterly gone. Mr. Rerdell is correct. He said that, yielding to the influence of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, he made an affidavit which was false. He did, beyond all question. Mr. Bosler, as I have said, could settle very much of that. They do not dare to produce him.

As to this affidavit, gentlemen, there is another matter which I, perhaps, ought to have something to say about, but I have left behind me one sheet of my memorandum, and at the risk of consuming a very little time upon that point to-morrow morning, I now pass over it. I am talking about the affidavit of June, 1881. That is a thing important only as showing that Rerdell made contradictory statements, and he begins by saying that he did. He does not deny that he did. He made that affidavit under the influence of Stephen W. Dorsey, and it does not lie in Dorsey's mouth to throw up that affidavit against him; it does not lie in his mouth to undertake to say that it is a true affidavit when in point of fact it is shown to be false so far as the books are concerned, and Rerdell says it is false in a large number of other particulars, when he makes a statement as to the way in which it was gotten up utterly inconsistent with the idea of its truth, and when Mr. Bosler was part and parcel of the getting up in very many particulars, and when he could have been brought here to say whether Mr. Rerdell or Mr. Dorsey is now correct.

But, after all, gentlemen, the question is simply this: whether Mr. Rerdell has told the truth here on the stand. I submit to you, gentlemen, that in everything that is in that affidavit, everything that is sought to be contradicted or alleged to be contradicted by that affidavit, everything essential is proved to be true by the evidence before you—evidence outside of that, evidence outside of Mr. Rerdell, evidence which is in this case and running through it from beginning to end; that there is not any escape from the fact that the books existed, and all that the existence of the books involved I have already called your attention to in connection with the evidence of the corruption of Mr. Brady and in connection with the evidence of the corruption of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Passing, gentlemen, then, from the affidavit—reserving the matter to which I referred a moment ago, as to which I may have something to say in the morning—we come to another branch of this case. Mr. Rerdell said that on one occasion he was present when Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey drew money, which he stated, I think, at $7,000. I do not think he states that he saw the precise amount of money, though he subsequently learned in some way, I think from the stubs the amount, and he says it was $7,000; that Mr. Dorsey having drawn that money, whatever it was, went to the Post-Office Department and went into Mr. Brady's room; that he did not go in there with him. There was a good deal of indignation upon that subject when Mr. Rerdell testified, and they undertook to say that by showing all the checks they were going to convince you that that could not be true.

In the first place, Mr. Rerdell did not pretend to say that that was a check upon Middleton's bank. There was at the same time, he thought, some money drawn out of the Citizens' Bank, and he said also that Dorsey was in the habit of getting money upon checks drawn upon New York and other places, and it appeared affirmatively that Mr. Dorsey kept bank accounts with two bankers in New York. However that may be, they themselves put in a check here for $7,500, drawn about the time Mr. Rerdell spoke of, the money upon which admittedly went to Stephen W. Dorsey, though there is a question raised as to whether it was drawn in Mr. Rerdell's presence or whether it was not drawn by him. But the money went to Stephen W. Dorsey, and there was a promise made to show you what was done with that $7,500. But, like many another promise in this case, it remains unfulfilled to-day. No evidence was given as to what Stephen W. Dorsey was wanting just at that time with $7,500 in bills. Of course all that transaction might have occurred precisely as Mr. Rerdell testified, and there might have involved no corruption on Mr. Brady's part. The drawing of the money and going to Mr. Brady's room might have been a mere accident, as a call thereto attend to some other business. Of course that is not conclusive. It is only a little straw in this case as showing a transaction of that kind involved in connection with all the evidence you have in this case—evidence of Mr. Brady's acts, and particularly as at the time when that occurs evidence in connection with the large increases which Mr. Brady was then ordering; evidence in connection with the books, and the evidence they bear; evidence in connection with the declarations of Brady to Walsh—evidence all consistent. Mr. Dorsey was not taking $7,500 in bills to the West; he was not doing things of that kind; he could get his checks cashed at the West. Judge Bissell was willing to take Mr. Dorsey's checks for a couple of thousand dollars. He could have taken bills of exchange, certified checks, &c. But just at that time Mr. Dorsey wanted $7,500 in bills, and he got them. It may have been for a perfectly proper purpose, but in view of the evidence of Mr. Dorsey's acts, of Mr. Brady's acts, and of the relations between Dorsey and Brady, I submit that it is, to say the least, an exceedingly suspicious transaction. With reference to that, gentlemen, bear in mind that they have not accounted for all the checks in that check-book that month. Admittedly there are some of the series gone which they admit did exist. And they have not proved what they were. There was some declaration by counsel here, but there is no evidence in the record. Bear in mind, too, that there is a break; that there seems to be a series of checks running to somewhere about 200 in the numbering, and then there is a break between there and the 500's. They have not proved that they have produced to you or accounted to you for all the checks even drawn upon Middleton & Co. during that month of June, I think it was. They promised that they would prove it, and they got these other checks in on the statement that they would supplement that with the evidence as to what those checks were, but they have not proved it.

I have come back again to the same statement; it is the withholding of testimony; it is the graveyard principle brought into the court-room with the hope that you are stupid enough to be imposed upon by it. There is nothing in it; there cannot be anything. At any rate, there is nothing in it that disposes in any way of Mr. Rerdell's statement. And yet I say to you in entire frankness that his statement as to that transaction is a thing that we look at merely as a straw in the way, and not as anything that we should ask you to make your verdict turn upon.

I think I can say to your honor that, beyond all question, I will close by the recess to-morrow.

The COURT. We have received some light upon the subject. Adjourn the court until to-morrow morning.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, I congratulate you and myself that I have arrived somewhere near the close of this long address. I desire at the outset to-day to call your attention to a few references as showing how thoroughly and how constantly Mr. James W. Bosler pervades a large portion of this case, and how valuable he would have been as a witness had the other side chosen to favor us with his testimony. They told us, on page 3947, on the authority of no less a person than Stephen W. Dorsey, under oath on the stand:

You will have a chance to ask Mr. Bosler about it. Perhaps he can give you more of the details.

We had that distinct promise that we should have a chance to ask Mr. Bosler. In their anxiety to find out where one of our witnesses had been during the recess they asked him on another day whom he had seen during the recess, and he said he had met Mr. Bosler "out there," as was his expression. Mr. Dorsey also told you that Mr. Bosler had been here nearly every week during this trial, and that he had been constantly at his house. He also told you of Mr. Bosler's interest in the case, and his pecuniary interest in the routes, and how he had been practically interested in them by having for many months a large share of the profits and advancing money. He promised that Mr. Bosler should be produced, and that we should have an opportunity to question him. The evidence that he was here, the evidence that he was weekly or daily at Mr. Dorsey's house, all those facts were in the case, and yet they did not put Mr. Bosler upon the stand. Running through roughly, let me show you the different points as to which Mr. Bosler could have thrown light upon this case. He was present at the interview at Chamberlin's in August, 1880, which Mr. Rerdell said he was told related to the question of fines and remissions. On that very day I have already shown you that applications for the remission of fines were made, which the record shows were subsequently granted. Mr. Dorsey tells you that Mr. Bosler got Mr. Rerdell to make the affidavit of June, 1881—his first affidavit. Mr. Rerdell says that he took these contested books that he kept to New York in the spring of 1880 for a settlement to be had between Stephen W. Dorsey and James W. Bosler. If those books had not existed if those books had not then been shown to Mr. Bosler, would not Mr. Bosler have been brought here and have denied that fact? Rerdell was asked over and over again on the stand if he did not tell Mr. Bosler certain things. He said he did not. They did not bring Mr. Bosler here to contradict him. There was a transaction also into which they went somewhat into detail. There was an allegation that Dorsey came into a room and found Rerdell and Bosler there, and that Rerdell picked out of a scrap-basket certain papers which he alleged he had drawn in imitation of the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Rerdell denied it. Mr. Bosler could have told you whether that was true or not. Mr.

Bosler was not produced. Mr. Dorsey tells you that when he came here in June, 1881, after the famous Albemarle Hotel interview, he came expecting to meet Mr. Bosler. He could not say whether he asked him or sent to him to come or not, but he thinks it very probable he did. He requested Bosler to see Rerdell after he came here. He said in the first place, that he had nothing to do with making up the affidavit, and then he said that Bosler may have come to him for suggestions as to the affidavit. With reference to a particular clause, he says Mr. Bosler suggested it. All through with regard to the preparation of that affidavit Mr. Dorsey states one thing and Mr. Rerdell states another. I say Mr. Dorsey states one thing. I think I will show you directly that Mr. Dorsey stated two contradictory things. He constantly contradicted Mr. Rerdell and Mr. Rerdell equally contradicted him. They both of them say that Mr. Bosler, the man whom Dorsey promised we should have a chance to question on the stand; the man who was his partner and friend, and was here at his house constantly during this trial, could have explained those questions. They have not produced him. They did not dare to produce him, gentlemen. When we come down to the affidavit of 1882 Mr. Rerdell says Mr. Dorsey took him from here after court to Willard's Hotel, and Mr. Bosler was there, or came in immediately afterward. Mr. Dorsey says that he did not go there as stated by Rerdell, but that he went there by an appointment to meet Bosler, with Rerdell. He says Bosler was present all that time, and that the affidavit of 1882 was largely gotten up for the protection of Bosler. You remember Bosler's name appears in it several times. He states at one time that it was not the purpose of Bosler and himself to do so and so, and he also goes into reasons why, when Mr. Bosler's name had been left out in a particular place, it was added. All that, gentlemen, shows Mr. Bosler's connection with this case from the Albemarle Hotel interview all the way down through the preparation of both those affidavits, in the Chamberlin interview, and as the owner of or interested in the contracts, and taking a considerable portion of the profits. Though they promised us to produce him, though they led us to believe he would be on the stand, and though we believed that promise would be fulfilled, Mr. Bosler left here just before they closed, and they did not seek to put him on the stand. Now, gentlemen, what inference can be drawn from that? What inference can be drawn, except the inference that Mr. Bosler told them "Here, my friends, if you put me on the stand, I am not going to perjure myself. I settled up my interest in these contracts last November, I have got my money back, and I have got my profits in my pocket, and I am in no danger in any way. I am not going on the stand and going to perjure myself to assist you. I will be glad to help you in any way in my power, but you must not ask me to go to that extent." Is not that the only possible, the only consistent, inference to be drawn? I submit to you that it is.

Now, one word as to the truth of the affidavit of June, 1881. I told you it was not true on its face. It was not true, because it referred to books as not existing, as a central point, while the books existed beyond all question. But there is another thing in it that I want to call to your attention as showing that the affidavit is not true: The statement of what Mr. Rerdell is alleged to have told Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh is inconsistent with the statement of Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh here. They say he did not tell them any such things. For instance, without going into details, there is in the affidavit considerable about Jennings, who was a subcontractor on the Mineral Park route, and his claim upon the Government. Mr. James says that nothing was said to him in any manner at that interview upon that subject. The affidavit cannot be true, and yet, gentlemen, I call your attention to one passage in it which it is worth while for you to know, and which Mr. Dorsey and his counsel here insist is a correct statement, because they insist the affidavit is correct. It is that Mr. Rerdell was acquainted with all of Dorsey's money transactions.

Now, gentlemen, let us take this affidavit of June, 1881, in another point of view, as showing the action of these defendants. Mr. Dorsey tells you, on page 3730, that the affidavit of June, 1881, was not made at his request, and that Rerdell proposed to make an affidavit, or rather to make a statement in writing, or an affidavit. Then Dorsey goes on:

He did make it, and after it was made he brought it, I think, up to my house, to the upper part of the house where I was staying. It is possible that he made it in the office below, but not at my suggestion, not at my request, and not at my direction in any way.

Mr. Rerdell says that he wrote out a statement of the transaction precisely as it had taken place between MacVeagh and James and himself, and that he took it to Mr. Dorsey, and that Mr. Dorsey then took it and altered it over into the affidavit as it now appears, putting in a part, changing a part, and everything of that kind. As to all those questions Mr. Bosler would have been a very valuable witness. Now, on page 3739 of Mr. Dorsey's testimony:

Q. I will ask you if you wrote these words as a part of the statement afterwards sworn to by Mr. Rerdell:

“WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1881.

“MR. PRESIDENT: I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness that I should make to you the following statement under oath.”

Did you write that as a part of that statement, or furnish that sentence?

Mr. Dorsey said to that question, “No, sir.” He says, on page 3733, that he neither suggested nor wrote a single word in that affidavit from beginning to end. He repeats that again in various forms, and on page 3792 I find this testimony:

I think I asked you before whether you made or suggested any part of that statement of June 20 or 21, 1881?—A. I did not; any line or word in it. It is barely possible I may have suggested punctuation or something of that sort.

Q. Do you remember that?—A. I do not even remember that.

He says afterwards he does not believe he prepared any part of it. “Bosler may have come to me for suggestions as to it. I don't remember taking the statement from Rerdell and interpolating or adding anything to it.” Then he was asked the troublesome question:

How came it to be addressed to the President?

And his answer was:

Well, I want to confer with my counsel.

The witness on the stand sworn to tell the truth and the whole truth wanted to confer with his counsel before answering a question of that kind, which certainly related to the truth, however the answer may have been. He wanted to consult with his counsel. Of course the court refused him that liberty. Then he went on and said:

My recollection is that after the affidavit was made and sworn to I sent for Colonel Ingersoll and submitted it to him.

That is his recollection. Then he says, later on, at page 3986:

In consequence of that, the affidavit was addressed to the President of the United States.

Having sworn that he had nothing to do with getting it up, having sworn that he had written no word or line in it, he saw very clearly when he came to reflect, that the idea that Mr. Rerdell got up of his own motion this affidavit; that he addressed it to the President; that he interspersed through it references "to your Administration," "to your Cabinet," and "to you, Mr. President,"—that the idea that Rerdell got all that up of his own motion with the idea that Mr. Dorsey was to do as he afterwards did, take that affidavit to the President, and he, the accused, seek to have removed without his standing trial, the sworn officers who in the performance of their duty were seeking to put him on trial—to say that Mr. Rerdell of his own motion, with no suggestion from Stephen W. Dorsey, framed that affidavit in that way and addressed it to the President was too shallow a thing to be imposed upon anybody. When Mr. Dorsey came to reflect upon it and under the crucial cross-examination of Mr. Merrick, first having sworn that he prepared no word or line in it, he says he sent for Colonel Ingersoll after it was made and sworn to, and that in consequence of that, the words "to the President" were inserted. He says the words "to the President" were introduced apparently with the idea of a suggestion of simply adding a heading to the affidavit. It begins:

Mr. PRESIDENT. I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness that I should make to you the following statement under oath:

He says after it was made and sworn to those words were introduced, and that it was not originally addressed to the President of the United States. Then we go a little further down and we find this which they say was put in afterwards, the body of it remaining unchanged:

I therefore in my heart and conscience justify myself in the course I have taken in this matter, by deeming it right and proper that I should by every means in my power show to you—and to the world the degradation and shame brought upon your Administration by the action of two members of your Cabinet, by attempting to seduce, bribe, and corrupt the confidential agent and clerk of Mr. Dorsey so as to compass his ruin and disgrace.

The President—

The intimation is that the words "to the President" were added, and also those words lower down at the end:

Were those words written after you saw Colonel Ingersoll?—A. I think not, sir.

Q. Were they not written after the beginning of the affidavit with the words "Mr. President?"

The WITNESS. There is something that precedes that, is there not?

Mr. MERRICK. There is a good deal that precedes it. I have read you the last clause of the affidavit.

A. Then it must have been written after the beginning, if it was not written at the beginning.

Q. Was it not written after the affidavit had been handed over to you as complete by Mr. Rerdell?—A. I don't think it was.

Q. Were those words in Rerdell's original draft of that affidavit according to your statement of what that draft was?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Were they not written in the affidavit after the words "Mr. President" were put at the head of the affidavit?—A. I cannot tell you that.

Q. Have you any recollection about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was the original affidavit, as you have described it as written by Mr. Rerdell, intended for the President or for the public?—A. I do not remember that.

Q. Do you not remember that you directed that the affidavit should be addressed to the President of the United States?—A. That is possible. I thought he was the proper man to read it.

Q. Then that part of the affidavit which is addressed to the President of the United States was written under your direction?—A. I presume that before the affidavit was sworn to—

Now, it is before the affidavit was sworn to. On the preceding page his recollection was that after the affidavit was made and sworn to he sent for Colonel Ingersoll. On this page he comes down to his presumption, and he presumes it was before the affidavit was sworn to—and when the original draft was made, I may have suggested the insertion of the name of the President of the United States, and addressing the affidavit to him. I think that is possible, but I don't remember about that.

Q. Did you not swear in your examination-in-chief that you had neither written nor suggested a single word of that affidavit?—A. That is my recollection now.

He recollects then, after it was made and sworn to, sending for Colonel Ingersoll and those words at the beginning being added. After that he then presumes it was changed in another place before it was sworn to, and now he recollects that he neither made nor suggested a single word in the affidavit.

Q. That you never did write or suggest anything in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now you say, however, that you presume you may have suggested that.—A. I say it is possible.

Mr. MERRICK. Everything is possible.

The WITNESS. I know it. Even this trial is possible.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; even this trial. You may forget it in a short time, but I think the jury will give you some reminder of it.

Q. What is your best recollection of your having suggested parts of that affidavit?—

A. I have told you repeatedly over and over again that I have no recollection on that subject.

That is as to the words "Mr. President:"

Well, I say it may be possible. All things are possible. If that suggestion was made, in my belief it was made by Mr. Bosler.

Now we have got Mr. Bosler making suggestions as to the alterations.

Q. Was Mr. Bosler present at your interview with Mr. Ingersoll?—A. No, sir; he was not.

Q. Then what do you mean by saying it was inserted after your interview with Mr. Ingersoll?—A. I have not said that absolutely.

Q. Have you not?—A. I said I thought it was; I think so yet.

He says all that, gentlemen, when you remember he had sworn just before that he never altered nor suggested a word or line in that affidavit, and that he never had anything to do with it. He might have said something about punctuation, but that was all. When he came to the cross-examination that man on the stand saw that it was impossible to make you believe that that affidavit, as originally drawn, was addressed to the President unless it was drawn at his instigation, as he had said all along that the paper was, in its general scope, in its form, and in its contents, the emanation of Mr. Rerdell's brain, and that he had not altered it, while Mr. Rerdell said he had altered it in nearly every respect. He saw, when his attention was directed to its being addressed to the President, it would have been too absurd to try to make you believe that Mr. Rerdell had of his own motion gotten that up, and therefore he was driven to all these makeshifts and all these alterations of his position: first, of not having suggested anything; second, after it was made and sworn to, of sending for Mr. Ingersoll and getting those things put in; third, of presuming that they were put in after it was made and before it was sworn to; and, fourth, of believing that Mr. Bosler made the suggestions. Now, gentlemen, there is a little passage in that affidavit to which Mr. Merrick did not call his attention. Perhaps it is as well that he did not call his attention to it, because he would undoubtedly have felt bound to get up some theory that would account for it. He could account in this way for the affidavit having the heading to the President added afterwards. He could account in this way for the affidavit having at the end this final clause, this snapper, so to speak, which shows it referred "to your Cabinet" and to your "administration." The affidavit commences right here [indicating] and covers about three pages of print. After passing two pages comes the paragraph which I will read, and after I have read it I will ask you how that came there if Mr. Dorsey was telling the truth when he said that that affidavit was not made under his direction or at his instigation:

He also said that you, Mr. President, had told Mr. Dorsey you could not interfere in this investigation and prosecution; that if you did the public would say that the President and a Secretary, who shall be nameless, but whose name I could guess, had taken the money of the star-route ring while they were in Congress, or the Postmaster-General and Attorney-General had taken it since, and therefore he (Dorsey) must look to the courts for vindication.

That was right in the body of the affidavit. It was said of a famous bill in Congress that there was a stump speech in the belly of the bill. Right there in the belly of that affidavit is that appeal to the President. The whole affidavit was an attack upon the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General, but was accompanied with a slur, charged to have emanated from Mr. Garfield's own lips, upon another member of his Cabinet, who, the affidavit says, shall be nameless, but whose name he, Rerdell, could guess. I apprehend that nobody could have any doubt as to who it was intended to throw a stigma upon by that paragraph. Right in the body of that affidavit is that statement, showing that the very frame-work of the affidavit was gotten up on the theory of its being addressed to the President, and that the story that the beginning and the end were afterwards added in any one of the four ways which Mr. Dorsey asks you to believe, and which he states upon the stand, is not and cannot be true. The affidavit was made, gentlemen, by somebody who intended to use it with the President, who dictated its form, who dictated the words that are there, who dictated the statements that are there. That affidavit, gentlemen, I think you will believe was so dictated, so framed and so formed by the man who himself did subsequently undertake to use it with the President. There is all the internal evidence on the subject, there is all the evidence derived from the statement of Mr. Dorsey on the stand, and there was only one man who could have saved Mr. Dorsey from the position of contradicting himself, and that was Mr. James W. Bosler. If he had come here and said that he did that, that the last statement of Mr. Dorsey was correct, and that he made the suggestions, that he transformed the affidavit, it might have saved Mr. Dorsey from the position in which he now stands. But even then, gentlemen, it would have been entirely inconsistent with the idea that the affidavit was the production of Mr. Rerdell's brain, because whatever might have been said about the first and last words, that paragraph in the middle shows very clearly that the whole affidavit was a consistent one from beginning to end, intended to make a charge against MacVeagh and James, and to be used with the President as a means of getting them removed.

And yet, gentlemen, it occurs to me that I may as well, before going further, call your attention to one passage in that as showing what Mr. Dorsey's view is. The affidavit says:

His—

urging me repeatedly to obtain these books, substantially by stealing them from Mr. Dorsey's office in New York, alarmed me beyond measure. I could not believe it possible that the Attorney-General of the United States would advise and urge anybody to commit what, in its very nature, must have been the gravest of felonies, including both larceny and burglary. I however promised I would do so.

Now, that is his statement, and yet, gentlemen, when Mr. Dorsey is afterwards asked what he has to say of that, he says it was true; he says that was just what Mr. MacVeagh was having done—committing burglary and larceny—and yet he was committing burglary or larceny of Mr. Dorsey's books, according to that affidavit, and yet those books were the very books which he tells you on the stand here he never saw or heard of, and they were not his. He complained to the President that the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General were instigating the stealing of books, and yet those books he says were never heard of, and they were not his; he never heard of them until after this interview. And, gentlemen, Mr. Dorsey dropped out—I neglected to call your attention to it before—a very significant thing when he was asked about the telegram that Mr. Rerdell sent to him from Jersey City. He says Mr. Rerdell sent him the telegram in which he said he had been faithful up to that point, and then Mr. Dorsey could not resist saying, what he knew was the fact, "And yet he had my stolen book under his arm at that time." That is one of those unconscious admissions of the truth of Mr. Rerdell's story, of the truth of the fact that those books existed.

The COURT. Where is that?

Mr. BLISS. I am going to say a word about that, and then I will give you a reference. But it was not until his attention was called to it, that after that, as he says—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Let us have the reference.

Mr. BLISS. I will give you the reference. It is page 3980. He is under examination by Mr. Merrick:

Q. You say that he told you that all this was false, and you believed it?—A. Yes, sir; his own telegrams show that.

Q. I have not asked you to construe them. His own telegram says that the affidavit story is a lie?—A. Yes, sir; and that he had been faithful to every trust; and yet he had a stolen book under his arm.

Q. He had?—A. According to his statement.

That is the transaction. It was a little slip. No man can go on the stand and stay there under cross-examination without occasionally letting a little truth slip out.

He tells you, gentlemen, also that at the interview at the hotel not a word was said about an affidavit, and yet he acknowledges that Mr. Rerdell, after getting back to Jersey City, sends him a dispatch in which he says:

The affidavit story is a lie.

Mind you, Rerdell had made no affidavit at that time; nobody pretends that he had. Rerdell says that Dorsey told him that he had heard that he had made an affidavit, but Mr. Dorsey says not a word was said about an affidavit, and yet he says, with reference to this same telegram, that he did receive it, and Mr. Rerdell says in that:

The affidavit story is a lie.

Do you believe that Mr. Rerdell would have gone back to Jersey City and written a dispatch and sent it, saying that the affidavit story was a lie, if there had not something passed as to an affidavit?

Now, gentlemen, passing on, with reference to this affidavit he says what I have read to you, about the way the words "To the President" came in, and all that, and then we find how the gentlemen who constructed this affidavit proposed to use it. He says, on page 3988:

Q. Was it not arranged that this affidavit should be so prepared as to present to the President of the United States serious charges and accusations against MacVeagh and James?—A. The affidavit, if it had come from a worthy source, did present charges of that kind.

Q. I do not understand that answer.—A. I say the affidavit itself on its face, had it come from a worthy source, presents accusations of that kind.

Q. You considered that it did not come from a worthy source?—A. Undoubtedly I did.

Q. Did you give it credit?—A. I gave it credit from the collateral evidence I had.

Q. How did you know what had passed between him and James and MacVeagh?—

A. Well, I had heard from many sources.

Q. You had heard?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The affidavit accuses James and MacVeagh of having stimulated him, as he says here, to both burglary and larceny in stealing your books.—A. That is the right came for it.

Q. That is the word used in the affidavit. Did you not present that affidavit to the President of the United States, and ask his official action upon it to remove James and MacVeagh?—A. Well, I was in hopes that we would remove them.

It is printed "we"; I do not know whether that is an error or not. It does not make any difference whether it is "we" or "he."

Q. Did you not present the affidavit as a truthful representation of the misconduct of his ministers, and ask him to remove them on account of that misconduct?—A. I presented the affidavit, and General Garfield, in the presence of Governor Foster, of Ohio, and Colonel Ingersoll, stated that James and MacVeagh had made almost the exact statement contained in that affidavit to him—

Do you believe that, gentlemen? Do you believe that James and MacVeagh had told General Garfield that they had proposed to Mr. Rerdell to commit burglary and larceny?

and I considered it his duty—

Says Mr. Dorsey—

And he ought to have removed them right then and there.

Q. Did you not present this affidavit to him and demand their removal upon the face of that affidavit?

It should be "upon the faith of that affidavit" undoubtedly.

A. I never *demand*ed the removal of a Cabinet officer.

Q. Did you not present it to him and say to him that those men had behaved as this affidavit set forth, and they ought to be removed?—A. Well, if I did not say so, my tongue did not know its cunning.

"Did not know its cunning," gentlemen? Of what was Stephen W. Dorsey accused, engaged in an honest business, that he had got to bring in his cunning tongue to bring about the results he wished?

Q. That is what you used it for, is it not?—A. I used it to prevent what I believed to be a most vicious, unlawful, and improper act on the part of two executive officers of this Government.

To instigate a prosecution against men like Stephen W. Dorsey and Thomas J. Brady are shown here to be.

Q. That was what you wanted it for, was it not?—A. That was one of the things.

Q. Your protection consisted in the removal of MacVeagh and James, as you regarded it at that time, did it not?

The WITNESS. My protection?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

He had said at an earlier stage that he wanted the affidavit for his protection.

A. Whenever I seek to be protected by men like those, I should prefer to retire from the country.

I hope, gentlemen, you will give him the opportunity.

Q. I did not ask you about being protected by men like those. You said you came on here to protect yourself against Rerdell. Did you not get an affidavit from Rerdell assailing MacVeagh and James, and did you not consider that their removal from the Cabinet was the protection necessary in your case?—A. Oh, I do not know about that. I did not know that a pismire could very much hurt an elephant.

I suppose that he means that Rerdell was the pismire and himself the elephant. There is his statement of what he did. At an earlier stage, at page 3984, he says :

Q. What day was it that you and Colonel Ingersoll went to see the President after this affidavit was made?

The WITNESS. What day of the month?

Mr. MERRICK. Or week.

A. Well, I will not pretend to say what day of the week it was. It was several days after the affidavit was sworn to.

Q. Was it several days after the affidavit got into your hands?—A. I am not sure about that.

Q. Was it not the very next day after it got into your hands?—A. Perhaps it was.

Q. Was it the same day it got into your hands?—A. No, sir; because we made an appointment.

Q. Did you not make an appointment just as soon as you got it into your hands?—

A. I don't remember about that.

Q. Were you anxious to get that affidavit?—A. Well, I thought it was a desirable thing to have.

Q. Was not the getting of that affidavit the means that you were taking to protect yourself against this man?—A. That would appear so after I became acquainted with the character of the man.

Having dodged the question as to its being one of the objects of getting the affidavit and taking it to the President to protect himself, saying, "I don't know about that," here he comes back before the Presidential matter is raised, and says that it was the object to protect himself against this man. Following this along, at page 3989, as bearing upon this matter, he says in reply to a question:

A. If there was anything that I could do that I did not do to get MacVeagh out of office I have forgotten it.

Q. That being so, did you not arrange to get an affidavit from Rerdell charging MacVeagh and James with official delinquency or improper official conduct, in order to lay it before the President as a basis of his official action in removing them?—

A. I did not arrange anything about it. I laid it before the President, and, in my belief, if he had lived a week longer, he would have been removed, as he ought to have been.

I have already commented upon that statement.

Q. Was not that the purpose you had in view when you got the affidavit?—A. I stated some time ago that that was one of the purposes that I intended to use the affidavit for.

Q. Did you communicate that purpose to Rerdell?—A. No, sir; I was not communicating with Rerdell at that time.

Q. You were not?—A. No, sir.

Q. That being your purpose, and as you did not communicate it to Rerdell, can you explain why the affidavit was framed so as to suit that purpose exactly?—A. Well, it stated, as I suppose, as Rerdell said, the facts, and the facts suited the purpose better than anything else I know of.

Q. Had Rerdell stated the facts to you before he wrote this affidavit?—A. No, sir; he had not that I remember of, unless incidentally.

Now, right there, with reference to this affidavit addressed to the President, framed in the way I have called your attention to, he says Mr. Rerdell framed it; that it stated the fact; that he had not told Mr. Rerdell that he wanted an affidavit to use with the President at all. And yet he wants you to believe that he did not instigate anything of that kind; with no knowledge that Mr. Dorsey was going to use this with the President, though he admits that that was one of his purposes, he did not tell Mr. Rerdell to frame it in that way, because he was not communicating with Mr. Rerdell at that time. Is that consistent, gentlemen, with what Mr. Dorsey has sworn to upon the pages immediately preceding? He then goes on and says as to the affidavit:

Q. Will you please fix the time when you went to Garfield with that affidavit?—

A. I cannot do that accurately.

Q. Who went with you?—A. Colonel Ingersoll.

Q. How often did you go?—A. Oh, well, we dropped up there often.

Q. About that matter?—A. Yes, sir; about that matter. I presume I went there nearly every day.

Q. About this business?—A. About this and other business.

* * * * *

Q. What did you do with the original affidavit?—A. I believe I gave it to Colonel Ingersoll.

Q. Did you not leave it with the President?—A. [After a pause.] My recollection is that we did not. Perhaps we did. I will not say about that.

As far as that indicates then, the original affidavit is still in their possession. Why did they not produce it, and let us see whether these words "To the President" at the beginning, and those at the end are added afterwards; let us see how this passage in the middle of it got in there; and then let us see whether this story is true? The paper, he thinks, he left with Colonel Ingersoll. It was not produced here.

And now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to one other thing, and that is, that by Rerdell's statement Dorsey took him with him to the White House, left him down-stairs, while Dorsey and Colonel Ingersoll went upstairs to see the President. They went to see the President with an affidavit from this man who he admits that he then believed to be a scoundrel and a liar; that the affidavit did not proceed from a worthy source, though he tries to claim that he believes that the facts stated there were correct, though they proceeded from a man who, according to his opinion then, was a liar and a perjurer, and rested solely upon his authority. And yet Stephen W. Dorsey took that affidavit, resting solely upon the ground that Rerdell had sworn to it, took it to James A. Garfield, and upon that demanded the removal of Wayne MacVeagh and Thomas L. James; defames the memory of Garfield by saying here that he believes that if he had lived a week he would have acted upon that affidavit and removed those two Cabinet officers who were instigating the prosecution against himself and Brady. Can anything exceed the enormity of that transaction? Can anything exceed the audacity of that statement in its reflection upon the memory and upon the judgment of James A. Garfield?

I do not think, gentlemen, that I need to say anything more of Stephen W. Dorsey in connection with that affidavit of 1881. You must believe, gentlemen, Mr. Rerdell's statement of its origin, the way in which it was brought, the shape in which it appears. It is not possible that Mr. Rerdell could have conceived in his own brain the getting up of an affidavit which should be addressed to the President, which should be framed to be used with him, should be framed to be used with nobody else, and let me say, gentlemen, a statement which there is no evidence was ever given to the public (because there could not have been any evidence that it was given to the public) for months afterwards. It first appeared in the New York Sun of the 22d of November, 1881. He went to the President as early as the end of June, 1881. It was not got up for the public; it was got up for the President, to be used with the President, and made a melancholy failure. It comes here now, gentlemen, answering two purposes: one to show the utter want of truthfulness of Stephen W. Dorsey, and the other to show his readiness to cast a stigma upon the man with whom he claims to have been upon intimate terms.

As to the affidavit of 1882, I have taken so long a time already that I will only say that I desire to call your attention to the fact that Mr. Dorsey, when accounting for the affidavit of 1882, carefully kept out of view, and carefully undertook to intimate that they had some reason to "suspect" that Mr. Rerdell was thinking of going over to the Government, as he expressed it. And yet some days before that interview there was the letter of Mr. Rerdell to them, dated July 5, 1882, in which he told them that they had used him long enough; that he did not propose to be used any longer, and that he was going to put himself into communication with the Government. That letter is found at page 3733. It is addressed to Dorsey, and he says:

To commence with this, it will be necessary to go back about a year to the time when, looking forward to the inevitable result of the star-route matters, I started to put myself in accord with the Government. At that time I had no thought of being included in any prosecution or indictment, supposing that as an agent I could not be held criminally responsible. Had I for one moment thought it possible nothing could have changed my mind, even anxious as I was to benefit you. The consequence was, I listened to Bosler and did what I will ever regret. First, because of the unenviable notoriety given me in consequence of doing what he persuaded me to do; and second, because, let this case go as it may, I am still left under a cloud, both with your friends and acquaintances and the public generally, and that, too, almost penniless.

* * * * *

I have realized the fact that all you and Bosler desired was to use me, and when no longer needed I could go to the devil. Therefore I have concluded to be used no longer, and propose to look out for myself.

Having got that notice on the 5th of July, Mr. Bosler and Mr. Dorsey put themselves into communication with Mr. Rerdell, and they get him to Willard's Hotel, and there they have the affidavit constructed under circumstances as to which Mr. Rerdell gives you one statement and Mr. Dorsey gives another, while Mr. Bosler, who was shown to have been there all the time, and has it within his power and within his means to contradict Mr. Rerdell, beyond all question, if Rerdell had not told the truth, is not called upon to testify.

Before passing to another matter, I will call your attention to the fact that as to many of these papers Rerdell stated that they were in his office or in the office in the Corcoran Building, and that while he was in jail, under the conviction at the last trial, when he and Miner were there, his office was broken into and the papers were taken away. As to the office being broken into you can have no doubt, because it is not only testified to by Mrs. Rerdell and Mrs. Cushman, but the janitor of the Corcoran Building states the facts, and states that he made the discovery, I think.

Now, gentlemen, we come next to the division which these parties made of the contracts, the division which they made of their plunder. Instead of going on and leaving their capital in a lump, and dividing the income from their capital, some time in the spring of 1879, immediately after Stephen W. Dorsey went out of the Senate, and when he was at liberty for the first time to appear in his real character as a contractor for the Government, they divided up their capital and decided that thereafter they would have their capital in each one's individual ownership, instead of merely having the profits divided among themselves. So they divided not only the capital, not only the property, not only the means that they obtained by these fraudulent appliances for making money, but they divided also the burglar's tools which they had used in breaking into the Treasury.

As to this division Vaile says the negotiations began on the 6th of March. Dorsey went out of the Senate on the 4th. And he wrote a letter on the 4th to Brady, claiming to be the attorney for Peck and John W. Dorsey. And with reference to that, Mr. Henkle, always amiable, always courteous, always fair, in a way that really astonished me that he should undertake to say so severe a thing, actually tried to show you that Mr. Dorsey was going to kick these other people out of the concern. On the 4th of March, 1879, Mr. Dorsey wrote that letter, claiming to act by power of attorney for Peck and Dorsey. Peck, of course, was dead, but as to John W. Dorsey he could not be persuaded to say that he had given any such power or anything of the kind.

The COURT. Peck was not dead at that time.

Mr. BLISS. No, Peck was not dead at that time, but I say he is dead now. John W. Dorsey, when questioned on the subject of the power of attorney, did not know whether he and Peck gave one or not, seeming to be afraid to say more for fear he was going to bring Mr. S. W. Dorsey in some connection with the business prior to the 4th of March.

Vaile had no such compunctions. He dropped it right out, gentlemen—that he came here as soon as he could after the 4th of March, because he was determined to go on no longer with Stephen W. Dorsey, and he went to Dorsey's house, where he, Miner, and Dorsey—certainly nobody but the three, and I am not sure that Miner was present all the time—they three entered upon negotiations. Without going into details as to those negotiations, though I have a memorandum here of a long series of passages in the testimony, I think I may say that there is a concurrence of testimony on the part of all of them that at some time during the month of March (Miner says after the 4th and before the 29th; Mr. Dorsey says before he went out West in consequence of the sickness of Peck, and he left for the West on the 26th of March) they made an agreement to divide the routes, and at that same meeting when they agreed to divide the routes they drew lots for that purpose and did divide the routes. It is not absolutely clear as to that date, but it was after the 6th of March and before the 26th. It was a division, gentlemen, as of the 1st of April, which was the end of a quarter. From the 1st of April they all agreed that those routes, respectively, should be set off by one to the other, and that thereafter they should be respectively the absolute and uncontrolled property of the party to whom they were set off. The assignment of the proportions of the indebtedness could not be made at once, because they could not tell what money they would get from the Post-Office Department on the 1st of April for the preceding quarter, not knowing what fines and deductions there might be. Neither could they absolutely tell all of the indebtedness. Therefore it was arranged that Vaile should go on and close up that portion of the business, and then the indebtedness should also be arranged, and in the course of the month of April or early in May that was all closed out. But they took the routes, they all agree, as of the 1st of April.

From the 1st of April the profits of twelve of the routes belonged to S. W. Dorsey. He claims that on the trip to New Mexico he bought out Peck, who was out there, and having been in Kansas City on the 9th, he returned here on the 12th of April, and about the 12th of April he employed Rerdell to take charge of his routes. He sent Rerdell West. Rerdell started on the 17th of April, and, as he says, Dorsey sent him West to make subcontracts, and he made subcontracts on the Rosita and the Greenhorn, and some other routes. From that time Stephen W. Dorsey treated those routes as his own, as he had a right to do, and Vaile and Miner treated as theirs the six routes included in this indictment, which had been assigned to them.

Now, having made the division, what did they do? Mr. John W. Dorsey tells you what was done to some extent. He says, on page 4105 :

Q. At the time you sold out, was there any understanding about your making papers?—A. That was a part of the agreement. I was to sign all the necessary papers to carry on the business.

And then he says he became employed as agent. Then, on page 4123, he says :

A. When I sold out I agreed to sign all the necessary papers.

Q. That was part of the consideration, was it?—A. That was the agreement.

By the COURT :

Q. You agreed to sign what?—A. All the necessary papers to carry on the business.

They “claimed that these affidavits were necessary papers.” Then he is asked if that was his agreement, and he says it was. He transferred his interest with that agreement; he does not know what the agreement was as to the others. Mr. Rerdell was absent at the time, but he says that after he came back he was authorized to sign the names of Miner and the others to papers as to any of the routes on which they had been the contractors, and that that was done for the purpose of carrying out the general arrangement made on the division.

Mr. John W. Dorsey states, as you see, that he was to sign affidavits, and everything of that sort, in connection with the business of carrying it out, and we will show you directly that he did so.

Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey states that on the division he signed on many routes and received postal drafts or orders. He says he does not remember whether he received any blank affidavits or not, but at page 3936, he says :

Q. At the time of this distribution of these routes, in view of this law of Congress which I have just read and the affidavit that was required by the Post-Office Department as the basis of the pro rata calculation, did you not also divide up among you a lot of blank affidavits?—A. I do not remember about that.

Q. Do you know whether you did or not?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you not know that it was understood between the parties that affidavits should be furnished, if necessary, respectively, by one side to the other?—A. Oh, there may have been some conversation of that sort.

Q. Was it not a fact that you did have for your routes a quantity of blank affidavits?—A. I do not remember whether it was or not.

Q. You cannot say whether you had them or not?—A. No, sir. All those things were turned over to Rerdell; all the papers, everything in relation to the case, he had charge of, and I did not have anything to do with.

Q. You turned them over to Rerdell as your agent?—A. As my employé.

Q. And you say you did everything that you could do to obtain expedition and increase?—A. Everything that was lawful and proper where I thought a route ought to be increased.

Q. Did you not direct Rerdell to get all the increase and expedition that he could?—A. Probably.

Q. Do you not recollect that you did?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember what instructions you gave to this agent of yours to whose custody you committed this property?—A. I do not remember all the instructions; I suppose I gave such instructions as I thought necessary at that time.

Q. Can you not recall what instructions you gave him?—A. Oh, no, sir; I cannot recall.

Q. Did you leave him in control, management, and manipulation of the business free and undisturbed by any intervention on your part?—A. Left it absolutely to him.

Mr. Rerdell states that he did receive a lot of blank affidavits, and he says that those affidavits were used and that others were also obtained. And bear in mind, gentlemen, in considering this question of blank affidavits, that Mr. Rerdell was dealing not only with the twelve routes which Dorsey took in this assignment, but he dealt with probably thirty more, which were coming to him after the routes had been equally divided among the three people, and therefore there were about forty-two routes as to which the question of affidavits would come up. He says there was a lot of blank affidavits of John W. Dorsey's and a lot of Peck's affidavits which came to him. I have shown you, I think, in my analysis of the affidavits, in the fact of the filling up being in Dorsey's handwriting, the circumstances under which they were sworn to, and Mr. Rerdell's statement upon that subject, that many of those affidavits in blank were subsequently used in connection with the obtaining of orders.

The COURT. Do you claim that those affidavits were sworn to in blank before this date or afterwards?

Mr. BLISS. I claim that many of those affidavits were sworn to in blank in the month of April. The division of the routes was made prior to the 26th of March, and having been made as of the 1st of April, I claim that they were sworn to in blank some time in April. The division as to money matters was not until early in May.

The COURT. It is manifest upon the face of some of the affidavits that they were sworn to after the 1st of April.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. But I was at a loss to comprehend the idea you desired to communicate to the jury in regard to these blank affidavits being turned over, whether or not they were absolutely blank, unsworn to altogether.

Mr. BLISS. What I mean is that they were affidavits that had been sworn to, as I have shown already to the jury. Two or three of them were dated away back in December by Peck. The Peck affidavits are dated away back of the division. The affidavits of John W. Dorsey are dated in the month of April. In both cases the oath was taken by Peck or Dorsey, as we claim, when the operative parts of the affidavit were in blank, to wit: the numbers of the route, the number of men and horses required on the existing schedule, and the number of men and horses required on the proposed schedule.

The COURT. I supposed that the certificate of the notary or the officer before whom the affidavit was made bore the true date.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence, save as to one, that it was not the true date. One oath was filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey and filed with a letter written on the 23d of April, received at the department on the 24th of April, and that refers to an affidavit the jurat of which is dated the 26th of April. That was sworn to before Kellogg, his clerk here. There is only one as to which there is any discrepancy as to the dates, anything on the face of the papers or on the face of the affidavits themselves, or on the face of any of the papers connected with them, that indicates that the date when the notary affixed his name was not the true date.

The COURT. There is no claim, then, that these country affidavits were falsely dated?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir. Now, let me go one step farther. There are certain affidavits which bear at their head the same date as that of the jurat made in New Mexico, the heading here being in the handwriting of Mr. Miner, who, of course, was not in New Mexico at the date of the jurat. But I think that does not apply to any of the affidavits which were used after the division. It applies to affidavits which were used earlier. And yet it is just possible that it does apply to an affidavit which was used afterwards. It may have been caused by Miner's estimate of the time it would take in sending the letter to New Mexico to be signed. But the date at the head, in Miner's handwriting, agrees with the date of the jurat, in the handwriting of the notary out in New Mexico.

The COURT. That is a practical impossibility, of course. There must have been some ante-dating or post-dating in some part of it.

Mr. BLISS. Something of that sort. But my recollection is that none of those affidavits with that heading were used after the division. Of the affidavits sworn to by Dorsey in Vermont, one is dated the 11th of March, and four are, I think, dated the 21st of April; then the remainder of Dorsey's affidavits are sworn to here on the 26th. There is no evidence that the affidavits were not in fact signed by Dorsey, and as the clerk in Vermont placed his certificate there on what purports to be the 21st of April, we have no other information on that subject, and therefore it must be presumed to be correct. The evidence is that when they were received back they were in blank, so far as the operative words are concerned.

As to the affidavits sworn to before Kellogg here, there is no evidence to show that the date of the jurat was not the date when Dorsey did actually go before the notary, except in a single case, that one sworn to on the 26th, which was filed by S. W. Dorsey in a letter dated the 23d, and received at the department on the 24th. And yet as to that affidavit it is right to say that it is, I think, indorsed on the back as of the 26th, and so was not actually received at the department in the letter which purported to contain it.

As to the Peck affidavits, there are some of them which bear the handwriting of Miner at the head on the same date which they purport to have been sworn to in New Mexico, which of course is an impossibility, as Miner was never out there, but my recollection is that none of those were used after the division.

Therefore I think we may say as a general thing that there is no evidence that the affidavits were not actually sworn to before the notary on the day when the notary purports to have affixed his name. But it was blank in all cases, as we say, so far as the operative words are concerned, so far as the number of the route and the number of men and horses are concerned.

Going back to the matter of division Miner says that he received on his routes two affidavits sworn to by Peck weeks or months previously, and which were subsequently used in obtaining increases on routes which were in Peck's name as contractor in the first place, and which after the division passed to Vaile and Miner. We think these were two affidavits made by Peck long previous to that time that were used by Vaile and Miner subsequent to that time in obtaining increases. When those affidavits passed to Miner it does not appear—certainly not from his statement—whether they were in blank or all filled up at that time.

Miner says also that when S. W. Dorsey came back from New Mexico he brought back with him postal drafts signed by Peck, and I think he also says he brought back some subcontracts. Mr. Miner says that he himself signed a lot of postal orders in blank upon those routes, and he says he received blank orders upon other routes. And he says that subsequent to that time he signed the name of Peck and Dorsey upon the papers necessary to transact the business upon the routes which had been originally let to Peck and Dorsey, but which had passed to Miner and Vaile.

Now, that is the evidence of these parties as to the arrangement under which the division was made. Having made this arrangement and having divided these routes, they then carried on the business after that.

Mr. John W. Dorsey says that after the 1st of April he had not a cent's worth of interest in the routes, and yet he says that he made affidavits after he had sold out, because it was part of his agreement. He did not think that any of the affidavits were in blank, but he was not prepared to say so absolutely, and did not say so. He says that in pursuance of his agreement he made the affidavit 25 S on the White River route, sworn to on the 26th of April, and which was filled up and filed by S. W. Dorsey with a letter in his handwriting, when Mr. Rerdell was absent, and it was made the basis of an order. There had been an affidavit of Perkins on that route which did not fill the bill, because the affidavit of Perkins looked to a less reduction than was required, and therefore, in the absence of Rerdell, Stephen W. Dorsey takes the affidavit sworn to by John W. Dorsey, and which was all in Rerdell's handwriting, I think—either in Rerdell's or Kellogg's—except the filling up, and filled it up and filed it in the department, and upon that he got an order.

Mr. Rerdell says that in the same way as Mr. Miner signed the names of others upon his route, he signed the names of those others upon the routes which passed to Mr. Dorsey.

Miner says that he swore to the affidavit which was used upon the Greenhorn route, which is dated, I think, on the 17th of April, and which bears in like manner the evidence of having been written at one time and filled out at another, and Mr. Miner says himself that he swore to that affidavit on the 17th of April at the request of Mr. Rerdell, because, though it was one of his routes, that route had passed to Dorsey, and he was carrying out the agreement which they made on division.

Mr. John W. Dorsey swears to having made a number of affidavits in the same way. He even goes so far as to say that the affidavit made by him on the 11th of March was made when he had no interest; that though the thing had not been entirely perfected it was virtually consummated, and at that time when he swore to that affidavit it was an affidavit on a route in which he had no interest. The trade had then been "virtually made" is his language.

He says that he swore to the affidavit on the Ojo Caliente route (20 F) on the 26th of April, and he had no interest there; he swore to it in pursuance of the arrangement.

He swore to 6 E, on the Trinidad and Madison route, on the same day, I think, and he says he had no interest.

He says that he swore to the affidavits 4 C and 5 C, on the Rosita route, dated on the 21st of April, in Vermont, used here on the 6th and 8th of May, and that he had no interest. Those affidavits were used as the basis of an order dated on the 8th of July following—an order, gentlemen, which I shall ask you to take into consideration as one of the overt acts upon this route.

He says that he, in like manner, swore to the oath 4 O, upon the Tres Alamos to Clifton route, sworn to upon the same 21st of April, in Vermont, which affidavit was used on the 8th of May, and was the basis of an order obtained on the 9th of May.

That he swore on the same day in Vermont to the affidavit 6 Q, which was filed on the 6th of May and which was made the basis of an order on the 12th of June, which order we shall ask you to consider as the basis of one of the overt acts in this indictment.

He says also that he swore to 6 E, upon the Trinidad and Madison route, which I have spoken of as having been sworn to, but which was used a little differently from what I stated. It was sworn to on the 21st and was used on the 30th of April, when Rerdell was absent, and was made the basis of an order issued on the 9th of May.

He swore to 25 S, on the White River route, used on the 26th of April, the day it was sworn to, and it was made the basis of an order issued on the 1st of May. On the same 26th of April he swore to 22 F, on the Ojo Caliente route, to which I have not referred. I referred to 20 F. 22 F was filed subsequently. 20 F not being for the requisite number of hours which, in Rerdell's absence, were found desirable, that being for a reduction to eighty hours, and 22 F being for a reduction to fifty hours, he swore to 22 F on the 26th of April, and it was filed on the same day in the department by Stephen W. Dorsey, and made the basis of an order issued on the 29th of April.

Miner swore, on April 17th, as I have said, to the affidavit 5 B, on the Rosita route, that he says was written at Rerdell's request, Rerdell having been here on the 16th or 17th of April. He says he had no interest in it. It was transmitted by Rerdell in a letter dated the 15th of April, but filed with the affidavit on the 18th of April, the oath being dated on the 17th and the letter apparently, therefore, having been written in anticipation of obtaining the affidavit. Miner says that he had two affidavits on hand which were turned over to him at the time of the division. One of them purported to have been signed by Peck on the 30th of December, 1878, and the other on the 1st of February, 1879. One of them was on the Kearney and Kent route, and the other on the Julian and Colton route. The Kearney and Kent affidavit was the one sworn to on the 1st of February. It was filed on the 3d of April, accompanied by a letter written by Miner, and was made the basis of an order on the 10th of July following. That order was based on this affidavit, and upon the altered petition for thirteen hours, which was also, as we claim, altered by Miner. The letter transmitting the affidavit was written by Miner beyond all question, and the oath of Peck was made on the 1st of February preceding, and was turned over to Miner in the division of the routes. The oath on the Julian and Colton route, which was turned over to Miner the same way on the division of the routes, was sworn to on the 30th of December, 1878. It was filed on the 11th of April with a letter written by Miner, and was the basis of an order made on the 24th of June following. The orders on those two routes, gentlemen, I may say we shall ask you to consider as overt acts under this indictment. The last one, the Julian and Colton affidavit, was the basis of an order for expedition which took $5,346 from the Treasury; at the same time there was $2,376 paid for additional trips. Mr. Miner states that he attended to all the details of the filing, and there is this about it, gentlemen, that the affidavit on the Julian and Colton route and the letter transmitting it, are both of them altered in precisely the same manner. They were both of them drawn with the idea of thirty-six hours, and both of them were altered on the basis of twenty-six hours. Perhaps I may be excused if I refer to this affidavit for a moment. The affidavit is headed at the top in Miner's handwriting, Chico Springs, New Mexico, December 30, 1878. It was sent from here, and yet it was sworn to at Chico Springs, on December 30, 1878. Therefore this is one of the affidavits as to which there is some evidence upon the question of the correctness of the date of the jurat. The letter which Mr. Miner wrote transmitting it is also dated at Chico Springs, and signed in Peck's name, but admittedly in Miner's handwriting. It is dated on the 30th of December, 1878, in the same way.

Both the letter and the oath were filed in the department on the 11th of April, as appears by the indorsement.

The COURT. It is very plain how that was done.

Mr. BLISS. What I am coming to is this, that the oath reads: "The number necessary to carry said mail on a schedule of thirty-six hours"—and the word thirty was stricken out and twenty written above it. The letter contains the same alteration. The letter refers to thirty-six hours as originally drawn and then it is altered to twenty-six, going to show that the change certainly was not in consequence of an error or accident in drawing it. They drew the affidavit for thirty-six hours as well as the letter, and they altered both the affidavit and the letter. The affidavit was made the 30th of December, or purported to be, and was filed on the 11th of April. All the petitions upon that route asked for thirty-six hours. There is no paper upon that route asking for expedition except an expedition to thirty-six hours. Having those papers and those petitions, and this affidavit and this letter having been drawn on the basis of thirty-six hours, Mr. Brady made an order for twenty-six hours and he made it upon the basis of that letter and that affidavit, altered from thirty-six to twenty-six.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). They must have beat themselves on that. They did not alter the number of men and animals.

Mr. BLISS. That is true; but, you remember, that affected the sub-contractors, not the defendants. They did not alter the number of men and animals. The evidence has already shown you that it was not necessary to alter the number of men and animals, because the number of men and animals stated upon the idea of a thirty-six-hour schedule was grossly excessive. It may be that one of the very reasons why that alteration was made was that they had given for a thirty-six-hour schedule such an excessive number of men and animals that instead of altering the number of men and animals they brought it down to a faster schedule. We do not know anything about it. There is no evidence upon that subject. All I have to say is what appears there. You see that before you.

On the route from Toquerville to Adairville the oath was made by Peck on the 22d of January, 1879. It was filed on the 25th of June, 1879. The oath is in Miner's handwriting. It was transmitted in a letter written by Rerdell. Miner says he wrote the oath. The filling up is Rerdell's. It was written by Miner and sent to Peck, and sworn to on the 22d of January, 1879. It was written and sent at a time when Mr. Miner tells you that Mr. Rerdell had no possible connection with the routes or the business; written and sent at a time when, by the way, Mr. Rerdell was absent from Washington; written and sent in the handwriting of Mr. Miner. It comes onto the files here filled up by Mr. Rerdell, as it would naturally be filled up by Mr. Rerdell if he had, as he told you, blank affidavits, which blank affidavits had been sworn to by Peck long previously and which he used upon such of the routes as passed to Dorsey. The Toquerville route passed to Dorsey, and he naturally took one of those blank affidavits, when they wanted an increase, and filled it up with the number of men and horses and used it. Rerdell says he so filled it up, and the percentage of increase was given to him as from 100 to 250 per cent. by Stephen W. Dorsey. Stephen W. Dorsey substantially fails to contradict that. The affidavit, you will remember, purports to be sworn to on the 22d of January, 1879. It is all in Miner's handwriting except the filling up, the signature of Peck and the notary, and yet it was transmitted to the department in a letter written by Rerdell, who filled up the affidavit, on the 28th of June, and used as the basis of the order made shortly thereafter. Miner says he does not remember anything about it and cannot account in any way for how it came to be filled up by Rerdell, and yet he seems loath to adopt the very obvious idea that it was a blank affidavit turned over to Rerdell at the time of the division. Dorsey says there were lots of papers turned over to him and he cannot tell whether there were any affidavits among them. This affidavit was turned over to him and then Rerdell filled it up.

8 I, the oath on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, was sworn to by Peck in like manner on the same day, the 22d of January, 1879. I may say incidentally here that three oaths were sworn to by Peck on the 18th of September, two oaths were sworn to by Peck on the 22d of January, and four oaths were sworn to by John W. Dorsey on the 21st of April, 1879, and three oaths were sworn to by him on the 26th of April, 1879. As to 6 I, sworn to by Peck on the 22d of January, 1879, all but the filling up is in the handwriting of Miner. Miner says so himself. The filling up is in Rerdell's handwriting. That route passed to Stephen W. Dorsey, and was the only one of the Oregon routes which did so pass. The oath was transmitted by Rerdell to the department in a letter dated the 24th of May, the oath having been sworn to in the preceding January, and was the basis of an order subsequent to the 24th of May. Mr. Miner cannot account or pretend to account for the way in which that oath was filled up. It was written by him and sworn to by Peck in New Mexico on the 22d of January, at a time when Rerdell had nothing to do with the business, and appears on the files on the 24th of May, after the route had passed to Stephen W. Dorsey, with the filling up indisputably in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell. The presumption as to how that affidavit was filled up is beyond all dispute.

Now, gentlemen, I will give you a few of the papers which were filed by these defendants or used by these defendants after the division was made. You will remember, gentlemen, that there was before you abundant evidence that Mr. Miner sent any quantity of papers broadcast upon the routes which were assigned to him, using Peck's name, sometimes with a capital M after it and sometimes not. I have here, for instance, 42 A, dated the 7th of February, 1880, which is signed J. M. Peck, upon the Kearney and Kent route. There is the notice also upon the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, dated February 20, 1880. There is a letter to Carey in which Miner undertakes to employ Carey to bribe Abbott, dated the 15th of April, 1881. I apprehend there will be no dispute that these things were done in that way by these parties after the division. There may be some attempt to say that while they did sign papers upon the routes, which they sent broadcast over the country, there was some hesitation or some backwardness in filing in the department any papers signed after the division. I have here in my hand Steiniger's subcontract, 25 Q, sworn to have been executed by John W. Dorsey, and it is dated on the 25th of November, 1879, of course, after the division. That contract is guaranteed by Stephen W. Dorsey. There is Taylor's subcontract, but that I think is signed by Rerdell as agent. Besides that, gentlemen, we have many papers that were filed in the department. I have here a pile of them. I am not going to go over them in detail, but I will call your attention to a few which are indisputably after the division. For instance, we have here the order of John M. Peck, dated the 1st of June, 1881; I have here 69 G, the order of John M. Peck to pay Bosler the money on route 46247, from Redding to Alturas, for the quarter ending September 30, 1881; I have here 48 I, Peck's order upon route 44140, dated June 4, 1881; 45 D, Peck's order, dated July 7, 1879, for payments on the Toquerville route for the quarter ending September 30, 1879; 48 D is Peck's order, dated October 7, 1879, to pay Dorsey on the Toquerville and Adairville route; 46 Q is Peck's order, dated June 6, 1881, to pay Bosler on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route; 40 P is Peck's order to pay Vaile, dated April 15, 1879, the amount due on certain routes, including 46132; 33 I is Peck's order, dated July 7, 1879, to pay Dorsey on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route; I have here, gentlemen, a series of Peck's orders which I will simply enumerate as I go along: 34 I, 38 I, 42 I, 44 I, 60 D, 63 D, 41 G, 50 G, 57 G, 59 G, and 63 G. I will stop the enumeration of Mr. Peck's orders. All those, gentlemen, are orders, dated after the division, many of them coming away down into 1881, and all of them relating to routes with which Peck had no connection, because he severed his connection with all the routes prior to the 1st of April, or as of the 1st of April, 1879. John W. Dorsey tells you that he signed papers right along, and I have here a series of them. Many of them are orders not in blank. There are among the papers orders signed in blank, but these are dated, and they are witnessed not always by the same person as indicating that they got together and signed a lot of orders at the time of the division. There is every indication that the dates are correct. The witnesses are different at different times.

The COURT. These same orders would have been made if the division had been perfectly honest.

Mr. BLISS. These same orders might have been made. I am only calling attention—

The COURT. [Interposing.] They have no tendency to prove a continuing conspiracy.

Mr. BLISS. They have a tendency to prove that these parties having been, as we claim, in a conspiracy, they sold out and made a division. I am going to call your honor's attention after recess to some views that I entertain upon that subject.

The COURT. What I mean to say is that these papers would have been entirely proper if the transaction had been honest.

Mr. BLISS. In form they would have been proper beyond all question.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Let us take our recess.

The COURT. We will take our recess now, if Mr. Bliss is through.

Mr. BLISS. I was not through, but I have got to John W. Dorsey and I would just as soon stop now.

Mr. DAVIDGE. What, for good?

Mr. BLISS. It probably would be for your good if I should stop.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BLISS. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, at the recess I was calling your attention—and I will not go over it in detail—to the evidence of what some of these parties did in connection with the business after the division. I have here a pile of papers which I picked out hurriedly, executed by John W. Dorsey, and bearing date down to the year 1881, showing his carrying out of the agreement of the division. I also have here another package of papers signed by Mr. Miner upon the routes which passed from him and Vaile to the other parties.

As to those it is right to say that Mr. Miner claimed that he signed none of them after the 5th of May, 1879, although many of them bear date as of a later day, and although many of them signed by Miner were used without any date whatever. He claims that in some way or other some of them were filed by the parties long after he signed them, and the reason he gives for saying that he signed them within that period is that many if not all of them are certified by Mr. Edmunds, the former postmaster of this city, who died, as he said, about the 1st of January, 1880. You will bear in mind that the division took place some eight months previous to that. However that may be, these papers are all papers which on their faces might be innocent and fair and proper. They are papers which, under ordinary circumstances, might be executed to enable others than the contractor to draw the pay and to be filed with the department, though it appears, I think, by the evidence in this case that no draft could be filed except shortly prior to the quarter as to which it applied. As to these papers all that we have to say is this: they are papers on their face apparently innocent, papers calculated to go through in the ordinary practice as though there was nothing wrong about them. At the same time the evidence shows that they were papers executed by these several parties at the time of or in pursuance of the agreement of the division. They arranged and agreed for a consideration paid to them that the scheme of dishonesty which had existed and of which they had been members up to that time as a whole, having been divided up into fragments, they were to execute these papers, either at that time or subsequently, in pursuance of the agreement made at that time, in order that the scheme of dishonesty might be carried on in its effect and its fruition, so that the several parties might receive, from time to time, from the Treasury of the United States the money which they were to obtain solely through this dishonest scheme which had had its inception and gone on up to a certain point prior to the division, and which continued right along unchanged, save in the fact that the capital having been before as one aggregate from which the parties drew their dividends from time to time, they took this capital and divided it up among themselves and continued the business. It was, gentlemen, precisely as it seems to me like this: Suppose certain persons enter into a scheme and combination to rob three or four safes. Suppose they got the molds from which the keys were to be made and made their keys, and were about to enter, if you choose, into an outer safe, or had entered into the outer safe and were about to break into the inner safes. Suppose they then stopped and made a bargain among themselves, and certain of them said to the rest, "We will sell you all that we expect to get from these safes that we are about to break into for a given sum," and received the money. Suppose they said we will go on. We will assist you all we can in carrying out this scheme and in making this burglary effective. We will assist you in making new keys, if new keys shall turn out to be wanted. We will assist you in every way in this robbery. We will do all this in consideration of your paying the given sum which we now take for selling out our interest. It was, of course, involved in that agreement that each was to help the other to get the money. Although some went out on the receipt of a consideration, they were to help the others to get from the Treasury all the money that was to be paid from it. All that was a scheme deliberately arranged—a division of plunder, a division of the burglar's tools, a division of everything of that kind. The whole case is full, in its later stages, of evidence looking to that end. Mr. Miner's examination on the stand was full of indications that he was foolish enough to believe that the law was so stupid as to allow people to commit the crimes that these parties have committed and then turn round and say to you, "No, we cannot be punished for conspiracy. We have divided up the burglar's tools. We have divided up the proceeds of the burglary, and we are free from punishment." Gentlemen, I think the court will instruct you that the law is guilty of no such stupidity as that. I do not desire to argue to you upon that question.

Now, gentlemen, as to the overt acts in this case, I have here a memorandum of a series of overt acts which we shall ask you to consider. The court will undoubtedly instruct you that in this case there must be the crime, the conspiracy, but that crime must be indicated and carried into some action by an overt act. That overt act must be something which has taken place within three years prior to the 23d of May, 1882. It is unnecessary for me to specify the overt acts. There is hardly a route on which there are not overt acts within that time abundantly proved. For instance, take the overt act on the Ojo Caliente route, the order made by Brady, in pursuance of this conspiracy, in February, 1881, which was a retroactive order—an order declaring that it should take effect back, in violation of the law, before the time it was issued; an order which was a violation of the spirit of the act of April 7, 1880, if it was not a violation of the letter of the law itself, by giving more money than 50 per cent. of the original contract-price for the expedition; an order which was in pursuance of the conspiracy in everything that surrounded it, which was based on altered affidavits, and which was made while there were duplicate affidavits before him showing that the order was utterly improper. The same is true of a series of orders. The same is true of the oath upon the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route; of the oath upon one or two other routes, and of all these series of orders; in fact, of every order made since the 23d of May, 1879. All this, we submit, is abundant evidence to show that these conspirators not only entered into the conspiracy and agreement, but that they went on with their work. They continued their work; You will bear in mind that all that is necessary is some act done by one of them, not an act done by all. They entered into this conspiracy; they continued in this conspiracy; they went on with their work; and every one of these orders made on or since the 23d day of May, 1879, we submit to you, is an overt act abundantly proved and in accordance with the law, as the court will lay it down to you.

Now, gentlemen, my work in this case is substantially done. I have not willingly made this long demand upon your time and your attention. It was the opinion of every one of those who are connected with this prosecution that it was my duty to avail myself of the opportunity, and to unfold to you, as far as any one man could, the array of facts which this large record of five thousand pages of evidence discloses, and to show to you the inferences which, according to our view, inevitably arise from it. This duty it seemed to the prosecution was the more urgent on account of the intimations that have been thrown out here from time to time that the defendants, from some motives which it is not for me to characterize, do not propose to undertake to make to you any argument or any explanation. In view of that possibility the Government was bound to look ahead, and in view also of the possibility that the court might consider it its duty to say that the Government should have no further opportunity to present its views to you. Under those circumstances it has seemed to us all that, even at the risk of exhausting the extraordinary patience and extraordinary attention which you have given me, it was my duty to go over the case as fully as I have.

Brought into this case, gentlemen, as I was, eighteen months ago, and brought in by the trusted advisers of President Garfield; brought in after I had repeatedly declined to take part in it, because it would take me from my home and my business, I have endeavored to give to it all of the industry and all of the fidelity at my command. In so doing I feel that I have made sacrifices which no one will know, and no one will appreciate except those who know how largely a lawyer suffers when for eighteen months he leaves his home and the business which in a quarter of a century he has built up around him. Still, I felt that having gone into it it was my duty to give it my time, my energy, my industry, and such talent as nature has given me. If, therefore, I have seemed to you at any time, or to the court, to have brought into the case any undue earnestness, I beg you to consider that it was not intentional, but has been begotten of the circumstances which have surrounded me.

In leaving the case now, gentlemen, in your hands, I ask you to remember a few facts in connection with it. I ask you to remember the acts and the declaration of Thomas J. Brady. I ask you to remember his resort to expeditions greatly in excess of anything which had existed before him. I ask you to remember his avowed disregard of law. I ask you to remember his avowed disregard of all considerations of economy. I ask you to remember his disregard of all considerations of productiveness, though the statute directed him to consider productiveness. I ask you to remember that he increased service and expedited it where there was practically no mail matter to be carried, as his own records and his own avowals show. I ask you to remember that he paid large sums for expedition when nothing was gained, either because the mail was already being carried in a less time than that for which he by his orders for expedition directed it to be carried or else while it was carried at greater speed over the routes it lost all its connection by laying over at the end of the routes. I ask you to remember how he paid large sums of money in excess of what his own records showed as necessary to be paid to secure the carrying of the mail even at the speed at which he declared it must be carried. By the subcontracts on file in his own department this was apparent, and the very orders which he made contained in themselves the evidences that it was not necessary to pay any such amount of money to carry the mail, and that he was really paying this large excess, not to the carriers upon the routes for carrying the mail, but he was paying it to these defendants who sat here in Washington reaping the benefit of their plans and contrivances. I ask you to remember how he acted upon affidavits, forged, altered, and erased, and how he acted upon affidavits which a moment's examination would have shown him could not be true, because they led to results absolutely absurd. I ask you to remember how he acted upon affidavits which did not in form conform to that regulation which we all agree had upon him the binding effect of law, and which, when he failed to follow it, involved on his part a violation of law. I ask you to remember that he acted upon the affidavits of those who avowedly knew nothing of the matter as to which they were swearing. I ask you to remember that he acted upon the affidavits of those whom his own records showed to be unreliable, upon affidavits made by those not competent under the very regulation to which I have referred, upon affidavits not in form conforming to the regulation. I ask you to remember how he accepted as the sole, final, and conclusive evidence the statements of the parties who avowedly were to be benefited by the results of the affidavits, and who were practically allowed by him to say how much money they should take from the Treasury of the United States. I ask you to remember how he went in his orders to the extreme limit allowed by the law, assuming the affidavits to be correct, and exercised no judgment and no discretion and attempted in no sense to protect the interests of the Government. I ask you to remember how he acted without inquiry upon affidavits which are shown by the uncontradicted evidence to have been absolutely false and fraudulent, and took from the Treasury tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars. I ask you to remember how he made orders not in conformity with the statute, because they did not specify the amount of money paid for increase of service, as the statute required. I ask you to remember how he made orders violating the law, because they gave pay from a period anterior to the time when they were made; how he made orders violating the spirit if not the letter of the law of 1880, by which, under the pretense of increase of service, he gave an allowance practically for expedition greatly in excess of the amount allowed under that statute. I ask you to remember how in everything great and little his decision was against the Government—never for it; how post-offices already upon routes were annexed to them by his orders and considerable sums of money allowed for the alleged traveling over the fictitious increase of distance; how schedule time was extended without any change of termini or actual addition of distance, and how expedition was granted in order to make up for the time lost by the fictitious addition of distance and the extension of the time. I ask you to remember how this was done whenever it benefited the contractor and when it was an expense to the Government, and yet when the same class of persons urged him to do the same thing when it would have been a saving to the Government, he said he could not do it, because the statute did not allow it. I ask you to remember how, in all these ways, contracts costing originally $43,000, when let by public bidding and competition, were by the secret orders of Brady run up to ten times that amount. I ask you to remember how in a brief period, after Stephen W. Dorsey came into their possession, twelve routes, which at that time cost the Government less than $40,000 a year, and which had originally cost the Government less than $20,000 a year, were run up by Brady's orders within a brief period of three months to over $250,000, and that every one of these orders was made when Stephen W. Dorsey was here or in this immediate vicinity, engaged in no other business except the mail business, and that every one of those orders was an order made for the profit of Stephen W. Dorsey. I ask you to remember how as to all the things which I have heretofore stated there is absolutely no contradiction. As to the things to which I have called your attention there is admittedly no contradiction. They are proved almost without exception, I think, by the records under Mr. Brady's control and in Mr. Brady's office. The only things that it is necessary to go outside of that office to find out are the facts as to precisely how many men and horses it did take to go over the routes. I ask you to remember in this connection Brady's statement to Mr. Walsh that he did not make expedition for amusement. I ask you to remember, gentlemen, the sudden wealth which Mr. Brady acquired, coming into the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General from an office where he had had a salary of $3,000 a year, and his largest salary having been $4,000 in a distant port, and that within a brief period afterwards we find him dealing with hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of his own property. I ask you to remember Mr. Rerdell's statement of his conversation with Brady—a statement carried into Stephen W. Dorsey's letter-book, and a statement which you must be satisfied from all the circumstances surrounding it is true. I ask you to remember Stephen W. Dorsey's declarations to Rerdell as to the money paid to William Smith, and I ask you to remember that in connection with the history of the books and everything of that kind as going to show that when Mr. Rerdell said that Mr. Dorsey told him that William Smith meant Thomas J. Brady Mr. Rerdell told the truth, and Mr. Dorsey told Mr. Rerdell the truth. I ask you to remember all about these books and their entries. I ask you to remember the tabular statement in Mr. Dorsey's handwriting showing payments to Brady. I ask you to remember the declarations of John W. Dorsey to various persons that Thomas J. Brady, or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, was interested with them in the scheme they were entering upon. I ask you to remember, gentlemen, the forged and altered petitions, the affidavits filled up after they were signed, filled up by Stephen W. Dorsey and John R. Miner, as I claim, or used by John R. Miner and filled up by Dorsey, and the affidavits filled up by Rerdell under the direction of Stephen W. Dorsey. I ask you to remember, gentlemen, that all these things which Thomas S. Brady did thus loosely, thus extravagantly, and thus corruptly were done for the benefit of these other defendants. I ask you to remember the absurd story of Vaile as to how he came into this business originally, and I ask you to remember the contradiction by his own oath and the contradiction by his letter written to Dorsey as to Mr. Dorsey's relation to the business. I ask you to remember John W. Dorsey's falsehoods upon the stand as to making affidavits at the instigation of a man who was thousands of miles away from the place where they were made and thousands of miles away from the place from which he says he received the instructions. I ask you to remember John W. Dorsey setting himself up as the man to be believed against the oath of Pennell, Lambert, McLellan, Cable, and others. I ask you to remember that this is the statement of the man who by his own admission was engaged in an attempt at fraud with reference to the side post-office on the Bismarck route. I ask you to remember John W. Dorsey's statement that he paid to his brother under a secret and confidential arrangement a considerable sum of money which his brother says he never received or heard of. I ask you to remember Miner's air upon the stand. I ask you to remember his buying off of Abbott. I ask you to remember his letter to Hayes saying that expense had to be incurred in Washington to procure expedition and then the absurd explanation on the stand of what that meant. I ask you to remember his practical admission, for it was an admission, gentlemen, that he forged the name of Hall and the others on the Canyon City petition. I ask you to remember Miner's double affidavits on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route, one of which has disappeared. I ask you to remember Stephen W. Dorsey's interest in every detail of the business while he was in the Senate; his alteration of bids; his procuring bondsmen; his advancing money; his signing Peck's name; his employment of Boone; his employment of Rerdell; his authorizing Rerdell to draw money in the name of John W. Dorsey & Co., and his freezing out Boone. I ask you to remember his avowed ownership as soon as he came out of the Senate, on the 4th of March, 1879, and his proposal to kick others out as soon as he came out, and how he immediately commenced upon that, and how, immediately after the division, he got the enormous increases to which I have called your attention. I ask you to remember his letter to Haycock and to Clendenning, with the italicized caution that the recipients should let nobody know that he was writing on the subject. I ask you to remember his sending bonds to Haycock, Clendenning, and the others, with the request that they would violate an express statute of the United States by certifying bids in which the bidder's name had not been inserted. I ask you to remember his declarations to Moore that it took money to keep up his influence with the department. I ask you to remember the enormous increases coincident with his presence here; the filling up of blank affidavits; the arrangement of the form of subcontract, and his direction for the insertion of an unheard-of clause as to expedition. In that connection I will remind you of the testimony of Vaile as to Dorsey's interest, as disclosed in his letter to Dorsey, and in his and Miner's affidavit as to Rerdell's suit. I ask you to remember the unconscious testimony which Vaile gave when he said that he came here on the 6th of March, determined to go on no longer with Stephen W. Dorsey. I ask you to remember all the evidences of prearrangement between these defendants and Brady, which are disclosed in the evidence in this case; for instance, the incurring of large expenses by them in anticipation of an expedition which they said was to come and which did come, as upon the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route. I ask you to remember the arriving at the precise number of hours to which expedition was to be made when it was mentioned nowhere in any of the papers filed in the case save in the affidavit of one or the other of these contractors, made away out in New Mexico or in Vermont long before Brady had acted. I ask you to remember the promising of expedition to the subcontractors and the promising of increase of service to the subcontractors, which promises were fulfilled promptly as stated, and indeed were fulfilled in larger measure. I ask you to remember the evidence of prearrangement to be derived from the letter of the 8th of February, 1881, stating that if the petitions were here before General Garfield came into office and before Mr. Brady was in danger, to say the least, of losing his office, the expedition would be obtained upon the White River route. It was promptly obtained to the amount of $18,000. That order Mr. Brady was in substance directed to revoke by his superior officer, Mr. James, but he deliberately failed to do it. I ask you to remember the buying off of Abbott, the paying of $1,500 to Johnson to induce him to ask Delegate Cannon to withdraw the remonstrances against that expedition of service which Brady had put on without there being a single petition for it and there being no indication that anybody wanted it, except the affidavit of the contractor. I ask you to remember the claim that they made that, doing a business of millions of dollars, they did not keep any books. I ask you to remember the withholding of evidence upon which I have had occasion to comment more than once. I ask you to remember the failure to put on the stand witnesses who could have given most important evidence, if not conclusive evidence, in this case, such as Bosler and the others. I ask you to remember how, after a great parade, they failed to call one witness to contradict Walsh, they failed to call one single witness to impugn the character or to contradict the statements of Rerdellor Moore, save the statements of the defendants themselves. I think their bearing on the stand and their evidence, apart from any question of their interest in the case, must satisfy you that their testimony is entirely inadequate to meet the statements of those witnesses. I ask you to remember the thousand and one things which crowd upon my memory, and some of which will certainly have found a lodgment in your minds, and which must satisfy you that these defendants, one and all, were engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the United States. I ask you to keep all these facts in mind, and not allow yourselves to be diverted by any futile pretense that at some time or other the burglar's tools and the products of the burglary were divided up, and that therefore there is to be no punishment for the burglars.

I ask you, gentlemen, finally, to remember that this is a prosecution intended to protect the Treasury of the United States and intended to punish those who have defrauded it; and that while the prosecution would not have you find a verdict of guilty against any man as to whom, under the instructions of the court, you have an honest and reasonable doubt of his guilt, yet at the same time that it is of the greatest importance that no guilty man should escape. Trials of this nature, intended to protect the Treasury of the country, must, from their general character, in the most important cases, take place in this District, and the eyes of the whole country are looking on to see whether there can be found in the District of Columbia a jury of sufficient—I will not say honesty, gentlemen, for that is assumed—but a jury of sufficient intelligence to understand and appreciate a case of this character, and a jury of sufficient independence to act up to their honest convictions.

Thanking you, gentlemen, for your unprecedented patience during my remarks, which have been unprecedented in their length, I leave the case, so far as I am concerned, in your hands.

Mr. MERRICK. The Government has closed its opening, your honor.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to know whether the Government will claim two arguments in the conclusion.

Mr. MERRICK. I presume, your honor, that the address of the Government counsel should first be answered. In reply to Mr. Wilson's inquiry, however, I respectfully submit, that the Government, in the opinion of the counsel representing the Government, is entitled to two closing arguments, and I beg leave to lay before your honor in that connection, or in support of that proposition, one or two authorities. I premise my remarks, however, by saying that after arguments of such distinguished ability and exhaustive power, if it is a matter purely within the discretion of the court, it is probable that the court will not allow the Government the privilege I now desire. The first case to which I refer your honor is the case of O'Connell, which has already been before the court, when this question was first brought up. The second case, and the probably more important and more nearly parallel case, is the case of Queen Caroline. It was a case, may it please your honor, properly speaking, before a jury. It was a case before the House of Lords, but the Queen was being tried according to the fundamental principles of jury law by her peers. In that case, a copy of which I have before me, your honor will observe that the case was opened on behalf of the bill brought into the House against the Queen by Robert Gifford, the attorney-general, and the government's evidence was then, according to the rules of English practice, introduced. After the introduction of the evidence, Copeley, the solicitor-general, afterwards Lord Lyndhurst, argued the case. Brougham was then heard on the other side, and before the evidence was all in Mr. Williams was heard in reply to Mr. Brougham. Then the defendant's evidence was introduced, and all the evidence being thus in, and the parties having been thus respectively heard by these distinguished gentlemen, the Queen was heard by Mr. Denman and Dr. Lushington, and the government closed by arguments from the attorney-general and the solicitor-general. I do not observe, may it please your honor, in the case that any question was made with reference to the right of the parties to be heard by these respective counsel. On the contrary, the lord chancellor seems to have inquired as each party closed what would be the next proceeding, and the proceeding was, as I have stated to your honor, in the order in which I have stated it, the government closing by the attorney-general and the solicitor-general. The other case to which I call your honor's attention is the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase before the Senate of the United States. In that case the opening was made by Mr. Early, who was followed by Mr. Campbell, who was followed by Mr. Clarke. The defendant then opened by Mr. Hopkins, who was followed by Mr. Lee, who was followed by Mr. Martin, and the prosecution closed with three speeches from the managers, a speech from Mr. Nicholson, from Mr. Rodney, and Mr. Randolph. It seems to me, may it please your honor, that these cases are precedents directly in point in support of the proposition I now submit that the Government may have through its special counsel in court and through the Attorney-General of the United States two speeches in the close. I do not know whether it will be more appropriate for me to bring to your honor's attention now a letter that I have from the Attorney-General, or to bring it to your attention when my brothers have replied to the suggestions I have respectfully submitted to your consideration. With your honor's permission, I will read the letter now that my brothers on the other side may understand the position and the desire of the Attorney-General of the United States. The letter is addressed to me:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 24, 1883.

UNITED STATES }
vs. }
BRADY ET AL. }

MY DEAR SIR: After your conference with me in the above case as to the order of speaking I have considered the subject. It has been my intention from the beginning of this present trial to take part in the argument after the case was closed. I could not be present at the trial, for my whole time was occupied, without intermission, with official duties such as no one could be deputed to undertake.

To keep watch over the proceedings, and instruct myself in the details of the evidence that was given, I have steadily, day by day, followed the progress of the case and instructed myself in all that passed.

I learn from you and the reported proceedings that there is some hesitation in the mind of the judge as to the order in which counsel may be directed to speak. The arrangement adopted in the former trial, you inform me, has been set aside, it having been declined. I had believed and hoped, till you informed me of this change, that the course pursued then would be adhered to in this instance, and relying upon that I had intended to have appeared in court to conclude this case, as I did before. In the last case, your speech having been made, you were followed by two or more of the defendants' counsel, and when they had ended I concluded the case for the prosecution, responding to whatever those who immediately preceded me said, and expressing such general views as were called for upon the facts and the law. It was my purpose in the last trial, and it is my will and wish now, to show a determination to have these cases thoroughly tried, and to express in person upon behalf of the Government the resolution to pursue these accusations by lawful means to their lawful end, and thus convey a conviction to the public mind that there was a fixed intention to follow these or any other accused men, no matter how high their past position, and expose and punish their frauds by due course of law.

In this trial the judge himself first suggested, in departing from the former arrangement, that the defense might close and then be followed by two speeches upon behalf of the Government, one of them to be delivered by yourself and the other by myself.

That was an intimation made by the court that it could be done before your honor examined the subject thoroughly.

The COURT. I do not remember it.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing to read:]

If the judge will do this I would be satisfied. To me it appears to be the proper course in a case like this, complicated as it is, wherein so many defendants are involved, represented by so many different counsel, all of whom being heard in a body before the closing speech of the prosecution outweigh in numbers and effect that single speech in conclusion made for the Government. This order is the one that I would suggest, and did suggest at the former trial before the order then adopted was thought of or accepted. All lawyers know the order of speaking is wholly within the discretion of the court, and I desire you to urge in this case upon the court the fitness and propriety of this plan.

The recorded authorities that I know of show departures in cases like this from the ordinary courses of litigation, and there are many, no doubt very many, more wherein like departures have been made in the exercise of this judicial discretion to answer the ends of justice that cannot be cited, as such orders are generally made at trials where they are not the subject of record. Let me call your attention to Chase's trial, to the Queen's trial, to O'Connell's case. Those you possess and will use. The text-books contain but one principle upon this subject, an undisputed principle, and that the discretion is exclusively with the court to be exercised according to the circumstances.

In a note like this I do not propose to enlarge in an argumentative way upon the necessities or proprieties of this case demanding the order that two may conclude for the prosecution; that you will do when the question is discussed and submitted to the judge; but I again affirm to you it is my conviction that in this case of all cases that order is the proper one. If the judge determines to rule that there will be but one counsel in conclusion for the prosecution, and declines to adopt the former order of speaking, then of necessity I am excluded, for I think the case requires the knowledge which you have obtained in its prosecution shall be used and expounded by you fully to the jury. It is not only due to the case that you must be heard, but it is due to you; you have borne the brunt of this prolonged and bitter contention, and it is your right, as a point of personal respect, that you shall be heard. I cannot and will not supersede you.

If, however, the judge concludes to readopt the old order, then you will appear as you did, and I will conclude as before. If the judge decides that you may speak in conclusion and I may speak in conclusion, and the counsel for the defendants then refuse to be heard, as one of them has threatened, and they persist in that determination, then I desire to withdraw, for I would not have this or any other case of its magnitude and consequence sent to a jury without giving the accused the benefit of every word that could be said on their behalf; I would not have a verdict tarnished with such an unusual and irregular departure as that which they threatened. Although the defendants would deservedly draw down on themselves the consequences of such contumacious refusal to speak, yet it would be better for the sake of the orderly administration of justice that the Government would waive a right adjudged to it by the court rather than appear to obtain that right at the expense of the defendants who profess to believe that they were wronged and prejudiced by its enforcement.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

RICHARD T. MERRICK, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney-General in the Star Route Trial, Washington.

I have read this letter, in the opening suggestions that I have made to the court, in reply to counsel upon the other side, for the reason that my learned brother, Mr. Wilson, in conversation with me said that he desired that this question should be settled before any step was taken by the defense; and he further said to me in private conversation—which I presume I may be allowed to give—that if the Attorney-General insisted upon speaking, and two closing arguments were given to the Government, the defense would not argue. I have, therefore, deemed it proper to make known to your honor and to counsel on the other side that, whilst the Attorney-General claims the right to close this case in conjunction with his Assistant Attorney-General, yet that if the court should grant that right and declare it to be a right or a privilege of the Government, and the other side feel aggrieved by its prospective exercise, the Attorney-General will not assume to exercise it at all.

The COURT. I may say that it appears to me that the Attorney-General is not correctly informed in regard to the course that was taken at the last trial and to which he refers in his letter. He refers to it as a course prescribed by the court.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

The COURT. I understood the letter in that way.

Mr. MERRICK. I think not, your honor. It was an agreement of counsel acquiesced in by the court.

The COURT. I understood the letter in that way by the reading; possibly I may have misunderstood it. But if I do not misunderstand it, it is an error on the part of the Attorney-General, because the course of the argument at the last trial was a matter of convention between the counsel on both sides. The ordinary course was not pursued in that case.

Mr. MERRICK. He says the arrangement adopted at the former trial has been declined by the other side. I informed him that they had declined.

The COURT. The proper construction of the letter, as I understood it, and as I understand it now in fact, notwithstanding the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Merrick, seems to be that the course of the argument at the last trial was prescribed by the court.

Mr. MERRICK. I can show your honor that he does not so understand it.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think he so states it; I have the letter before me.

Mr. MERRICK. From my consultations with him I can say that he does not so understand it.

The COURT. Whatever the understanding may be on that subject and whatever the letter may show on that subject, that, in fact, was not the case. The court at that time would not enforce the ordinary practice, but it was agreed among counsel, where there were so many, that that practice would be inconvenient probably, and so they mingled their arguments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, if I understand the letter, it is a proffer on the part of the Attorney-General, and I suppose I may say on the part of the prosecution, to make an arrangement such as was made at the last trial. It may be proper for us, before the court decides one way or the other, to say whether we will accept such a proffer. I want to know whether that is the proffer.

Mr. MERRICK. That is not the proffer. The letter simply states that the proposition has been declined. The proposition was formally made to the counsel on the other side and declined. Of course two counsel for the Government having already addressed the jury it is too late now to make any such proposition. My proposition to the court now is that the counsel on both sides may be informed as to whether the Government is entitled to two closing speeches.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that that proposition is in the letter.

The COURT. The letter, I observe, is dated the 24th of April, and it speaks from that date, of course. Since that time we have had the Government open in pursuance of the directions of the court. The court directed that the Government might open with two counsel. The case has passed now beyond its condition at the time the letter was written, and the question now simply is whether the counsel propose to go on. The time has arrived for that question to be settled.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The question I understand now is whether the court will allow the Government two closing speeches.

The COURT. Do you object?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do. I object most emphatically to two closing speeches on the part of the Government.

The COURT. Will you be kind enough to furnish the court with your reasons ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir. I understand that, so far as can be ascertained, it is substantially the universal practice to give to the prosecution the closing argument, and one, as a rule, has been deemed sufficient. It seems that before the House of Lords and in one case before the Senate a different rule has been followed. But I submit that no case has been cited which is applicable here, in a trial before a jury. No case has been cited where the Government ever asked for two closing arguments before a jury. I know of no such case. I presume the prosecution know of no such case, or it would have been cited. In a case like this, a case in which the opening on the part of the Government has consumed fourteen or fifteen days, it seems to me that the Government should be satisfied with one closing argument. The only reason why the Government should have the closing argument at all, is because that on the Government rests the affirmative. They must establish their case. The Government gives to the defendant the last evidence, as a rule, unless there is something in rebuttal. The defendant hears the State's case, and he replies to it in his evidence. The State then opens the case to the jury, the defendant replies, and the prosecution closes. If there is a case in the history of the world where, in a trial before a jury, the prosecution has been allowed two speeches in closing, I want to see that case ; I never heard of it. I have never seen any such case, and consequently I oppose it ; I object to it.

In a case like this, it seems to me that it would be outside of and beyond all precedent. I think that it would not be nearly so bad to allow the defense the last argument. That is a violation of precedent, but so is the other. But that would be a violation of precedent on the side of the defendants instead of on the side of the prosecution, and if precedent is to be violated let it be violated in favor of, not against, a citizen who is put upon his trial. I most seriously object to it, and I deny, in toto, that it is within the power of the court to decide whether a man shall be heard or not. I believe that rests upon a surer foundation than the discretion of courts. While I believe that a large majority of judges, even if it rested upon their discretion, would do justice, still I believe that this right rests upon a surer foundation than that. I believe that it is upon the rock of the Constitution ; it is also upon the rock of universal custom ; it is upon the rock of the common law. And the idea that the Government shall have the closing argument is as old, it may be, as Anglo-Saxon trials, but there is no case—and if there is I ask these gentlemen to present it—in any country where the prosecution before a jury have been allowed two closing arguments. I know of no such case, and the fact that it never happened goes far to show that it never ought to happen.

Mr. WILSON. If the court please, I want to say one word in regard to this matter. Before this argument began at all the question as to the order and extent of it was under consideration by the court, and this very question we now have before the court was then considered. The court then announced, as I understood it, that the prosecution would be permitted to have as many opening arguments as they desired under the circumstances ; two, I believe, were mentioned.

The COURT. The understanding, I believe, was that they were to have two.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The COURT. The court said "as many as they choose," but only meant one or two, because the court knew very well that they could have no more than that.

Mr. WILSON. I was going to say that that remark of the court obviously had relation to the circumstances which we all knew existed, to wit: that if there were more than one it would be two. At that time, as I understood, the court also said that the prosecution would be entitled to one argument in closing. I think I was somewhat persistent in reference to this matter at that time. My Brother Merrick has referred to a private conversation that occurred between him and myself, to which I take no exception whatever.

Mr. MERRICK. I thought you would not.

Mr. WILSON. And I have also said to my Brother Merrick several times during the progress of the argument that this question, as to whether or not the defense would argue the case at all, depended upon the question as to whether or not this argument was to take the usual and ordinary course, and be governed by the ordinary and usual rules governing such questions, but that, for one, I would not consent that this Government, which has put forth its greatest energies in this case against my client, should, after the mouths of the defendants were closed, be granted the extraordinary privilege as against the defendants of having not only my Brother Merrick make an argument, but to be followed up by the Attorney-General of the United States. This is a very extraordinary application, your honor. None of us has ever heard one like it before. A good many of us have been in courts and before courts for a good many years, some of us for more than a quarter of a century, I among the number. We have never heard of anything of that kind before. And now they not merely propose to give to the prosecution two closing arguments, but one of them is to be made—much as we may say there is no purpose in it, and much as we may undertake to say there is nothing in it—by the incumbent of one of the highest offices within the gift of this Government, throwing the weight of his position in the scale as against these defendants. That is one of the reasons why I protest against such an innovation upon the law as it has been administered as long as any of us can remember.
